First testimony: Jesus Christ is the second person of the Holy Trinity; he is the Saviour of all mankind; he is God the Son, true God and true man. Mary the Blessed Virgin is the Mother of his humanity; Jesus Christ is the founder of the Christian Church. This is clear from his words addressed to Peter, his first Apostle: Thou art Peter (the word Peter signifies a rock), and on this rock I will build my Church. That is to say: I constitute thee, who art a rock, its first and chief ruler. This is the true sense of those parabolical words of St. Matthew. (St. Mat. 16. 18.)

Second testimony: The Church of Jesus Christ is but one; for his words are not, on thee I will build my Churches, but, on thee I will build my Church. Besides, according to St. Matthew, in another place, 13, 31, the Church is compared to a tree. Now a tree is one complete, one single substance. Moreover, St. John says: The people of the Church of Jesus Christ are closely united in accordance to the will of God the Father. My Father... ..let them to be one, as we are one. It is then necessary that the Church be one. Moreover, there is but one God, who is the creator of this world, and the first father of all men, and though there be many nations and many kingdoms, all mankind are of one family. In the same manner though there be many different islands, many different regions in the world, nevertheless, there is but one sun in the heavens to enlighten the whole creation. This is one of the proofs that there is but one God. In the same manner, Jesus Christ is the only Saviour of all men, and all mankind are the people, whom he has redeemed with the same blood, and he has been their supreme benefactor by introducing the same doctrine and the same sacraments. It was therefore necessary that his Church should be but one over the whole world. Jesus Christ is the spiritual sun of this world. Lastly; attend to this great expression of St. Paul: One God, One Faith, One Baptism. This is to say, one sacred and living ministry, one only Church for every nation and every age. This is the true sense of the words of St. Paul. (St. Paul to the Ephesians, 45.) In confirmation of what we say, let us cite this comparison of St. John respecting the church. There is but one fold and one shepherd. (St. John, 10, 16.) The church therefore is this fold, and Jesus Christ is the chief shepherd. He is the source of the authority which he has given to his apostles, and their lawful successors, to be pastors and ministers in the affair of the salvation of men. Hence the church of Jesus Christ is perfectly one. Now, who are the people composing this church? They are those who hear Jesus Christ, the chief pastor, who still teaches and exercises the sacred ministry by those sacred ministers whom he has constituted pastors and his co-operators for the good of mankind. Wherefore it is clear that the church is composed of those persons who believe unanimously in Jesus Christ, and in his whole word, and who participate unanimously in the means of salvation, and who are unanimously docile to the apostolical authority. This is the church of Jesus Christ.

Let not this objection be advanced that there were several churches of Jesus Christ at the time of the Apostles, because there is mention made of the church of the Romans, of the church of the Corinthians, of the Ephesians, and various other churches. For it is necessary to consider that these different names are merely the names of different countries in which the one church of Jesus Christ was springing up, a church which was then called by the apostles themselves the Holy Catholic church. Thus there was then but one faith, one only baptism; that is to say, one only sacred ministry of the apostles, conformably to the words of St. Paul to the Ephesians, before cited, 4, 5. No part of their church was separated from another part. Therefore their great rule was not proposed to men, so that any one could say, I believe in the churches of Jesus Christ, the Holy Catholic Churches; but this is their rule: I believe in the Holy Catholic Church.—Australasian Chronicle.

SITUATION OF IRELAND.

Article V.

Third Period.—(1692 1778)

The Treaty of Limerick stipulated, as I said before, on the one part the submission of Ireland to the British Crown, on the other the free exercise of Catholic worship. One party only however faithfully executed the conditions of the treaty, and this was Ireland; while England soon, either by fraud or force, eluded all the obligations imposed upon her. The law promulgated at that time constitutes certainly the most remarkable monument of masterful iniquity extant: a very chef d'œuvre of tyranny. "It had," says Burke, "an ignoble perfection: it was a complete system, full of coherence, of method and logic, compact and well digested in all its parts. It was an engine of most artful combination, and perfect in its working, as well calculated for the oppression, impoverishing of a nation and the degrading in its people of human nature itself, as ever was any device invented by the perverse genius of man."

Let us rapidly analyse, to prove the correctness of this opinion, the principal Acts of Parliament regarding Ireland under William III. Queen Anne and the heads of the House of Hanover.

We will first notice Acts relating to religion, to that subject of so intense an interest, regarding which the Irish supposed the Treaty of Limerick had secured them ample satisfaction, a satisfaction dearly purchased by the blood which they lavished upon many a battle field.

RELIGION.—Archbishops, bishops, monks and other members of the regular clergy or exercising some ecclesiastical jurisdiction, are expelled from the territory. Order is given them to leave it before the 1st May, 1698, under pain of incarceration (1.)

If after having left Ireland, such persons were to re-enter the country, such an act shall be High Treason and punished accordingly. (2.)

It being foreseen that these persons might find a refuge somewhere among the inhabitants, measures were taken to prevent such protection. Any individual having received or secreted one of the proscribed clergymen, shall be punishable, for the first time, with a fine £20; of £40 for the second time, and for the third with confiscation of goods. (3.)

Provision too was made for means of discovering the offenders. A premium was offered to spies and informers of £50 per head for a bishop or monk whose retreat was made known. (4.)

Thus were banished all the higher clergy; simple priests were tolerated, but on what conditions?

They had to take the oath of abjuration against all descendants of the Stuarts, swear to the obligation of denouncing all plots against the House of Hanover; they had to be registered in the Court of Sessions, bind themselves never to put a foot out of the county they reside in, never to officiate out of their parish, under pain of incarceration, or of deportation; and should they, after having been deported, attempt to re-enter the country, they were to be put to death. (5.)

They are moreover to renounce all external sign of their worship, their costume, and every title as priesthood. Catholic churches were to have no steeple or spire, no bells to call the faithful to service, no external mark of the religion to which they were consecrated. Every infringement of these regulations was punished with deportation. (6.)

Pilgrimage to places made holy by some pious recollections, or by ancient traditions, were prohibited under pain of whipping (7.)

The common Catholic, in the same manner as his priests, was subjected to the most vexatious prescriptions. At every hour of the day, he could be summoned by the judge to declare where he had attended divine service, who had performed it, by what offices it had been followed, who had been the persons present, &c. &c.; and the refusal to appear or to answer the examination was punished with twelve months imprisonment or with a fine, the minimum of which was fixed at £20.

To render intolerable the condition of every existing Catholic, was the main object of the above laws but the actual existent time solely was not taken into consideration; the legislator carried on his views to the future. What was more earnestly looked for, was to achieve through institutions the extirpation of Catholicism so far obtained already by armed violence. Therefore education became the subject of most serious investigation.

EDUCATION.—Every Catholic school was strictly forbidden. No alternative was left to parents in regard of their children; these were either to remain in most absolute ignorance, or to be brought up according to the Protestant system. Teachers belonging to the Catholic faith were ignominiously banished and should they return to their native land, they were, like the bishops, to be put to death (8).

Some of our readers might suppose that it was, however, easy to elude the severity of the law, by sending the children to foreign countries to be there educated; but the English legislator had carefully provided against this, and made it impossible that it could be executed.

Prohibition was made to every Catholic to send his child or children, abroad, or by so doing his property and that of his child or children were confiscated: And as it might happen that an infringement of the law could escape notice, the Magistrates were empowered to oblige every Catholic to appear in their presence, and upon their first summons with the members of his family, and if such summons were not immediately obeyed, the absent child was presumed to be educated abroad, and all the severity of the law against such a case was inflicted upon him, as well as his parents (9).

Persecuted in the practise of his religion, deprived of the means of enlightening his intelligence, the Irish Catholic would seem to have reached a point at which he could have no more to fear from the systematic oppression of his enemies. But listen yet again. The Irishman might have aimed at rising from an inferior rank of society by dint of labour or of talent.

To frustrate this a state of double disability of property and person was to be created, and it was done as follows.

PROPERTY.—The English law of inheritance, as we all know, does not enjoin an equal partition of the paternal estate between the children; the law of primogeniture prevails resting upon the opinion generally acknowledged in England, that the division of inheritance subverts in its very basis the possession of the land.

In consonance with this opinion, the English legislator imposed upon Ireland the law of partition the Irish right of primogeniture was abolished because the principle was regarded as being too valuable, "A strange aberration," observes a modern writer, "the Catholics were subjected to a law just in itself with the view that an injustice was practised against them." (10).

A Catholic could settle no dower upon a woman of his own religion; but if that woman would declare herself a Protestant, the law bestowed on her the power of forcing her husband to forego all the rights and prerogatives of the head of a family. She could reside in a separate house and keep an establishment distinct from that of her husband; she further obtained in that case the guardianship of all her children.

Every child, other than the eldest, could by declaring himself a Protestant, force his father to grant him a stipend, the amount of which was fixed by the Chancellor, and was chargeable upon the unencumbered part of the father's estate,

In this manner all the relations of home and family life were violated.

Were a Catholic to keep a horse valued at more than £5, any Protestant offering that sum to the owner, obtained the right of taking possession of the horse, were it been worth even £50 or £100. (11).

If a Catholic, owner of a horse valued at more than £5, secreted it, he was, for this offence, liable to an imprisonment of three months and to a fine of three times the value of that horse, whatever it might have been. (12).

PERSONAL DISABILITIES.—Most of the liberal professions were shut to the Irish, and this by law. He could neither vote at an election, nor appear as a candidate; he could fill no employment in the army, in the navy, magistracy, nor in any public department. Would he change his religion? then all obstacles were removed, all doors opened to him. Apostasy was recompensed with all that earnestness and zeal which was employed in punishing fidelity.

A Catholic could be neither a barrister nor an attorney. He could neither obtain nor grant any lease exceeding a term of thirty-one years, an insufficient time in a country where there was so much land to reclaim. The Landholder had a right to take from the Irish farmer two-thirds of the total produce of a soil, which his wearing toil had fertilised, which was watered by the very sweat of his brow!

He was excluded from all municipal corporations, and these associations alone then regulated industry. Being therefore exclusively composed of Protestants, they could at all times render all competition impossible for the Catholic merchants or workmen, either by imposing upon them taxes that were not to be paid by the Protestants, or by denying to the Catholic certain privileges which they, Protestants, enjoyed. In a bill passed the 30th June, 1698, is found a declaration of the House of Commons to the effect that as the manufactures of woollen cloths established in Ireland, are superior to those established in Great Britain, the former must be annihilated, and this result was soon attained in consequence of the measures that were adopted. (13).

As settlements upon mortgage would or might have led to the possession of the land, these settlements could not be effected by Catholics.

Nor could they ever act as guardians of any child.

Catholics were by the law presumed to be guilty of all offences committed in any locality. When disorders or riots took place and troops were ordered for their repression, these latter were paid by special taxes levied upon the Catholics. Had a Protestant been robbed of any property, none but Catholics, it was determined, could have been guilty of the deed, and therefore, at random, a sum was raised upon the neighbouring Catholics to indemnify the Protestant.

The next article will show the effect such laws had upon the Irish, and what means they decided upon adopting to resist such a tyranny.—Calcutta Star, Nov. 2.

LONDON.

STATISTICS OF THE LONDON DISTRICT FROM THE YEAR *1835 TO THE YEAR 1843, BOTH INCLUDED. CHURCHES AND CHAPELS.

Six chapels considerably enlarged in accommodation, either by the erection of galleries, or by extending the building, at Hammersmith, Kensington, Chelsea, Gosport, Portsea, and Southampton.

Four large new Churches or chapels built instead of the four old small chapels, at Bermondsey, Brighton, Reading, and Jersey.

Eight new congregations formed, and eight new churches or chapels erected, in the following places:—St. John's Wood, Colchester, Brentwood, Islington, Tunbridge Wells, Dover, Croydon, and Crayford.

Ten new missions formed and served at present by temporary chapels, in most of which eligible sites are purchased for the erection of new churches and chapels, at the following places:—Wimbledon, Wandsworth, Parson's Green, St. Leonard's, Saffron Hill, Deptford, Gravesend, Hackney, St. Alban's, Deal, and Chelmsford.

To sum these up briefly, they stand thus:—Six of the old chapels considerably enlarged, four large new chapels built in old missions, eighteen new missions formed, of which eight are supplied with beautiful new churches or neat chapels, and the other ten supplied with temporary chapels, with the immediate prospect of the erection of new churches or chapels in each.

In addition to these, we may be allowed to name the splendid church of St. George the Martyr, now in a forward state of erection in Lambeth. This magnificent structure is (exclusive of cathedrals) perhaps the largest parish church that ever was built in England. Also, the beautiful new church of St. Peter at Woolwich, which will be opened for the celebration of Divine worship about the end of next month. Another large church likewise about to be commenced in the east of London, in the Commercial-road, for which a most desirable site and spacious cemetery are already purchased and walled in. A new church is shortly to be erected at Guernsey, for which the site is secured.

After the above list was penned, we have ascertained that the mission at Southend near Soberton, Hants, has been re-opened by the Rev. John Clark, of Gosport, who has to pay a rent of £20 per annum for the chapel to the Protestant proprietor, who purchased it with the estate some years since, when the mission was closed and the chapel and estate sold, by the Jesuits. Thus far church and chapel accommodation.

PRIESTS.

The number of priests in the London district, in the year 1836, was 91; the number in 1843, is 135; giving an increase in seven years of 44!!!

SCHOOLS.

Within the last four years there have been spacious school-rooms erected in the metropolis, for the comfortable accommodation of more than, 400 poor children, in addition to the rooms already existing—namely, at St. John's Wood, Islington, and Bermondsey. Hence, the number of poor children educated in charity-schools, in and near London, in the year 1842, was 7,409. This number is exclusive of all Sunday and private schools, of which there are many in active and useful existence.

CONVENTS.

Four religious communities of ladies have been established in London and its vicinity within the last four years, to administer religious instruction and consolation to the rich and poor, and to recall the profligate and abandoned sinner to the paths of innocence and industry. These were the sacred and meritorious objects which our reverend bishop had in view when he introduced the Sisters of Mercy to Bermondsey, the Sisters of the Good Shepherd to Hammersmith, where these communities are in a most flourishing state, under his lordship's fostering care as are also the ladies of the Sacred Heart at Acton, and the Nuns at Isleworth. He has also the merit of being the first who has established these respective orders in this country.—Tablet, Sept. 23.

STATE OF CATHOLICISM THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

"Discourse pronounced at Rome at the opening of the Academy of the Catholic Religion in the year 1843, by the Cardinal Pucca, Dean of the Sacred College, Bishop and Legate of Velletri, &c.

"It is with a true pleasure, illustrious academicians, that I am this year charged with opening the course of your wise dissertations. I am happy too in felicitating you on the literary labours you have undertaken for the defence of our holy Catholic religion. You have known how to unite the force of reasoning with the riches of learning, for the purpose of combating and destroying the lying and hateful accusations which heresy and schism have multiplied against the Sovereign Pontiffs, in representing as the tyrants and oppressors of nations those who have been the benefactors of humanity, the true authors of so many excellent Christian and civil institutions, of which strangers have daringly endeavoured to attribute the honour to themselves as if it had been their proper work. Would that I were able, at the same time, to inspire your courage with a new ardour in this glorious and useful enterprise.

"We cannot dissemble. In different parts of Europe the Catholic religion is attacked either by open violence or by perfidious secrecy and dark machinations; but from the midst of this lowering and frightful horizon there break forth some luminous rays, the consolatory forerunners of a better and a happier future.

"I shall endeavour, then, to point out to you the end which your labours should have, to retrace before you the principal vicissitudes of the Catholic Church in this age—to point for you, together with the actual situation of this same Church that of the dissenting sects, and to propose to you conjectures which we may form as to the future, conjectures which inspire me. The long residence I have had in different countries in Europe, and the numerous interviews which I have had with men, with savans, with ministers even attached to divers errors opposed to the Catholic faith, and, in fine, the experience gathered in a time so fruitful as our own in great events—these have followed each other so rapidly that in a few years we could flatter ourselves that we had lived more than a century.

"You will give to these considerations that degree of importance only which to you shall seem meet; for my part I shall apply to myself those words of the Prophet Joel.—'Seniores vestri somnia somnabant,' c. ii. p. 11,

* We take up this date as the increasing infirmities of the late lamented Bishop Branstons, threw the active duties of the district then, on the present V. A. L. D.

"When I arrived in Germany, in 1786, it might be said that the churches and the clergy of that country were at the top of human greatness. Two archiepiscopal sees were occupied by a brother of the Emperor then reigning, and by a son of a King of Poland, Elector of Saxony. At the head of the other archiepiscopal and episcopal churches were placed prelates allied to the most ancient and illustrious families. Vast portions of the soil of Germany, the most fruitful and the fairest, belonged to the clergy, with a right of temporal lordship which stretched over many millions of subjects. Great in the empire were the authority and the influence of the clergy. In the electoral college, over eight electoral members, three were ecclesiastics—the Archbishops of Mayence, of Treves, and of Cologne; the college of princes was presided over by the Archbishop of Salzburg, and all the bishops, as well as a great number of abbés, brought their votes into the diet. All this opulence, and splendour, and power, disappeared before the unjust domination and the rapacious sacrilege of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and the clergy of Germany are now reduced to that state of dependence and of mediocrity in which nearly all the remainder of the Catholic clergy are placed.

"But shall we in this recognize an evil to the Church? I dare not say so. I consider that the bishops deprived of temporal domain, which might be very useful for the sustainment of the ecclesiastical spiritual authority, when it was applied to that object, and despoiled of a portion of their riches and power, will be more docile to the voice of the Sovereign Pontiff; and that we shall see none of them treading in the footsteps of the proud and the ambitious Patriarchs of Constantinople, nor pretending to an almost schismatical independence. Now also the Catholic population of all these extensive dioceses will be able to contemplate in the pastoral visitations the face of their own bishops, and the sheep shall at least occasionally hear the voice of their own pastor. In the nomination of canons and dignitaries, and of chapters of Cathedrals, they shall have more regard, perhaps, to merit than to illustrious birth; it will no longer be necessary to brush the dust from the archives to establish among other qualities of candidates, six quarterings of nobility; and ecclesiastical titles shall be no more what they had been, surrounded with wealth; no more shall be witnessed what has been more than once beheld—the moment a high dignity or a rich benefice was vacant, nobles, who up to that moment had no other post but one in the army, laying aside their uniforms and their military decorations, and, all of a sudden, invest themselves with the dignity of canons, and ornament with rich and brilliant mitres heads which but a few years before bore helmets. The grave ideas of the sanctuary did not always prevail over those of soldiery. We may then have henceforward less rich, it is true, but better instructed and more edifying pastors.

"With respect to the different sects which are found in Germany, the obstacles that opposed themselves to the return of their members to Catholicity are equally diminished. There are states and governments which as yet name themselves Protestant, but in which Protestantism no more exists. That which the apologists of the Catholic religion predicted in the sixteenth century has been fully accomplished—the principle of private judgement triumphant, and each Protestant claiming for himself the right of explaining the sense of Scripture, by little and little all the dogmas which at first preserved the pretended reform have disappeared, and it but remains for its adherents to fall into pure deism.

"At the commencement of my residence at Cologne, it happened one day that I was entertained by a Protestant diplomatist—a well-instructed man and distinguished writer; the conversation fell on the scientific journals which were then published in Germany. This diplomatist informed me that for some years there appeared in Berlin a catalogue entitled 'Bibliothèque Allemande Universelle' (the Universal Library of Germany), and that in that they professed various reforms in matters of religion such as they expected from protestantism I desired to have the early volumes of this journal, and to apply myself to reading them. Behold, then, in a few words what were these theological reforms. The inspiration of holy books, of the Divine scriptures, was rejected; they did not say a word of mysteries, very reasonably, because they did not admit them at all; there was no question whatever of a ministry and ecclesiastical hierarchy—in a word, in their pretended outline of evangelical religion, there was no trace at all of the Gospel. From that time a portion of the Protestant ministers—that is, the leading portion of the sects—have already fallen into similar errors; and many ministers have carried their incredulity so far as to openly ridicule the most holy things.

"After the death of Frederick II. many Protestant ministers had no shame, in administering baptism to children, to substitute for the adorable name of the august Trinity the name of that unbelieving monarch who had just died. Since then secret societies and political revolution struck the last blow at religious ideas, so that, as I have already said, Protestantism exists no longer but in name. But this frightful abyss into which the heterodox sects have fallen, offers, in my opinion, to very many Protestants a felicitous facility to return into the bosom of the Catholic Church. The heart of man cannot divest itself of religion, and when his intellect casts off the yoke of those errors which in his youth he had contracted, and when he rid himself of the principles of a false education with which he was imbued, it becomes easy for him to discover the light of truth. The number of conversions daily taking place from heresy to Catholicity strongly bears out my opinion.

"But if we behold in Germany rays of light and hope for the Catholic Church breaking even from the bosom of dark errors, France, in the vista, offers to our view an horizon still more consoling. From the first ages, the churches of Gaul distinguished themselves by a singular attachment and a filial devotion to the Chair of St. Peter; from that time also they fought with an ardent zeal against every rising heresy. During a long succession of centuries we have seen this strict union perpetuated with the mother church of Rome; and these churches, these children devoted in their fidelity, merit at our hands a glorious recital.

"From the sad and unhappy days of the sixteenth century, in which the sects of Luther, of Zuinglius, and of Calvin, made their escape from the gates of hell to inundate Europe, the Sorbonne, at the head of all the other universities, raised itself up all of a sudden to defend the pure and ancient doctrines of the Church with all the vivacity and ardour which characterised the French nation."—(To be Continued.)

MISCELLANEA.

ROME.—On the great Feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, 15th ult., we had the consecration of two bishops in the Church of St. Agatha. The Right Rev. Dr. O'Connor (from Cork) was consecrated Bishop of Pittsburgh, in Pennsylvania, N. S., and the Right Rev. Dr. Sharples, coadjutor to the Right Rev. Dr. Browne, Vicar Apostolic of Lancashire, with the title of Bishop of Samaria, in partibus. His Eminence Cardinal Fransoni, assisted by two other prelates, performed the imposing ceremony. The students of the Propaganda of the English and Scotch Colleges joined those of the Irish college in choir. Dr. O'Connor was formerly a student of the propaganda, and afterwards spent some time in the Irish college of St. Agatha at Rome. He has been until lately for five years in America where he distinguished himself so much for his piety and learning, that all the bishops of the United States petitioned his Holiness to have him promoted to the new see of Pittsburgh, though he was most anxious himself to be exempted from that dignity. Dr. Sharples is a native of Lancashire. It was expected that he would have been appointed Coadjutor Bishop of Malta. However, he will have a greater field for his labours at home, and there is more need for a man of his merits in England than there is in Malta. "I suppose," adds our respected correspondent, "you have seen the accounts of the late Synod in Baltimore. There are to be erected six new bishoprics, so that the bishops in that republic will soon be equal in number to those of the Irish hierarchy."

His Holiness the Pope is in the thirteenth year of his pontificate, and on the 18th instant will have reached the seventy-eighth year of his age.—Almanack of the Holy See.

The oldest of the Princes of the Church, is Cardinal Bassi, now in his eighty-eighth year; the youngest is Cardinal Swartzenberg, aged thirty-four. The dean of the sacred college is Cardinal Pacca, who was promoted to this dignity in 1801, (ibid) and who within the last four months pronounced in the capital of the Christian world; a discourse which was eagerly listened to by the most exalted audience that modern Rome has seen assembled. Its subject was the State of Catholicism in Europe; and although his truly venerable Eminence refused his consent to its publication at the time, it was printed in the Univers of Saturday and Sunday last, and we may hope again to call to it the attention of our readers.

To return to the sacred college, 51 of its members have died since the 2d of February, 1831, when the sovereign pontiff ascended his throne.

There are in the Catholic Church, 8 patriarchs, 103 archbishops, and 490 bishops; besides 81 episcopal sees, now vacant or filled by bishops suffragan. These numerous vacancies are owing to the state of religion in Spain, Portugal, Russia and Poland. The Propaganda has under its special protection vicars apostolic in Africa, 13; in America, 15; in China, 15; in the East Indies 3; in the Indian Ocean, 5; and in other parts of Asia, 3; in Germany, 3; in Turkey, 7; at Gibraltar, 1; in Greece, 1; in Sweden, 1; in Holland, 1; and in England and Scotland 12. The Holy See is represented at foreign courts by 11 nuncios, internuncios and chargé d'affaires. The ports of Lisbon and Madrid are unoccupied.

GERMANY.—They write from Wurtzburg, on the 28th ult., that His Holiness has addressed to the Bishop, Mgr. Georges Antoine, a brief, dated the 9th ult., in which His Holiness expresses his satisfaction at the solemn manner in which the 1,100th anniversary of the bishopric of Wurtzburg had been celebrated.—Augsburg Gazette.

SWITZERLAND.—The Diet has definitively declared for the re-establishment of four, out of eight, suppressed convents in the Canton of Argovia. But will this decision terminate the struggle? No. The constitution has been violated; wherefore should the Catholic cantons be called on to respect it more than their adversaries? In political affairs a fierce civil war rages in the canton of Valois.—Univers.

HOLLAND.—The Catholics of Apeldoorn are in hopes of seeing very soon a church consecrated to their devotions in that place. His Majesty the Count of Nassau has promised to contribute ten thousand florins towards the expences of its construction.—Journal de Bruxelles.

IRISH AND SCOTCH STUDENTS AT ROME.

On the 6th of September, the Roman College premiation took place in the church of St. Ignatius, which forms part of that establishment. The Irish and Scotch Colleges distinguished themselves as usual. The Rev. Michael Coghlan and the Rev. Richard Wilson, both of the Irish College, were created Doctors in Theology, and Thomas M'Hale, of the same College, Doctor of Philosophy. Several of the same College received the degrees of Bachelor and Prolite in Theology and Philosophy. Amongst others who were created Prolite was the Hon. Wm. Clifford, son of Lord Clifford. The medals taken by the Scotch and Irish were as follows:—In Scripture, Laurence Forde, Irish College. Forenoon class of Theology, first medal, Richard Wood, I.C. Afternoon class, Aeneas M'Donald, Scotch College, drew lots for the second medal. Hebrew,—William M'Donell, S.C. Moral Theology,—1, William M'Donell, S.C.; 2, Aeneas M'Donald, S.C., closely followed by James M'Donald, I.C. Ethics,—1, John Carmont, S.C.; 2, John Aylward, I.C. Physicochimia,—1, John Carmont, S.C. Logic and Metaphysics,—1 Joseph Curtis, J. C.; 2, John Ritchie, S. C. Greek,—John Ritchie, S.C. Second class of Humanities,—Latin, 2, William Downie, S.C. Greek, Francis M'Kerrell, S.C. This amount of success is considered splendid, and both Colleges have retired to their country residences to repose on their laurels and recruit their strength for another year's struggle, and (let us hope) even more glorious success.

The Right Rev. Dr. O'Connor and the Right Rev. Dr. Sharples, lately consecrated in Rome, had left that some days; were expected to arrive in Ireland about this time. The Rev. Mr. Lynch, O.S.A., has left Ireland for Rome.

ASTON.—The Right Rev. Dr. Walsh administered the holy sacrament of Confirmation at Ashton-hall Chapel, on the Feast of St. Joachim, to seventy-two persons, forty-three of whom were converts from Aston and Stone.

[Vol. V.]

THE NATIVITY OF OUR LORD.

And the word was made flesh and dwelt among us. John 1, 14.

St. Paul in his Epistle to the Philippians exhorts us to rejoice in the Lord always, and to shew that it is not a matter of option with us to rejoice or not, but a strict duty, he repeats emphatically his admonition—“again, I say, rejoice.” The motive of this spiritual joy is assigned by the Apostle in the next verse, “The Lord is nigh.” If therefore we are bound as Christians to rejoice in the Lord always, because the Lord is always nigh, we have a more special obligation to rejoice and be glad spiritually at Christmas when we are called upon to celebrate the presence of the Lord amongst us, under all the endearments of love, The word was made flesh and dwelt among us. Who can hear and believe this announcement without being transported with joy? The angels heard it in heaven and deserted in myriads the mansions of bliss to contemplate on earth the prodigy of love, and to rejoice over it. The shepherds of Bethlehem heard it, and they deserted their flocks in the dead of night, made a journey to see the wonder, and returned glorifying and praising God for all the things they had heard and seen as it was told unto them. This announcement by anticipation filled the prophets with rapture and made the just sigh for its fulfilment. Abraham your father rejoiced that he might see my day; he saw it and was glad. Ye heavens, send him down in dew, ye clouds, rain down the just one; and, thou, earth, be opened and bud forth the Saviour. Many prophets and kings desired to see the things which we see, and saw them not, and to hear the things which we hear, and heard them not; and shall we not rejoice that Christmasday is come once more, to renew those peculiar blessings by which God has so mercifully distinguished us above kings and prophets! The people of God in captivity suspended their harps on the willow, and refused to rejoice in the land of their degradation, but while the angel that announced to the shepherds the birth of the Redeemer, does not deny that this earth is still an exile, he assures us that we have nothing to fear, that our deliverance is at hand, and that it is time for us to rejoice, because our Saviour is born. “Fear not, said the angel, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all the people. For this day is born to you a Saviour who is Christ the Lord, in the city of David.” This is the day which the Lord has made, let us exult and rejoice in it. Let us rejoice because God is glorified, because the prince of this world is about to be despoiled of his power and armour, and the peace of redemption is preached to man. Let us rejoice because our deliverer is born, because the enemies of our souls are humbled, because we have found what we lost, because our nature is exalted and dignified by a mysterious union with the Godhead, because the word is made flesh, that he might make us partakers of his glory. Let us rejoice though we be poor and despised by the world, for the king of glory is born in poverty and cast out from the habitations of men. There is no room for him in the inn. The birds of the air have their nests, and the foxes have their dens, but the Son of Man has not whereon to lay his head. The good tidings of great joy which shall be to all the people, are first announced to the poor. The blind, the dumb, the deaf, the infirm and the lame are invited to participate in the joy which the birth of the newborn king sends forth to the bounds of the earth; and even the dead are not excluded from a share in the rejoicings by which this happy event is celebrated. This divine infant is come to carry our infirmities, to give sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, speech to the dumb, health to the sick, life to the dead, and to preach to the poor the truths of salvation. Though our spirits should be oppressed by temptations, though our characters should be lacerated by the tongue of calumny and slander, though we should be the victims of reproach and persecution and treachery from professed enemies or false brethren, we cannot but rejoice if we be men of good will, for the prince of peace is born to be tempted and to conquer temptation, to be tried in all things, and in all things to overcome, to be persecuted, calumniated, and reviled unjustly; to be betrayed, and to suffer innocently the penalty of crime, to endure the miseries of war and strife and to bequeath peace to the patient imitators of his life and example. In patience, he says, we shall possess our souls, no matter what we may have to endure, and the peace which the angels proclaimed at his birth to men of good will, he bestows at his resurrection on his followers. Let us go over to Bethlehem and see this word that is come to pass which the Lord hath shewed us. Let us go with haste to the stable where we shall find Mary and Joseph and the Infant wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid in a manger, and while we contemplate the humiliation, the destitution and helplessness of the infant Man-God, let us listen with the ears of Faith to the multitude of the heavenly army praising him and saying—"Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace to men of good will." Let us hear the eternal Father proclaim, "let all the angels of God adore him" "Thou art my Son, to-day have I begotten thee," and while we are commanded to adore the power of God clothed in weakness, the brightness of glory veiled in obscurity, and the immensity of the divine nature in an infant frame,—a king without a crown, a monarch without a throne, and a ruler without a sceptre, let us not be scandalized with the carnal Jew and the proud Gentile, "Blessed is he, says the Messiah, who shall not be scandalized in me." "Blessed are they who have not seen and yet believe." The Catholic Christian alone therefore, is truly blessed in the incarnation and birth of the Son of God—he alone can believe without seeing and inherit the blessing of a faith such as the Redeemer recommends. Let us suppose a Protestant in the number of the shepherds who were invited by the angel to come, and see the word made flesh and laid in a manger in all the weakness and helplessness of infancy; how many objections would not his principles suggest to stagger the faith of his companions, and to denude their simplicity. The apparition of an angel ought to be considered a delusion of the night, according to his ideas; and to believe that the Creator of heaven and earth could be made flesh, or that a weak and speechless infant, apparently differing in nothing from other infants of the same age, ought to be adored as the God of men and angels, would be regarded by him as a blasphemous absurdity; and if the Catholic shepherds should allege in defence of their own belief, the declaration of the angel so clear and explicit, the promise of God to the patriarchs, and the predictions of the prophets, he would tell them that their senses must not be contradicted, and that while they can see and feel nothing but the flesh of an infant, it would be absurd to adore the power and the essence of God. Those who deny the word made flesh in the Blessed Eucharist, would have also denied Him in the manger had they lived at his birth, and with the same consistency. This Divine Infant is born for the fall and resurrection of many in Israel, in the beginning and to the end of time a sign to be contradicted, a stumbling block to the carnal minded and a folly to the proud; but blessed is he that is not scandalized in him; blessed are they who have not seen and yet believe;—these are the men of good will to whom the birth of the Son of God brings peace, who can rejoice in the Lord always, especially on Monday next when the praises of the celestial choirs will be echoed back to heaven by the Church on earth, and all nature will rejoice in the celebration of the Redeemer's Nativity.

THE TRUTH OF REVELATION.

For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; his eternal power also and Divinity, so that they are inexcusable. Rom. 1. 20.

What are we to understand from the visible creation, and from the appearances which the heavens daily present? The Heathen, unenlightened by revelation, is inexcusable according to the teaching of St. Paul, if he fail to infer by the aid of reason, an eternal power and Godhead as the only competent artist of nature's frame-work, and as the first cause of all that he beholds. The Heathen Philosophers of antiquity were remarkable for the acuteness of their reasoning powers; they examined the wonders and the laws of nature with perseverance and considerable success; they were delighted by its beauties, they admired its laws, and were astonished at the vastness and variety of its operations; but they failed to adore with humility what transcended the powers of nature, and hence they did not learn what the impressions of their own minds would teach them. They viewed nature in the pride of selfishness, not in the humility of true wisdom, and professing themselves wise they became fools.

We walk, thank God, in the light of revelation, and are left no longer to trace the path of duty through the moral waste of life, by the faint and flickering ray which natural reason sheds upon its darkness; but if Christians be found to combat the truths of revelation by the teaching of reason, are they not more inexcusable than the Heathen, if they fail to believe and practise what reason teaches in accordance with revelation.

Let us then examine the teaching of reason on the point on which the Ancient Philosophers and the Heathen world so grievously erred. Let us assume that an eternal power and divinity may be inferred from the phenomena of nature; that God has been pleased to give us an image of his immensity in the vastness of creation, of his power, in the irresistibility of nature's laws, of his glory and superiority in the brightness of the sun and its influence on our planetary system, and of eternity in the circular revolution of the spheres; in one word, that he impressed on all his works the seal of the divinity, and that as he has made man in a particular manner to his own image and likeness, he holds before him the face of nature as a mirror, in which he is invited to contemplate a reflection of his Maker's attributes. Let this be assumed, and let man be aided by the aid of reason to infer the invisible things of God from those which are visible; what conclusion shall he arrive at respecting the attendants of the creator and their agency? The sun which he beholds above his head in meridian glory, does not travel the circle of time unattended; though it is the source of light, it is not the only sphere which irradiates the earth and cheers its darkness; and while it is the centre around which the heavenly bodies revolve and its influence is every where felt, there are also subordinate centres and subordinate attendance among the spheres, such as that which the Apostle describes among the members of the mystical body of Christ—"So we being many are one body in Christ, and every one members, one of another."

While man therefore sees in the Sun the most perfect visible image of God; while he sees that luminary, as it were, delegating a portion of its light and influence and the functions which such delegation implies, must he not reasonably infer, that thus too, the Ancient of days who dwelleth in light inaccessible, communicates his power and will to his attendants in eternity, and commissions them to execute in time the functions of delegated authority. This inference by reason from the phenomena of nature, is verified by revelation, as every one who opens the pages of the Old Testament must see. Since God therefore does not derogate from his incommunicable attributes by employing the agency of his angels to execute his will, so neither is the subordinate and relative veneration which man pays to angels derogatory to the supremacy of the Godhead. But let us hear the comments of the Protestant critic on this inference. There is, he says, but one God; to venerate the angels and saints or to ask the aid of their intercession, is to make to ourselves many Gods, and to derogate from the honor of the Redeemer who is by excellence and by office an intercessor for us, and so on without end.

Lift up your eyes towards heaven, and contemplate the blue expanse of the spangled firmament. There is but one Sun which is now invisible, but he has left us the reflection of his power, and benevolence, and glory, in the cheerful twinkling of a thousand orbs, and more particularly in one whose beauty and magnitude seem to point it out as the ruler of the night and the queen of the starry host. If the beaught seaman directs his course by the vicarious and reflected ray which one of these orbs sheds on his watery track, is he guilty of astronomical heresy? Does he make to himself many Suns, and derogate from the honor due to the source of light? Does he thereby despise the Sun or impeach him of darkness, and proclaim that it is safer to travel by star light than by the light of day? Not at all; but being obliged to travel by day and night, as man through life, he wisely avails himself of the benevolent wisdom of nature's laws by deriving from the Sun such aid and guidance as the Sun alone can give, and from the Moon and Stars such assistance as they can afford. If this argument should seem to any one not quite so satisfactory as we are disposed to think it, we recommend him to reflect on the words of the Apostle—"the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood from the things that are made;" and if he still hesitate to accompany us to the end of our conclusion, we claim his attention to the prefiguration of the New law in the shadows of the Old, as an illustration of the scheme by which Providence prepares us for the invisible and future, by the visible and present; and here we leave him at least for a week.

DURRUMTOLLAN CHURCH.—In the Church of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, a solemn High Mass will be celebrated on Christmas Eve, at midnight, by the Rev. Mr. Goiran. The Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy will preach after the Gospel.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.—Our readers will learn with pleasure, that during the last week a beautiful Marble Altar arrived in Calcutta for St. Thomas' Church. It was, we understand, made in Rome under the inspection of the Rev. Professor Palma, a Clergyman not less distinguished for his devotion to the fine arts, than for his profound knowledge of history and theology. We congratulate our fellow-catholics of Bengal, on the pleasing circumstance, that the first Marble Altar in India, is destined for one of their Churches.

On Christmas Eve, at midnight, there will be a Solemn High Mass, the Rev. Mr. Havers will preach after the Gospel, and a collection will be made for the Orphanage. On Christmas day there will be a low Mass at 7 o'clock, followed by a High Mass at about 8. Benediction will be given after the 3d Mass. There will be no evening service on Sunday or Monday.

CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL.—On Christmas Eve a Pontifical Mass will be celebrated at midnight at the Cathedral by the Most Rev. the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic of Bengal. His Grace will also preach on this occasion, and after which a collection will be made for the Orphanage.

HONG-KONG.

We have been favored with the following excerpt from a private letter from Hong-Kong dated 4th August last :

"Since you left, Hong-Kong has made such rapid rise in Buildings &c. that you would be surprized to see the place again. The Catholic Church is a splendid Edifice and is worthy of the object for which it was consecrated. I think it is superior to your Durrumtollah, and is calculated to hold upwards of a thousand people within its walls. There is a Seminary adjoining it, which is also a noble building. As for the Protestants they have not a single place of worship here, except that of the Baptists, and Churchmen are not very anxious to go there."

We publish the following letter of acknowledgment from the Very Rev. Fr Antonia Feliciani, for the contributions raised here for the School and Church at Hong-Kong :

MR. J. MERCADO.

DEAR SIR,—On receiving on the 14th July from Messrs. Lackersteen and Brothers a Bill, the result of the Collections made at Calcutta in behalf of the Church and Schools at Hong-Kong, I could not but feel a sincere gratefulness for you, as I know you have been the promoter of our petition to the pious gentlemen of that city, for you lent your hands to the collection by receiving the subscriptions, and being so liberal a subscriber yourself. I wish you the most precious blessing of God, and would be happy to show you in a better way my thankfulness for it; but the only thing I can do now, is to beg you and other Donors to accept the tender of my services, with my best compliments and respects.

I have, &c.

LETTER No. VII.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS
PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—Protestant Unity! It is difficult to determine where this rests, or rather where you profess it is to be found; if one attempts to discover upon what base your pillar of Unity stands, he instantly finds it but a vapoury shadow assuming different forms—a thing of your imagination, but of no real existence; in truth the terms 'Protestant and Unity' bear adverse significations, it is a contradiction of facts as well as terms, and highly illogical, to maintain that a body which protested against being carried from another body, and whose members protest in turn from each other, should have a collective or a separate Unity. Reason once rejects such a fallacious assumption without appealing to the powerful illustration of facts, or to the records of history, and the word of God clearly affirms, "that a house divided against itself shall not stand." Could I but hope you would give this its due weight, it would become unnecessary for me to say another word on the subject, but alas! I know with what callous indifference you view the religious disruptions around you; you look upon them as you may do upon the quarrels of your neighbours, as if they affected you not, or you survey them much with the same sort of feeling as those who are habituated to the sight of dead bodies, with the greatest unconcern; would then I could dissect and represent these your bodies to you in their most fearful forms, as they really are, that you might see the terrible corruption there is going on within, and not be deceived by exterior appearances, and which to a casual and indifferent observer may seem to have as yet undergone but little decay, yes, mummy like the body. Protestantism may be made by artificial means to retain some resemblance to the original, and be worked so as to represent the imperfect bust of Christianity, but the heart, the vital part, the spirit is gone, or rather never was there, that spirit which bore the image and the stamp of the Divinity—that spirit of Unity derived from the Holy Ghost. But suppose, my friends, I grant you for a moment what you cannot rightly assume that Protestantism has Unity, and which I will do much in the same manner as I might allow you to build a castle of cards, merely that I might presently blow it down. Will you have it then that Unity exists in your Churches collectively or individually? Unity in the collective body of Protestants! What! have you any regard for truth, nay, I appeal to your honor, if you will assert this in the face of facts as clear as the Sun which shines over your heads. Pause I entreat you; look around you, and take within the orb of your mind's eye the Protestant world, and tell me candidly, honestly and conscientiously what do you behold? what, but a fearful sight, one universal disruption and dis-union; an inundation of human opinions carrying you to and fro, as we see at times particles of a wreck tossed about on the wide ocean, it is undeniable. Well, look at your sects individually, they at least you will say, taking them apart from one another, "have Unity of spirit in the bond of peace." Are you really going to claim this for them, and burlesque the "one glorious Church of Christ?" Are you going to offer such an insult to the Mighty One of Heaven? and yet tell me you are sane; are you positively going to break "the mountain of the house of the Lord—The house of the God of Jacob—The Temple of the Holy One of Israel," into some hundreds of fragments—into temples from which will resound contradictory doctrines that will be proclaimed to be professedly His. This is much upon the same maxim as if the keeper of the King's Jewels deemed it judicious to break into a hundred fragments a jewel of a peerless price, and then were to endeavour to demonstrate to his Sovereign and to all around, that each fragment was as valuable and perfect as was the whole jewel when it existed in its sound and united state; a lunatic asylum, if not worse, would be his future abode, yet the analogy is not complete, there would remain this vast difference betwixt the two, as there always must be between an earthly gem as here supposed, and a heavenly one, the Church as to her spiritual essence; a piece of the first might be broken off without changing its quality though deteriorating its value, but the faith of Christ's pure Church cannot be inter-meddled with, either in subtracting therefrom or adding thereto, without destroying its divine nature, for breaking one point of the law is the same as breaking the whole, so subverting one point of faith in Christ's Church is the same as subverting the whole. Do then, my dear friends, have compassion upon your souls. Have you not read, "that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, the Church of the living God," and shall we inmates of earth—beings of a day, imagine we can either corrupt or reform it, that we can either pull down the house of God or rebuild it? monstrous belief! iniquitous presumption! when we are told that the powers of hell itself shall not overthrow it, and when on the other side, we are promised, that He Himself, the Omnipotent God, will be with His Church 'even unto the end of time,' shall we then, I say, believe that we can by our powerless breath, or puerile hands, however pestiferous or sacrilegious they may be, shake that 'rock' upon which Christ says, "I will build my Church" and upset the building itself!! Stop the sun in his course, then you may try and stagger the faith of the Catholic Church in the promises of God; but you cannot, therefore we look upon the declarations of your reformers and after divines as most iniquitous and blasphemous, being totally at variance with the divine assurances. Luther says, "men had long been in Egyptian bondage, and had been so foolish as to serve more absurd false Gods than any which the heathen nations ever served," or as you have it in your Book of Homilies 'Perils of Idolatry,' that, "all Christendom—clergy and laity, learned and unlearned, every man, woman, and child were drowned at once in damnable idolatry for 800 years and more," Yes, every human soul, according to this godly doctrine, from the South to the North Pole, were drowned for about 1000 years in this universal deluge of idolatry and corruption, until, as Bishop Tillotson says, "Luther arose, and for a long time stood alone." Ah! glorious Isaias, what came over your inspired prophesy then? "Upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, I have appointed watchmen all the day, and all the night, they shall never hold their peace," 62nd. c. 6 v. But lo! 'Luther arose' after, as you say, a night of darkness of a thousand years, and we see you as the divided offspring of his spirit faithfully transmitting to your children not his faith wholly, but his principle, and which is diametrically opposed to unity; a principle of so self-destructive a nature, that like some of those unnatural animals we read of, it continually strives to destroy its own offspring as soon almost as brought to life. I am supported in this assertion, not only by what is passing before your eyes, but by the testimony of your own writers; your Bishop Milner in one of his early editions of his Church history says, "These were but the beginning of that strife and contention, which continued for a long time afterwards to afflict and divide the Protestants; the Churches but recently reformed were torn to pieces between Luther and Zuing- lius," 'the beginning' a long time afterwards. Ah! my friends, when are you to see the end of your divisions? Never, until this principle, scorpion-like, destroys itself, or as one of your great Church pillars, Dr. Thorndike, says, "That not the reformation only, but our common Christianity, will be lost in the divisions which will never end otherwise." Thorndike on Forbearance, p. 19. and what is the context to this? It is this in the Dr.'s own words, "I am very confident that no Church can separate from the Church of Rome, but must make themselves schismatics before God, and it is out of love for the reformation, that I insist on such a principle as may reunite us to the Church of Rome, being well assured, that we can never be united with ourselves otherwise"—and what are Luther's and Zuinglius' Churches now, but shreds and patches of what they were, you are striking them off in interminable numbers. But let me come nearer to the point, to your pretended Unity; we have often to read of it both ways, collectively and individually; at one moment we are told that each Christian denomination or different Creed, forms a branch of the Protestant Tree, and that thus embodied they constitute the Church of Christ, and have Unity, that sort of unity, which, "agrees to disagree." If again we turn over a leaf or two, we shall find each sect considering itself singly as Christ's Church, without reference to the others; for instance, the Church of England would reckon itself a perfect Church if none of the others were in being, so would the Kirk of Scotland—so would the Lutheran—the Quaker, and doubtless every other sect in like manner would look upon itself the same, and would inwardly rejoice, and heartily thank God were all the others to die off. Lord Brougham speaking in Parliament on the late Factory education bill remarked, "The Church was anxious to educate the people, but the Church was still more anxious to get the better of the sects; the sects were anxious to have popular education, but the sects were still more anxious than this to overthrow the Church"—the parent would destroy the offspring, the offspring the parent! but this is the natural working of the system, like a volcano consuming itself. There is consistency in it too, in this spirit of mastery; each sect we must in fairness suppose counts itself as the only true teacher and expounder of the Bible, and that all the others are in error either in a minor or a greater degree, the conclusion then is but natural and in accordance to the spirit of true religion to assume, that each denomination would be delighted at the others' downfall, and would wish to draw over all other sects to its own way of thinking; at this moment we see the Bishops, the Clergy, and the laity of the Church of England sound the alarm at the fearful conflagration which has broken out within her own premises, the dreaded Tractarians' of, as it is said, 'pestilential heresy,' and the Kirk of Scotland from a different cause beats the tocsin in the North against her 'pestiferous schism,' each exclaiming, 'the Church of Christ is in danger,' yet though they profess to be twin-Sisters, there appears not to be the least fellow sympathy between them, because they want the cement, unity of faith, and unanimity of spirit. But do the Dissenters partake of the alarm? Not they indeed, consequently upon there being no spiritual fellowship betwixt them, nay, it cannot be concealed, but they calculate upon the old adage, 'it is a bad wind that blows no one good,' what may be death to these two Established Churches may be life to themselves; they may rise perhaps upon their ruins only to crumble down in their turn. There appeared a few months ago in a respectable Indian paper—one of the organs of Dissenters, an account of the "Episcopalian Methodist Church" in the United States, and the writer in noticing "the gratifying statement relative to the spread of the Gospel," relates that the increase of members to that Church during the year, according to the minutes of conference, amounted to 1,20,123 souls!! thus is the ignis-fatuus of the Reformation ever kept moving and shifting, generation after generation has gone down into the grave, and each has seen since that era more than one new religion introduced. Divide 300 sects, or so by 3 generations, and you have about the average quotient of sects for each age! a pretty produce indeed—a beautiful evidence of your Unity!! The Bishop of Salisbury in his Printed Sermon preached in St Paul's Cathedral 27th May 1842, observes, "whatever be the faith, and zeal, and labours of such, the fact of the torn and divided state of the Church, and that of the comparative sterility of our Missions, do but the more press themselves upon our notice."

Yours faithfully,

STATE OF CATHOLICISM THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

" All the world knows the generous efforts which were made by the Churches of France in the following ages to beat down and overthrow the hydra of Jansenism; but in this age also, and precisely in the year 1682, the clouds began to eclipse in part the ancient splendour and glory of these churches. Nevertheless, this obscurcation did not last a long time—it was soon dissipated—a terrible revolution broke out in the kingdom, bearing its frightful consequences in its train, and among others that which never fails—namely, persecution against the church. Then the illustrious French clergy learned that which other countries do not to this day understand, that the Episcopal body and the clergy of a nation strongly bound and attached to the chair of St. Peter, form an impenetrable phalanx against all the attacks of a false policy and philosophic impiety leagued against it; it re-learned its ancient courage and filial devotion to the Holy See, and from that age till the present it has shown itself anew by its works, by its writings, by its zeal for the propagation of the faith, the most affectionate and the most submissive child of the holy Roman Church. It is true that this kingdom still cherishes many enemies of religion, and that its churches do not assuredly enjoy a perfect tranquillity—but could it be otherwise?

" When the sea is violently chafed and angered, the agitation of the waves does not cease all of a sudden with the tempest, and it is but slowly and by degrees that the waters subside into their early calm. Religion and the churches behold themselves still attacked at every side by a crowd of enemies, and whilst the partisans of the irreligious doctrines of Voltaire and the philosophers of the eighteenth century endeavour to seduce every class by disseminating at a low price books infected with a blushing deism, we also witness biblical societies engaged in sowing with a profuse hand altered and falsified texts of Scripture, and Protestants arming themselves with a new hardihood. To add to the disorder and the confusion, new enemies have appeared in the camp; these are the fashioners of a new religion, with their extravagant and sacrilegious systems—the Saint Simonians, the Socialists, and the unhappy Chatel, the proclaimer of a new French church. Guilty writers have leagued themselves with these enemies from hell, with their impious and licentious novels, and even dramatic poets themselves have dared to put in play atrocious arts which harden the heart of man, bear the most hateful vices in triumph, and impudently reproduce on the theatre the sacred mysteries and the august ceremonies of the Church. In fine, to this multitude of enemies leagued against them, the clergy witness the adhesion of the University which ought to be its most faithful ally.

" But at all times, that which was capable, perhaps, of frightening every other clergy, has not had that effect on the clergy of France. They seek not to withdraw from the combat; they oppose to all their adversaries a heroic and courageous resistance. Thus, in spite of the violent attacks made against religion, the Church in this kingdom gains ground every day, and the people manifest the happiest inclinations to return back to the ancient faith of their fathers. It is, then, with reason that we hope from this illustrious clergy not only that they will persevere in an enterprise so gloriously commenced, but that their zeal for the defence of religion will go on increasing every day.

" For my part, it appears to me that the Lord at length appeased, destines that France should be the instrument of His divine mercies. He wishes that she herself should repair the numerous evils which she has caused in the world, in the last century, and at the commencement of the present, by so many impious publications, and by that propagandist philosophy whose apostles went about in the midst of the people sowing principles of revolution against all governments, as well as against the Church. And, in fact, it is France that has conceived and executed the magnificent project of an Association for the Propagation of the Faith, destined to second the admirable institution of the Propaganda at Rome; it is France which has replanted on the coast of Africa the triumphant standard of the Cross, and given birth to a new African church; it is France, in fine, that, under the auspices and direction of St. Sulpice, labours to dissipate the darkness of Idolatry among the poor savages of Oceania, and to sustain in Cochin China, Tonking, the persecuted religion of Jesus Christ with an admirable apostolical zeal, amid incalculable fatigue and the glorious blood of those missionary martyrs who have gone forth from her bosom.

" But the hearts of good Catholics are saddened at the sight of that which is passing at both the extremities of Europe!

" To paint the state of the Catholic religion in the north, and above all, in Russia and unfortunate Poland, I find no other language than that of the Sovereign Pontiff, when apportioning out the episcopal sees of infidel countries. Status plorandus non describendus—a state which only can be described by tears. I dare not cast a scrutinising glance into the uncertain future reserved for those people. I only know, as the Sacred Scriptures, and all human history teach, that when the Church has employed all her resources, the Lord will arise to judge her cause, and that they shall then hear the gathering of the tempest with which heaven chastises entire nations, without sparing crowned heads. Verily, we have truly seen in our days some examples!

" Spain and Portugal, at the opposite extremities of Europe, present themselves to our view. These two kingdoms, so remarkable and so celebrated during so many ages for their piety, their sincere devotion, and their filial obedience to the Holy See, had the unhappiness in the middle of the last century, to see ascend the throne, princes estimable for their personal qualities, but of a character desirable to those men who are now-a-days called Liberals. They abandoned the reins of their states to ambitious and impious ministers; one of the most terrible chastisements which God, in his just anger, inflicts on guilty nations, when their crimes, according to the saying of the poet—

'Have of his mercy o'erleapt the bounds'

" In effect the Count d'Aranda in Spain and Sebastian Carvaglio, better known under the name of the Marquis of Pombal, in Portugal, incited, the one by the Philosophers of France, where he had been ambassador—the other by the Jansenists, and both by a deep hatred against Rome and the Apostolic See, neglected no means of corrupting the public instructors, banishing and sending to a distance from their places and schools those professors who were attached to wholesome doctrines, to supply their places with men imbued with the errors of Dupin, Trebonius, Peryera, and several others animated by the same spirit. Under the successors of these ministers the same guilty system was continued: and now all their deeds of enmity against the Holy See have produced their deplorable effects. What passes in these kingdoms is but the mournful consequences of this schismatical work.

“When I left Lisbon my soul was filled with sad thoughts and with sad forebodings; at the moment the vessel was leaving the shore, I cast a look at the city, and I shed tears. But my grief was still greater in Spain. Having gone to the elevated top of Mount Calpe and Gibraltar, from which the eye embraced a considerable portion of the African coast, I compared the deplorable situation of these countries yielded up to infidels and pirates, with the state of the inhabitants who lived there in the first ages of the church, when on their coasts were seen a Tertullian, a Cyprian, an Augustine, and when those famous councils of Africa were celebrated.

“At this moment I do not know how my soul found itself, with this melancholy reflection that among so many vicissitudes of human affairs here below, and whilst I was then deploring the lot of those unhappy Africans buried in the darkness of an absurd Mahomedanism, perhaps a day of Christianity having arisen for Africa, some European traveller would go and contemplate from the opposite summit of Mount Aliba, the coasts of Spain, and of Portugal, and would feel in his heart a similar compassion to my own for the infidelity and the apostasy of those two kingdoms heretofore Catholic. I wish to behold in this thought nothing more than a poetical fancy, and not a fatal forethought of the future, as I have already said in the account of my voyage from Lisbon to Italy, published some years ago.

“But alas! soon does the deplorable state of religious affairs in Portugal and Spain recal those doleful thoughts to my mind, and I fear that the day has already come in which the faith will abandon these kingdoms formerly so Catholic and so faithful.* I have seen on the African coast the gallant French nation erect in triumph the standard of the Cross, rebuild the altars, convert the profane mosques into temples dedicated to the Lord, and build new churches, whilst on the opposite shore, in Spain, they despoil the altars, overturn or deliver up to the flames the shrines destined for Divine worship. I have seen, again, on the African coast, a holy and venerable pastor, surrounded by zealous priests, not only received with acclamation and cries of joy by Catholics, but respected, venerated by infidels, by Arabs, Bedouins themselves, whilst in Spain, opposite them, faithful shepherds of their flocks are cited to lay tribunals, where they are made to undergo iniquitous judgments, by which they are cast into prison, or driven from their sees, and even in the temple of the Lord they cruelly murder the august ministers of the sanctuary at the foot of the holy altar in hatred of the Catholic religion. I have seen, in fine, on the coasts of Africa, at Algiers, received, as angels come down from Heaven, the daughters of Saint Vincent of Paul, the Venerable Sisters of Charity, who, having but kindness, goodness, and tender solicitude for the sick, arms so victorious and so winning, exciting the admiration and enthusiasm of infidels, disposing them to receive the light of the Gospel—to embrace a religion which inspires and produces so many virtues. And on the other shore, in Spain, they banish from their sacred asylums virgins consecrated to the Lord, and seek by every means to deprive them of the resources necessary for the sustenance of life.

“Does not this seem to announce, as I have already said, and make it be feared that for Spain the terrible moment is arrived when God in his justice wishes to carry elsewhere the torch of his faith, and to accomplish the fatal threat which the Saviour uttered against the Jews as cited in St. Mathew:

“‘The Kingdom of Heaven shall be taken away from you to be given to another people who will produce fruit.’”—Chap. xxi., v. 43

“Nevertheless these too legitimate fears are combated by consoling hopes of a better future. A great portion of this gallant nation and of its clergy have preserved in the recesses of their hearts the faith of their ancestors, and a filial attachment for the Holy See, as on the banks of Babylon the captive Israelites cherished in their thoughts and hearts the memory of their beloved Jerusalem. Besides Spain counts in heaven so many intercessors that my hopes shall not prove vain. It seems to me that I behold at the foot of the Almighty Throne, the tutelary angel of this kingdom surrounded by all the saints which Spain has brought forth by those founders and reformers of orders, who, after having achieved so much good during their lives in the church by their holiness, continue to work out the same end by the zeal and piety of their numerous posterity, the Dominics, the Ignaciuses, the Josephs, Cazalauses, the Johns of God, the Peters of Alcantara, the Theresas. Ah! my heart tells me that the voices, the ardent prayers of so many heroic intercessors will appease the divine justice, and that the Lord will cast upon Spain and Portugal the eyes of his mercy. But in appointing the day that his clemency may visit these people, may our submission to the decrees of his Providence be unshaken.”—Tablet.

SITUATION OF IRELAND.

Article VI.

Fourth period—1778 to 1800.

Before we describe the events and facts peculiar to this period, namely, the different reforms which were introduced in the penal laws, we must close the preceding epoch with some details that belong to it and are of a nature to bring into relief the important changes which modern agitation has tended to produce in the country. These details are therefore doubly connected with our subject, beside having all the interest characteristic of old chronicles, and are worthy to be read, were they even quoted as a simple historical digression.

It was hardly possible that the legal persecution of which Ireland was the victim, following immediately after and consequent on the masterful per secution of armed force, could have been established without provoking reprisals. What distinguishes this long struggle most, is the obstinate end, if we may say so, the reproductive perpetuity of the resistance offered. History offers perhaps no two instances of like facts. For seven centuries England exerted herself to subdue Ireland physically and morally; and for seven centuries Ireland occupied England by her recusancy and harassed her by her resistance. Her domination has never ceased to be difficult; her security there was never real. The conquest took four hundred years; the state following the conquest, and by which only this latter could have been consolidated, by a political and national assimilation, that state is no more attained at this moment than on the day after the invasion.

It is not only between the two religions of both people that antipathy exists; it is also and principally between their temper and natural dispositions. With the thorough-bred Irish the Englishman is worse than a Protestant, that is, than a mere schismatic; he is a Saxon, that is, a stranger, a foreigner (1.) We shall have more than one occasion to demonstrate the truth of this saying; we will however now content ourselves with exposing, in their various incidents, the re-action of the vanquished against their victors.

When once the war was at an end, when Ireland, prostrated under the cruelties of Cromwell had no more troops to bring into the field, no more blood to shed in battle, when at last the Irish were forced to bend beneath the penal laws we have enumerated, the national repugnance to foreign rule took a form strange, mysterious, and the more violent that it had to struggle without material resources against forces powerfully organised. We allude to the system of White-Boyism. The White Boys were the Rebeccaïtes of the last century, or, it is more correct to say, the Rebercaïtes offer the most modern instance of that thirst of vengeance and destruction which has in all ages in England urged the masses disinherited of their rights by the undue partiality of institutions, to rise against the grinding influence of a selfish aristocracy.

Every epoch has had its outlaws, and at every epoch the outlaws have been popular. What exploits have been more sung than those of Robin Hood and of his faithful companion Little John? The ballads and romances of the England of olden time are filled with the sympathy which the populace felt for those indomitable heroes of the forest of Sherwood, who belaboured the royal sergeants, surprised the armed force sent against them, arrested sheriffs and hanged them to a tree without any form of trial, who in a word, had instituted themselves the lord justices of the oppressed classes (2.). A literature was created for their special glorification, and the English minstrels of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries used still to celebrate the mighty deeds of these rebels in public festivals (3.).

In our days the Rebeccaïtes are not praised by song in "bower and hall," but it is certain that their aggressions gain in Wales numerous and influential accomplices. They are not looked at or treated as bandits, the devastations they commit are not, in the eyes of the mob, plain and positive high-way crimes. There is a certain order or method, some discipline, even some disinterestedness in their conduct, for no where are they reported to have robbed. Thence farmers, peasants, many proprietors even, aid them with a more or less direct participation. This makes them redoubtable owing to this general connivance, the troops sent on their track reach the spots where they might have been taken in flagrante delicto, twenty-four hours after the time the Rebercaïtes have left the place.

The same was the case with the White Boys, towards the middle of the last century. They were the Rebeccaïtes of Ireland, but with this difference that their association was a much more formidable one: their deeds corresponded with the rigours of the condition imposed on their country; armed with muskets, swords, pistols, often with bag-pipes, playing before them, the White Boys (4) wandered about the country, breaking the enclosures, levying contributions on the protestants, making a war of ambushes upon the agents of the English Government.

Each province had its particular association, the whole of them corresponding together. In the north that of the Hearts of Oak carried as a sign a bough of oak on their hats. Farmers, dispossessed at the expiration of their leases, joined together and armed themselves under the name of Hearts of Steel. But the most strictly united of all was formed in the Southern districts, and called the Right Boys. All its affiliates swore to pay no tithe to any priests, even Catholic, and to obey no other person but a mysterious Chief they named Captain Right. That oath was so well observed that in many localities, the Officers of government were unable to find at any price men that would execute the sentences passed against the Right Boys (5).

The organisation of all these Societies was complete. They had their collectors to receive taxes, their treasurers to keep the sums so levied, their cashiers to pay the expenses incurred for the interest of the common cause. Their agents used to oblige the peasantry to swear they would never betray them, and these oaths were generally faithfully kept. Avengers of all wrongs, they punished those proprietors that had speculated upon the price of the land or raised above a reasonable rate the rents of farms.

Punishments inflicted by them were of different sorts.

Sometimes they would burn the dwellings of those they regarded as their enemies; sometimes they would drag a man destined to their vengeance out of his bed, in a cold winter night, and made him gallop unclad a long distance on horseback; after which they buried him up to the chin in a hole in the earth and left him there after slitting one of his ears (6). At other times they mutilated the cattle or ploughed up the meadows, or carried away the daughters of rich landholders. All these excesses were generally committed in the night time, and with so much promptitude and secrecy, that it was almost impossible to be on guard against them.

A dreadful oath bound all the members of the association. Under pain of death they engaged themselves never to divulge what was to take place during and at their mysterious deliberations, and to execute without hesitation, at the peril of life, all that might be ordered by their Chiefs. When a member had been selected to accomplish an act of vengeance he would blindly obey the mandate. He had to murder and he murdered; he had to burn and he burnt; he had to dishonour a young heiress and he dishonoured her; thence terror was general; justice remained powerless against these associations acting in the dark and overmastering the populace by a dim and secret terror of their unseen power.

Whoever dared to give evidence against a White Boy was irremissibly vowed to death; this was the first article of the code promulgated by this merciless power, and this was known publicly. As soon as the prosecution had been commenced, the whole of the association would come in aid of the prosecuted member. The most frightful threats were placarded at the door of all persons called to depose in favour of the accusation. Complaints could not be but rare, notwithstanding the large premiums offered by the magistrates to encourage them, since the witnesses, after having been kept in some place of safety till the day of trial and immediately after it, were obliged to quit their country to save their life.

The association however used not to strike without some previous notice. Mr. Geo. Lewis published a few years ago a very curious book on the proceedings in these circumstances. Had a proprietor exacted from his farmers too high a rent, the following morning he found stuck up on his door a placard in these terms:

"This is to inform you that we will no longer suffer the injustice of paying a rent double of what it should be. He that will take no account of the present notice, shall be treated with the greatest severity.

Signed. TERRY'S MOTHER (or some other imaginary name.)

When workmen were paid too low wages, a decree like the following was immediately published.

"Be it known that from this day none shall work under the salary of 10 shillings per week. Woe be to whomever will accept inferior wages."

Signed. TERRY-ALT.

The following appeared in order to stop the payment of tithes.

"Let the consequence of this advice be duly weighed; if you pay a single tithe, you may order your coffin. Would you stay in the country or leave it, your death is certain."

Signed. CAPTAIN ROCK.

And underneath was the sketch of a coffin.

As the warfare of these associations against the civil and military government of Ireland (7), was the cause of numerous disorders and devastations, several proprietors and young men belonging to rich Protestant families thought of forming, under the name of Volunteers, a counter-association with the sole view of maintaining public peace. They soon equipped and armed themselves and patrolled night and day wherever troubles burst out. These Volunteers became the model and nucleus for the formation of a body of national militia which soon attained (in 1780) a number of no less than 44,000 men. Being composed mostly of Anglo-Irish Protestants, the British Government took no distrust of them, and granted them large quantities of arms and munitions of war.

Those who first conceived that great military association had had no other object but the defence of the Irish soil; but Ireland was so wretched, all classes suffered under so many vexations, that as soon as the Volunteers were conscious of their strength they resolved to use it to ameliorate the situation of the country. A new spirit of patriotism rose amongst them, which embraced in a common bond of love all the inhabitants without distinction of race or of religion. The Catholics that wished to become Volunteers were received with open arms, while a Saxon soldiery gave the military salute and presented arms to the chaplains of the Catholic regiments. (8.)

In each province the Volunteers held political meetings, and all agreed to send deputies to form a central assembly—with full power to act as representative of the Irish nation. (9.) That assembly called in Dublin took several resolutions, all founded upon the principle that the English Parliament had no right whatever to legislate for Ireland and that the right rested solely with the Irish Parliament. The English Government then (1783) busied in the war against the United States of America and without means of counter-balancing the new organisation of the Volunteers, recognised by a bill the integrity of the legislative rights of the two Irish houses.

In the same year and for the first time the Habeas Corpus act was granted to Ireland.

The following parallel will perhaps appear not devoid of interest.

The spirit of White Boyism lasted, under various shapes, from 1760 up to the time when O'Connell took in hand the cause of Ireland. It is he indeed who has removed from his countrymen those habits of violence and of sanguinary retaliation of wrongs contracted at times when the power of principles and of moral ideas was not understood, no reformer perhaps ever succeeded so completely in influencing the spirit and morals of a large population. He has weakened the influence of secret societies, and discountenanced conspiracies, nocturnal executions, and all the ancient organisation of Irish resistance. Ireland now professes to pursue in the light of the open day, and with the full publicity of regular meetings, under O'Connell's guidance, the rescission and reform of all the wrongs committed by England for so many centuries. Crimes against persons and property have diminished in a very commendable proportion; the deeds of the occult conventicles have been succeeded by the public action of that association which sits weekly in the Corn-Exchange at Dublin and dictates rules that the people accept with the most spontaneous unanimity. Nothing equals the authority and influence of this new association. The old one had recourse to intimidation to ensure obedience; the new one appeals to no other feelings but pure patriotism, and moral devotion. Its greatest rigour consists in striking out of its lists those who are pronounced unworthy. This was the punishment which O'Connell thought of inflicting lately on the inhabitants of Ahascragh for certain acts of violence, and it proved to be more effective than would have been the most severe of sentences. A few days after the people of Ahascragh had been declared incapable of obtaining during one year their card of repealers, they expressed how grieved they felt at having been misled by an excess of zeal; they implored pardon as men suffering under an unbearable load of punishment. The same feeling pervades a great part of the country. It is sufficient for the Dublin association or O'Connell, its president, to issue a simple order, that the Irish peasant should overcome his ardent passions and suppress his very nature. "I have been beaten," cried a man at the time of the elections at Waterford. "And why did you not give blow for blow?" "I thought the association had forbidden it." On the eve of the great meetings the association proclaims an order prohibiting cutting any green bough from the trees, or appearing drunk: the next day not a tree has been touched, not a drop of whiskey has been consumed. And these meetings comprehend several hundred thousand men!

It is difficult to repress a feeling of unqualified admiration for one who has like O'Connell, out of disorder created order,—out of riot, peace,—out of excess, moderation. But let us pause before we give way wholly to our feelings on this subject. O'Connell has yet the major part of his career as a repealer to go through, "Il faut attendre jusqu'au soir, pour dire, le beau jour!" Thus we can only at this time advert casually to the revolution of peace which this remarkable man has accomplished. His tactics as respects Repeal involve perhaps some show of intimidation towards England. He calls it, a display of moral strength; his enemies, a show of physical rebellion. He thinks perchance that as most of the concessions of England to Irishmen have been wrung from her by fear, the course he seems to take is a wise following of precedent. He may be wrong in his conclusion, but that his promises have ample foundation we will show in our next.—Calcutta Star, Nov. 15.

PERSECUTION IN MADEIRA.

Amidst the sorrowful fortunes of religion in their own country, and the sore trials to which their temper, their pockets, and their zeal have recently been exposed, our good friends north of the Tweed have yet been able to spare a little time from their own sorrows to discuss the grievous oppression endured by one of their own native Scotch lambs, or wethers, at the hands of the savage and shearing authorities of Portugal in the island of Madeira. The case, indeed, is tolerably heart rending as told by the friends of the victim of Popish bigotry; and as we have no information on the subject beyond that supplied through the ordinary channels from the martyred Scotchman and his allies, we are compelled, per force, to take their stories for want of better.

We have before us a number of the Scottish Guardian for the 22d inst. in which we find an account of a "large and highly-respectable meeting of the inhabitants of Glasgow of all evangelical religious denominations," held in Dr. Wardlaw's chapel, for the purpose of memorialising the Government "to take measures for the release of the Rev. Dr. Kalley, now under imprisonment in the island of Madeira, for preaching the Gospel in his own house." The meeting was respectfully attended by lay-lady and clergy-lady of very many denominations, and "the proceedings commenced with prayer by Dr. Forbes." The chairman, James Watson, Esq., M.D., opened the secular proceedings; and one of the first things that came out was the rather odd circumstance that the meeting was summoned to take into consideration a state of facts that had no existence other than an imaginary one. "The Rev. Dr. Kalley, now under imprisonment in the island of Madeira." So says the account of the meeting. The Memorial agreed to by the meeting adopts, rather more cautiously however, a similar phraseology. It states that "the Rev. R. R. Kalley, M.D.," "has been cast into prison;" they add their "full belief" that he "had been incarcerated in violation of a treaty;" and they conclude with an earnest prayer that "such steps may be taken as may be necessary to relieve Dr. Kalley from unjust imprisonment." These are the solemn assertions of the evangelical gentlemen then and there assembled. But, unfortunately, one of the first facts that transpired at the meeting was, that Dr. Kalley was not in prison at all. "The Earl of Aberdeen," said the chairman, "on a representation being made to him of the circumstances of the case, enjoined our ambassador to Lisbon to demand that he should be released on bail, and that in the future proceedings against him the strictest attention be given to the treaty betwixt the two countries. There is every reason to believe, therefore, that Dr. Kalley is at present at liberty, or is only in moderate confinement." This part, then, of the memorial we may treat as a sham or fraudulent pretence, got up by the Glasgow Evangelicals to awaken a fictitious sympathy for the case. They say very boldly that he is in prison, but it is evident they know very well he is not. The next sentence of the learned chairman shows a glimpse at least of the nature of their apprehensions. "But still we cannot consider him as in a state of safety, imprisoned as he is"—(he had just said he was at liberty)—"under a law, the penalty of which is death and confiscation of property; and unless efforts are made and sustained in his behalf, a conviction must take place under that law, which would be fatal to him." What the exact nature of Dr. Kalley's offence, or the amount of its penalty may be, we cannot tell, and we shall not take them on any such authority as that before us. But one thing is quite certain, on the showing of the chairman, that the Government is called on to interfere, not to relieve a British subject from an unlawful imprisonment—that has been done already—but to bring about an arbitrary interference against a law, under which, they very frankly tell us, "a conviction must take place." The object, then, is to induce Lord Aberdeen to violate the law of nations, by a forcible interposition in behalf of a British criminal against Portuguese law. So much is obvious on their own showing.

The "truthfulness"—as the cant phrase now runs—of the Glasgow Evangelicals is not less conspicuous on another point. The Memorial boldly states that Dr. Kalley "has been cast into prison for no crime; save preaching the Gospel of Christ, and that within the walls of his own house." This seems to be the lie of the Memorial; the truth came out in the plain speech of the evening, that of Dr. Henderson; "except in one instance, when, under the temptation of a large audience, he preached in a place where he had no house of his own—except in that single instance, he did all in his own dwelling." So that while the Memorial states that he did nothing save in his own dwelling, the fact is that on one occasion, at least, he contrived to call together "a large audience" out of his own house, and to be "tempted" to preach to them unlawfully. So much to test the trustworthiness of these grievance-mongers.

The short statement of the facts, as given by themselves, is as follows. Dr. Kalley was a physician, or apothecary, who once practised in Kilmarnock, and was there and then well skilled in drugs, but "entirely ignorant of the grace of God;" and we are sorry to have to say that he "mingled to a considerable extent with the gay and giddy." In process of time, however, as he rose in the world, "he fell under the power of Divine truth;" and, being a married man, and knowing what comfortable quarters the Emperor of China has been in the habit of providing for European missionaries, he resolved (several years ago) to qualify himself "as a medical missionary to China!" It is impossible to understand how any man, with a view of "being useful" "as a medical missionary," could think of taking his wife to China; where the penalty for preaching is death and flogging; where a woman could only be an incumbrance; and where, under the circumstances, the practice of medicine must be a mere farce. However, it is clear he was very much disposed to take a ramble through the world, and as his wife's health compelled him to decline China, he went to Madeira, in the ostensible character of a physician, but really with the purposes of a missionary. On his first arrival at Madeira he met with no opposition from the clergy. He practised medicine, taught English to the students of the College and read the Bible to the poor who visited him for his advice—so that they "were dismissed not only with medicine for their bodies, but a portion of the Word of Life for the health of their souls." Still the clergy did not interfere; but as he happened to be practising without a license, medical jealousy drove him to Lisbon to stand his examination for a degree. On his return he renewed his practice, and at length a charge of "teaching the people heresy" was brought against him. For a long time the clergy refused to entertain the charge. But at length, under pretence of practising his own religion in his own house, he had schools of 800 adults to whom he taught the Bible after his own fashion, and had assemblies of 4 and 5,000 to hear the Word.

For some time he was allowed to go on without interruption. He went away from Funchal to the northern part of the island, and having there hired a house, began again to preach; and the interest excited at this time over the island was such, that, Sabbath after Sabbath, thousands in that part of the country crossed through several parishes to go to the place where he was. He told him (Dr. H.) that the Sabbath before he left, no fewer than between 4,000 and 5,000 were assembled. So eager were they to hear the word, that thousands were there on the Saturday evening with their provisions, which they suspended from the branches of trees, while they reposed during the night under their shade. He asked him what was the fruit of all this interest; and his answer was, that he could not say much about the fruit yet—he seemed to think that there were many signs of promise, but he could not say that there were many who had received the truth in the love of it. A woman had refused to kiss images, and worship the Virgin, and for this she was cast into prison, where, he supposed, she still lay. In a letter which he had received from Dr. Kalley, he told him that there were five persons in prison—himself now made the sixth—for the sake of the Gospel. The apostasy, as it was called, of the Portuguese, was the signal for renewed opposition to Dr. Kalley. (Hear, hear.) Those clergymen who had kept aloof so long as they thought there were no converts, now began first to cool towards him, then to kindle against him, and now they were foremost among those who were his persecutors. At this time he received an intimation from the Governor, that he must be silent, on pain of being tried.

Still some time passed over without his being arrested, but at length he was secured, thrown into prison, and is now, it seems, liberated on bail—but certain (poor man!) of conviction and derapitation. So say his friends, at least, whom we do not very strongly credit. At all events, it is quite clear, from their own showing, that he deliberately, wilfully, and in the teeth of a fair and friendly warning, and of much long-suffering and patience on the part of the authorities—broke the law under the fraudulent or false pretence of exercising his own rights of conscience. By treaty every man may worship in his own house; and, indeed, the island contains an English Episcopal chapel with a resident minister, and also a Presbyterian place of worship. So that there is, and has been, every liberty for Dr. Kalley, his wife, children, servants, and all that belong to him, to exercise their religion unfettered and uncontrolled. What has been tardily stopped, is an illegal interference by a foreigner with the religious instruction of the natives. On the showing of his own friends, he has no claim to the protection of Lord Aberdeen; and if his conviction is as certain as they tell us, we suppose the poor man will have nothing for it but to make up his mind to be a martyr against his will. Of a truth, it would be an odd sight, and worth a voyage to Madeira for that alone. Only think! a Scotch Presbyterian meancier caught in his own trap, and beheaded for the faith of John Knox and Esculapius, by those bloody Papists, within a seven days sail of Falmouth. Beheaded? Why, the man will be burnt alive! Seriously; it is quite evident from the statements of his friends—firstly—that Dr. Kalley has intentionally broken the law and laid himself open to its penalty; secondly—that their charges against the authorities of Madeira are not to be depended upon; thirdly—that the talk about "death" and martyrdom, is a shallow pretence to cast dust into the eyes of the British public.

Another meeting on the same score was held recently in Edinburgh, but the "sympathisers" seem not to have come off with flying colours on that occasion. Patterson, the convicted blasphemer of Holywell-street, was present, and reduced them to a dilemma, by pointing out his own sufferings under British law for the cause of true—blasphemy. Dr. Kalley's blasphemies against the Catholic faith were, we doubt not, just as offensive to Portuguese ears as the Holywell-street blasphemies were to the eyes of our Protestant religionists. Why quarrel, gentlemen of the north, about a mere question of degree? The line must be drawn somewhere, and we cannot blame the authorities of Madeira very violently for not hitting the exact line marked out by our Westminster Hall jurisprudence. If a line is drawn anywhere, the main point must be to draw it between right and wrong; and in this respect the reluctant punishers of Dr. Kalley do not seem to have erred very grievously.

As a sort of set-off to the Madeira business, we beg to call attention to the following extract from a recent minute issued by the Free Church to illustrate the present freedom of religion in Scotland:—

In some cases proprietors of land have refused sites for building places of worship for that part of the population who have avowed their attachment to the principles of the Free Church; that in other cases, servants and other dependents have been dismissed from their situations and thrown on the wide world, on no other ground than that they have seen it their duty to leave the Establishment; that the cottagers in some parishes have been warned, at their peril, not to shelter, even for a night, under their humble roofs, the ministers who have left their manse for conscience's sake; and that, in one instance, an interdict has been applied for to prevent a minister from preaching on a certain estate, or on the sides of the roads and highways that pass through it.—Tablet

ITALY.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE POPE.—A letter from Rome of the 27th ult., says—"A report has probably reached you of an attempt to assassinate the Pope. The fact is, that a physician, who is a great revolutionist, but driven to desperation by want of money, went one day to the palace, and, although he had a wooden leg, entered as nimbly as if it was his own house. Being met and asked who he wanted, he replied that he wished to speak to his Holiness on very urgent affairs. With much difficulty he was induced to withdraw. On reaching the court he fired a pistol, without its being perceived that it was he who caused the explosion. The next day he returned again, and went on until he met Cagetanino, the Pontiff's valet, of whom he insisted on being immediately allowed to see the Pope on matters of high interest. His entrance was, however, again refused, and he went away, but he was arrested on leaving the palace. A loaded pistol was found upon him."—Hurkaru, Dec. 20.

MISCELLANEA.

DURHAM—THE CATHEDRAL IN 1843—Thanks to the change in public feeling, the spirit of Puseyism has even found its way into Durham's venerable Cathedral. The clerical robes of Venerable Bede, of holy bishops, of many sainted ecclesiastics (whose bones have mouldered beneath this noble specimen of Catholic architecture since the eleventh and twelfth century), until very recently were in charge of the door-keeper, and but little attention was paid to them. Now, however, those very interesting mementos of the illustrious dead have been, for better custody, removed to the Library, where they can only be seen by special leave. Over the spot in which, as it is contended by the Cathedral authorities, lie the remains of St. Cuthbert, is only placed a common flagstone. Report states that shortly some better memorial, some sepulchral monument, will be placed on the ground whereon formerly stood the magnificent shrine of Holy St. Cuthbert. The seven altars are now daily used by the students of the university for public prayers. The north end of the cathedral, where lie interred the relics of Venerable Bede and several of the early Bishops of Durham, has been recently put up for public service on the Sunday evening. The rude, savage, and barbarous spirit of fanaticism which has so long disgraced England, has left the marks of its fell spirit within the walls of this beautiful temple. Some of the pillars, of which the marble had been covered with a sort of composition by our early Reformers, have recently been removed, and their beauty restored. Glancing around the monuments, and comparing the modern with the ancient, it is impossible not to be struck with the truth of Dr. Wiseman's reproach of such erections, that "most Protestant monuments are more fitting a heathen temple than a Christian sanctuary—nothing to carry the mind of the spectator from time to eternity, from earth to heaven." This also is, we hope, in the way of amendment.

JERSEY—WHAT ENGLAND WANTS.—Extract from a sermon by the Rev. J. Cunningham:—"In order that it may be as stable as it is powerful, that England may be as happy as she is great, there needs, I think, but this; that religious strife, the fruitfulness source of national weakness and disorder should cease, and then, worshipping as their Fathers worshipped; those Fathers, the artificers of all that is glorious in our boasted constitution; the English people, snatched from beneath the hoofs of prideful wealth, would again present the spectacle of a free, brave, cheerful, contented people, such a spectacle as they presented to the world during the old days of Catholicity, when although not possessed of a thousandth part of the aggregate wealth which now surrounds, but to mock them—the voice of destitution was unheard in all the 'merrie' land; when wealth bore the charges of the State and of the Church, and labour enjoyed without molestation the fruits of a healthy and cheerful industry. That this happy 'olden time' may again return to bless the country; that it may be extricated from the abyss of vice and want into which it has fallen, is a blessing I earnestly invoke, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and the Holy Ghost, Amen."

CONVENT OF OUR LADY OF MERCY, MOUNT VERNON-STREET.—We have had much satisfaction in learning that the religious sisters, for whom the convent in Mount Vernon-street has been erected, have arrived in Liverpool, in the course of the present week, and that they will shortly enter upon the exercise of their charitable and laborious duties. From what we understand, the object of these ladies is to devote themselves entirely to the service of the poor. For this purpose they will open a school for the education and religious instruction of poor female children; they will visit the poor in sickness and distress, and administer, as far as lies in their power, both to their corporal and spiritual wants; they will also open an asylum for the protection of females of good character, whose virtue may be exposed to ruin by their being unprotected and unprovided for. The support of the religious sisters themselves is secured by the dowries which they bring with them on entering the order. But the extent to which the charitable objects to which they have devoted their lives will be carried, must depend upon the resources which are placed at their disposal by others. We sincerely congratulate our fellow-townsmen on the establishment of an institution so truly noble and Christian, and we trust that the heroic and chivalrous example of these young ladies, in devoting their lives to the exercise of the most sacred of Christian virtues, will stimulate others to furnish them with ample means of doing good.—Liverpool Journal.

MONASTIC ORDER IN KERRY.—On Thursday, the 24th inst., the Rev. B. O'Connor, P. P., the Rev. J. Buckley, the Rev. G. Roche, and the truly pious and zealous prior of the establishment (Mr. Townsend), repaired to the beautiful and eligible site of the monastery, so kindly given by Sir W. Godfrey, and performed the imposing ceremony of laying the foundation.—Ibid.

THE REV MR. KENNY.—The removal of the Rev. Mr. Kenny from Outerard to the parish of Oranmore, has created very general feelings of sorrow in this parish, where he has been resident for the last three years and a half; employed in the exercise of the purest piety and zeal, and practices of the most Christian virtues, blended with an ardent love of country, which have elicited the least fallible approbation in the great love they bore to him, and the universal feelings of regret which his voluntary departure has excited.—Galway Vindicator.

THE REV P. O'BRIEN DAVERN.—The Catholic curate of Knockavella and Doneskea, in the county of Tipperary—the talented, the eloquent, the almost superhuman mind, whose great faculties were ever exercised in behalf of suffering humanity, and in opposition direct, positive, and unflinching to the enemies of the human race—the biographer of the outcasts of Lord Howarden—poor Father Davern, late of Knockany parish, breathed his last—resigned his pure spirit into the hands of Him who has created and called him—on the night of Wednesday, the 30th ult.—Correspondent of the Freeman.

HAYDN AND MOZART.—Haydn was a rigid Catholic. It is a fact not generally known, that he hesitated to come to England on account of the national heresy. Apart from this, however, he liked the English so well, that he left the country with regret. To judge from his conduct towards his great rival and contemporary, Mozart, he was a singular example of the absence of jealousy of his brother artists. Mozart was to have come to England the year after Haydn's visit. At a dinner at which both were present, which took place during the negotiations, Haydn said, "I must go first—nobody will listen to Haydn after Mozart;" and unluckily, it was so determined. Had Mozart come to England at this time, his life might have been preserved, at least for some years, for the fear of destitution, which preying on his mind, as his biographers tell us, was the main cause of his death, would have been removed. The public here, at least, would not have suffered such a man to go to his grave for want of the means of subsistence. Although twin stars of modern music, Haydn and Mozart differed widely in some things. Haydn was a man of great animal spirits, and a practical joker—Mozart was a very martyr to dejection. Mozart was a Catholic by education, but seems to have troubled himself but little with the formulæ and ceremonies of his Church. Haydn, on the contrary, was a great and professed devotee: Lestrade, one of his English friends, says, that he wished to be thought a religious character rather than a musician. We have his own confession, that his rosary was a never-failing source of inspiration to him. Mr. Novello, who has seen most of the scores of his great works, says, that, secular as well as sacred, they are invariably scrawled on the back with the words Laus Deo, Gratias a Deo and the like expressions. Mozart's household deity appears to have been the boy-god, Cupid.—Musical Times.

THE CATHOLIC MISSIONARY COLLEGE OF ALL HALLOWS, DRUMCONDRA.—We are much gratified to find that there are already thirty-nine students in this college preparing for the foreign missions; eight for Madras, two for Calcutta, one for Agra, three for Australia, one for the Cape of Good Hope, four for Demerara, four for Trinidad, four for Indiana, in North America; one for New York, ditto; one for Boston, ditto; five for Scotland; and the others for places not named to us. The establishment is as yet only in its infancy. The directors are, however, commissioned by the bishops of the dioceses before-named, and by other bishops of various parts of the world, to select and educate young ecclesiastics for their respective missions; so that, from the encouragement which this admirable establishment is receiving from the bishops of the foreign missions, we may calculate that ere long this will become one of the most powerful means in the hands of Divine Providence to diffuse and sustain our holy faith throughout the world, and that Ireland will shortly again merit the name which she so long before retained—the Island of Saints.

CONFIRMATION.—On Tuesday last, the Right Rev. Dr. Egan, Lord Bishop of this diocese, arrived in Killorglin, on his triennial visitation, where he administered the sacrament of Confirmation to 1,369 persons, and afterwards in a most impressive address, exhorted such as had violated their pledge by cordial drinking, to renew it, and we are glad to find it had the desired effect. About 500 young persons of those confirmed received the pledge on the occasion, at the hands of the Rev. Mr. O'Leary, P. P., of Castleisland, who attended his lordship on his visitation.—Kerry Examiner.

REV. J. CARTER.—Died, on the 26th ult., in the 54th year of his age, the Rev. John Carter, who, for upwards of eighteen years, was parish priest of Donoughmore, near this town. He was buried on Monday, in the grave-yard attached to Bar Chapel, which was erected chiefly through his exertions, and his funeral obsequies were performed by the Right Rev. Dr. Blake, assisted by several of the Catholic clergy of the dioceses of Dromore and Armagh.—Requiescat in pace.—Newry Examiner.

THE NEW REFORMATION IN SCOTLAND.

If it be true that every house and kingdom divided against itself shall be laid waste, it will not be thought rash in us to prophesy the speedy dissolution of the Scotch Kirk. Indeed we fear, that taking for true, the newspaper reports of the new reformation movements in Scotland, during the last few months, we shall have little chance of passing for prophets, even should our predictions be verified to the letter; and perhaps at this moment, we mistake the process of decomposition which follows death, for the convulsive symptoms of departing life. We propose to leave our readers to judge of this matter from the words of the Edinburgh Correspondent of the Englishman, and beg leave to refer them for the extracts we shall make from that Journal, to its issue of the 26th instant.

We are given to understand, that the Non-intrusion or free Church party who are the Scotch reformers of the 19th century, teach and believe —“that all who belong to it (the unreformed Kirk) or attend worship in it, are little better than Heathens, in a state of open rebellion against the Headship of Christ, and enemies to what they call the free preaching of the gospel,”—and, “that they consider the killing of the opponents of Free Church to be a religious duty.” In the new reformed Catechism, a Non-intrusionist is defined—a very good man, and a Moderate, or unreformed Calvinist, a very bad man, so that they are as opposed to each other as light is to darkness. The Free Church reformers say that they are themselves, the two witnesses mentioned in the Apocalypse, from whose mouth fire proceedeth to destroy their enemies, and lest this application of Scripture should go for nothing among the Moderates, one of the reforming Free Church preachers took for his text on Sunday the 27th of August last, immediately after an assault on one of the opponents of the Free Church by a rabble, the following words from the Book of Exodus—“And he said unto them, thus saith the Lord God of Israel, put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate, throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbour.”

This man is surely John Knox redivivus: thus it was that he stimulated the Scottish Israelites of the 16th century by the authority of Scripture to avert from themselves the anger of Jehovah, by taking away the life of the unfortunate Mary, their unhappy Queen and Sovereign, and to destroy by the fire of their mouths (by the edge of the claymore) the adherents of the old religion. The language and violence of these new Scottish reformers, and the daily results of their proceedings so much resemble the harangues and the events that signalized the reformation movement of the 16th century, that the most inattentive Protestant is provoked to ask—“what did Scotland gain in pure religion by the reformation of John Knox?” Have the moderates or modern Presbyterians relapsed into the belief and practice of the Catholic religion, or is it necessary, in the principles of Protestantism, to have a reformation every now and then, and one on a large scale, every 300 years, for the honor and glory of God and the prosperity of his Kingdom on earth? Is it quite certain, in the principles of Protestantism, that the Church of Christ (founded on a rock) will fall back into Heathenism every 300 years, and that the sword or claymore must be periodically unsheathed to reform it according to the views of the last John Knox?

The religion of Mahomed was propagated by the sword, but the religion of Christ triumphed every where by the arms of patient suffering, meek zeal and humble prayer, and when an Apostle, through mistaken zeal, drew the sword in defence of his Divine Master to save him from suffering, he was told to put back his sword into its sheath, for all who take up the sword shall perish by it. (Matthew 26, 52.) What wonder therefore that every attempted reformation of Christ's religion which cannot be reformed by man, is sought to be accomplished by the sword; and de facto, in every country in Europe where Protestantism has been established, the sword made way for its introduction, whereas these same nations were all converted by the Catholic Church from Heathenism without the aid of secular power, and it is to be hoped they will become Catholic again through the same agency that effected their first conversion.

Many of the contradictions and hollow boasts of Protestantism are brought into prominent notice by the late efforts made to reform the Kirk of Scotland. For the last 200 or 300 years, every reformed pulpit was made to echo, Sunday after Sunday, the blessings and the light which the reformation had poured on every Protestant land, as well as the lamentations of reformed charity over the lot of certain mortals, called Catholics, to whom the Bible was denied in order to keep them in ignorance of religious truth. But what is the fact in reformed Scotland on Protestant authority, or rather on the authority of public events passing before our eyes?

The nation is maddened into barbarism by Calvinism; and religious knowledge and Christian charity have forsaken the land. One half the people are persuaded they would be doing a service to God by killing the other half for religion's sake, and a multitude can be found, on a signal given them, to force open a public jail in the face of the Magistrates, for the liberation of a drunken virago (dairy maid to one of their preachers) and to follow her, as their leader, in an assault on the opponents of the new-reformation movement. They are miserably deficient, the most of them, in even the rudiments of education. In the parish of Lockbroom there are stated to be 1496 persons who can read but imperfectly, while 3710 can neither read nor write. In Fairbrook parish not above one in ten of the whole population is able to read or write English, and in 1833 there were 1773 persons above six years of age could not read at all. At that date there were some old people alive who could remember the time when there were more than two Bibles in the Parish.

As this, ye ministers of the Kirk in India, and return home to scatter Bibles among your own poor unenlightened countrymen and to teach them at least the rudiments of a useful education. The soul of a Scotchman ought to be as dear to you as that of an East Indian, and you say that unless they have the Bible and can judge for themselves, they shall all perish alike. Why do you travel over land and sea to make a proselyte, and leave the order of charity by taking more concern for strangers than for the household of your own faith. In the present state of things a convert to the divided Kirk should divide himself, in order to be a Kirkman according to the unanimous definition of Kirkmen.

Who can contrast the divisions, the variations, and reformations of reformation, which have agitated England and Scotland since the 16th century, and particularly within the last few years, with the stateliness, the unity, the solidity, and undying sameness of the Catholic edifice, whose pinnacle shooting heavenwards from the hills of Rome, out tops the clouds and overlooks the earth in peace, secure from the commotions of the contrary winds of doctrine, without being persuaded, that our holy Church is the ark of salvation, and that if it is the work of Noah, God himself superintended the building and watches over its preservation. Ravens have gone out from it, and perished in the troubled waters of error which cover the earth; but the doves that escaped from its windows, are returning by the same passage, after having sought in vain a resting place elsewhere. The following are the extracts from the Edinburgh Correspondent of the Englishman to which we referred.

Edinburgh, October 28, 1843.

* * * * * In a good many of these Highland parishes, the pulpits and pews of the establishment are almost entirely deserted, and in several of them, the communion of the sacrament has not been celebrated since the disruption in May. The natives have been impregnated by their out-going ministers with an insuperable aversion to the Parish Kirk. They have been made to believe that all who belong to it, or attend worship in it, are little better than heathens, in a state of open rebellion against the headship of Christ, and enemies to what they call the free preaching of the Gospel. With sentiments like these rankling in their bosoms, it is not surprising that an ignorant, and simple-minded, and withal superstitious people like the Ross-shire Highlanders, should have broken out into acts of violence in attempting to resist the settlement of ministers in the vacated Parishes. In their eyes the new presentee was a hireling, wanting only the stipend, and not the true shepherd that careth for the flock. He was an Erastian or mere Court of Session minister, who came there without any warrant from Christ, or call from the people: He was in fact the man whom they had been taught, as a Christian duty, not only to eschew all communication with, but to expel from the district, as the money-changers and sellers of doves were driven from the temple of Jerusalem.

Accordingly, at Ross-keen, Resolis, Logie, and some other Parishes in Eastern Ross, where the Presbyters were proceeding in the usual way to settle the new incumbents, they were set upon by large mobs of men and women, armed with stones, sticks, shearing hooks, &c., who took possession of the Church yard, locked the Church door, and dared any one to enter for the performance of a ceremony which they hold to be a desecrating of the sacred place, an act of intrusion perpetrated against their will, and the sovereign authority of the Lord Jesus Christ. In the struggle, various persons, including Lady Ross, and some of the law officers and the local authorities were struck and severely injured. The Presbytery were completely deformed, and obliged to go through the ceremony of induction at a safe distance in the neighbourhood. To celebrate their lawless triumph the rioters set the Church bell a-ringing; and pushed their fanatical outrages to such an extent as to march in open day to the town of Tain, where in the face of the magistrates they broke open the jail and carried off a female prisoner who acted as ring-leader at one of the riots. The civil authorities in the disturbed district found themselves quite unable to cope with the exasperated mobs, even when assisted by the coast guard; but on application to the Lord Advocate, some detachments of troops were despatched, and their timely interposition had the effect of putting an immediate and entire stop to the riots. And lucky it was that they were checked in the bud: for it is quite understood, that the Free Churchmen had resolved to oppose every settlement in the county; which unquestionably would have led to serious destruction of property, as well as bloodshed and the loss of life. They had all their plans arranged for acting on an organised system. Signal boats were ready to be stationed on the Firth at different points to convey intelligence, and in case of being overpowered or pursued, they had provided retreats in the woods and among the hills where some of the rioters have betaken themselves to since the arrival of the military.

* * * * * That they were bent upon murder, and that they consider the killing of the opponents of the Free Church to be a religious duty, are facts placed beyond dispute by the conduct of the rioters. Lady Ross's life was in imminent peril, and she only escaped by the fleetness of her horses. It is a lamentable display of fanaticism, that this beautiful and amiable lady, remarkable for her unwearied charities should have been set upon by an infuriated mob, for no other reason than her wishing to be present in her own Parish Church, at the ordination of her Parish minister. Some of those poor persons whom she had visited with her kindness only the preceding day, were found among her dastardly assailants. Another intended victim was Mr. Ross of Cabrossie, who was waylaid by some hundreds of vagabonds and contrived to elude their vengeance, by sending a person disguised on horse back to learn the spot where they were waiting to seize and put him to death. Mr. Mackenzie, the new minister of Logie, was obliged to wander all night in the plantations, as the rioters were in pursuit of him, and would have taken his life had he not outstripped his pursuers, by making his way first to Tain, and afterwards to Lochbroom. So bent were these infatuated people on bloodshed, that an aged Dame in the crowd when a gentleman advised her to go home as she could attack nobody, replied, "it was true she was a frail old woman, but she had no doubt strength would be given her!" Another party of rioters when they could get at their victim no other way, proceeded to unroof his house, and when the poor man's daughter with a child in her arms remonstrated, they told her "that all who would not be on the side of Christ would be murdered!"

Such perversion of religious feeling as this, it is hardly possible to discover even in the deepest reign of ignorance and superstition. The deluded peasantry in Eastern Ross unhesitatingly declare they regard the outrages in which they have been engaged as "the work of God;" done in obedience to his will, as the Jews of old were commanded to exterminate the Amalekites and other tribes who opposed their taking possession of the land of Promise. It is worthy of notice, however, that the rioters were not of the lowest classes, for whom the excuse of ignorance might be pleaded. They consisted chiefly of small tenants with their cottars, their families and farm servants. It is scarcely necessary to add that they all belong to the Free Church. The leaders of the party, no doubt ashamed of excesses, tried to make it out that their adherents had nothing to do with them. But the fact was too flagrant to admit of dispute: Numbers of them were known to belong to the congregations of the seceding ministers, some of them elders; and the drunken virago who was forcibly liberated from the jail of Tain is said to be dairymaid to Mr. Sage, the Non-intrusion minister of Resolis.

* * The counties of Ross and Sutherland have, been distinguished for their fanaticism from a very early period. Two hundred years ago, the inhabitants attached themselves to the bootied and spurred apostles of the solemn league and covenant, which they carried through the country, forcing the lieges to sign it at the point of the sword, and in open rebellion to the king. During the persecution under Charles II. they furnished a fair quota of martyrs, and the names of many of their clergymen figured in the list of ejected ministers. Mr. Mackgilligen of Fodderty, Fraser of Brae, Hogg of Kilteam, Ross of Kincardine, &c. were among the state prisoners, in the Brass-rock, for holding conventicles, and their memory is still fragrant in the annals of the persecuted Church of Scotland. In more recent times their pious enthusiasm was with difficulty restrained within the bounds of moderation. In 1829, when the Catholic Relief Bill was passed, it was no easy matter to keep them quiet, and the wag of a minister's finger would have sent them down claymore in hand to disperse the British Parliament for betraying the crown-rights of the Redeemer and setting up Anti-Christ on his throne.

Two years ago they were agitated with the fanaticism of revivals or religious meetings, like those in America, which kept them in a state of excited frenzy night and day. In the parish of Lochcaran, the late minister introduced the practice of causing the people to deliver their sentiments on religion, publicly at fellowship meetings, and the consequence was that many of them showed a wonderful facility in talking upon such subjects, but their knowledge was very superficial, and though they were familiar with the words and phrases of theological disputation, it was found they attached no definite ideas to them. The revivals of 1840 were particularly enthusiastic in the parishes of Urquhart, Tain, Eddistoun, Logie-Easter, Kibrarier, Alness, Kirkmichael, &c., where sermons and prayer meetings were held in the churches almost every day in the week.

The effect of all this on the minds of an illiterate and imaginative people may readily be conceived. For it is a deplorable truth that although they have enjoyed the advantage of evangelical preaching as the Non-intrusionists reckon theirs, for more than a century and a half, they are miserably deficient in even the rudiments of education. In the parish of Lochbroom, one of the most zealously attached to the Free Church, there are stated to be 1496 persons who can read but imperfectly, while 3710 can neither read nor write. In Gairbick parish, not above one in ten of the whole population is able to read or write in English, and in 1833, there were 1773 persons above six years of age who could not read at all. At that date there were some old people alive who could remember the time when there was only one, or at most two bibles in the parish, besides the minister's. * *

In many well-attested cases the sacred duties of the pulpit have been wofully prostituted, to excite and influence the minds of the people against the adherents of the established Church. I have seen a communication from a gentleman resident on the spot, who gives some examples of the manner in which the out-going ministers were endeavouring to instigate their flocks to commit violence on their opponents. The late clergyman of Kincardine, immediately after the first assault made on Donald McGregor, the Parish Presentor or Clerk, who was cruelly abused on the timber mare, chose for his text on Sabbath August 27th, a verse in Exodus (c. xxxi. v. 27.) "And he said unto them, thus saith the Lord God of Israel, put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbour." Another Clergyman in that quarter has often been prophesying this season, that in three and a half years, they (the seceding ministers) should be back to their Churches, for they are the two witnesses mentioned in the 11th chapter of the book of Revelations, of whom it is said they stand before the God of the earth, and if any man hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth and devoureth their enemies!! The same Reverend prophet has been in the habit of visiting the Parish schools in Rosskeen, and putting such questions as the following to the little boys and girls.

"What is a moderate?" and "what is a Non-intrusionist?" The children of course had been previously taught to call a Moderate a very bad man, and a Non-intrusionist a very good man! and this gave the Catechist a fitting opportunity for reviling his opponents, and praising himself and his party. * * * * *

CONVERSION.—We are informed on good authority that a Scotchman, a Presbyterian, applied to His Grace, the Archbishop, on Tuesday last to be received into the Church, he having read on the subject of Religion for some time and was quite satisfied of the truth of Catholicity.

TE DEUM.—We are requested to state that the Te Deum will be sung at the Durrumtollah Church at 5 o'clock P. M., and at the Cathedral and St. Thomas' Church after vespers tomorrow evening, Sunday, being the last day of the year.

ST. THOMAS CHURCH.—Henceforward there will be two Masses on Sunday's at St. Thomas' Church—the first will begin at 6½ and the second at 7½ A. M.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE AND H. M. 10TH REGIMENT.

We have learnt with delight that at Mass on Christmas day in Fort William the Catholic Soldiers of H. M. 10th Regt. made a collection for our Orphanage that amounted to 102 Co.'s Rs. Such a subscription from 500 Soldiers would be deemed surprising any where but amongst Irish Catholics, who have made such liberal acts of charity common amongst them. It is only two months since they raised a subscription of 479 Co.'s Rs. for the same noble object; and from the time they entered the Fort to the present day, they could not have contributed less than 1400 Co.'s Rs. for the support of the Orphans, besides 400 Co.'s Rs. more for the Chapel expenses, the Propagation of the Faith and other charitable purposes. Generosity like this which cannot be exercised, but with great sacrifice of comforts and self-abnegation, reflects as much honour upon them, as it casts censure upon us. May God bless them, and give us the spirit to imitate them! We congratulate His Grace, our Venerated Archbishop, on the firmness and stability of his Orphan Institution, which few would have had the courage to begin without Government assistance; for though the monthly expenses of it amount, we understand, to 800 Co.'s Rs. yet it cannot but continue to flourish, based as it is on the charity which warms the breasts of poor Irish Catholics.

BOW BAZAR SCHOOLS.—We understand that the Boy's School hitherto kept in the Bow Bazar is to be opened on the 8th January on the ground floor of the priest's house in Durruntollah, and the Girl's School is to be opened on the same day in the house No 56, lately occupied by Mr. Cooper in the Bow Bazar.

APPOINTMENT OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF GOA.

We extract the following from the Madras Catholic Expositor of the present Month:—

We have great pleasure in laying before our readers the following extract of a letter from Rome to the address of His Grace, the Most Rev. Archbishop V. A. B. of Malabar. The appointment to which this document refers was previously announced in the public journals, but in too vague a manner to give general satisfaction; however as it appears in an authentic form, it will doubtless prove interesting to every well-wisher of the Catholic cause in India.

Extratto d'una lettera della Sacra Congregazione di Propaganda All' Illmo e Rmo Monsignor Francesco Saverio di S. Anna Arcivescovo di Sardia, Vicario Aplico del Malabar.

Illmo e Rmo Signore.

Non lascio di assicurarla sull'affare di Goa, che la nomina del novello Arcivescovo di Goa è stata fatta legittimamente di concerto con Mgr. Incaricato di Sua Santità, con beneplacito della Santa Sede, approvata da Sua Santità, che fece, non è guari, spedire all' Eletto Prelato le Bolle Pontificie. Ha fatto poi conoscere particolarmente il Santo Padre all' Arcivescovo, che la sua giurisdizione non si estende alle Regioni, e Popolazioni confidate ai Suoi Vicarii Apostolici; raccomandandogli l'osservanza dei noti Brevi Pontifici a questo riguardo, ne si ha luogo di dubitare della piena Sommissione e deferenza dell' Arcivescovo al Supremo Gerarca. Tali positive notizie la gioveranno per ismentire le dicerie dei dissidenti, e turbolenti Ecclesiastici, e per ogni sua norma. Prego quindi il Signore che lungamente La conservi, e La prosperi.

Roma della Propaganda 12 Agosto 1843.

Extract of a letter from the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda to his Grace the Most Illustrious and Most Reverend Francis Xavier of St. Anne, Archbishop of Sardia, Vicar Apostolic of Malabar. Most Illustrious and Most Rev. Sir,

I do not omit assuring you concerning the affair of Goa that the nomination of the new Archbishop of Goa has been legitimately in concert with his Lordship the charge d'affaires of His Holiness, with the beneplacet of the Holy See, and that it has been approved of by His Holiness, who not long since, caused the Pontifical Bulls to be despatched to the Prelate elect. His Holiness has also made known, in particular, to the Archbishop, that his jurisdiction does not extend to the regions and people confided to his Vicars Apostolic, recommending to him the observance of the well known Pontifical Briefs on this subject, nor is there room to doubt of the full submission and deference of the Archbishop to the Supreme Pontiff. This positive information will assist you to contradict the assertions of the dissenting and turbulent Ecclesiastics, and for your entire Government.

Finally I pray God to preserve you long and to prosper you.

Your Grace's

Most affectionate Servant,

Sd. { J. PH. CARD. FRANSONI, Pref.
JOHN BRUNELLI, Secretary.

Rome from the Propaganda, 12th August, 1843.

Thus then the long widowed church of Goa has been at length provided for. We congratulate the Catholics of that city and its dependencies on this auspicious event, the forerunner, we trust, of innumerable blessings to that portion of the vineyard over which His Grace is called to preside. From the above letter we are happy to find, that His Holiness has every confidence in the full and entire submission of this illustrious Prelate to His Apostolic decrees. We have therefore every reason to hope that his zeal and piety will be directed to the destruction of Schism throughout India, and that moved by his admonitions and example those who have hitherto resisted the authority of the Holy See will return to the unity of the Church.

The following extract of a letter from Dr. Olliffe, V. G. of Bengal, which appeared in the Madras Circular of Nov. 10th, deserves a place here. It supplies us with the name of the Archbishop elect—and with other important information.

"Matters have been so far arranged with Portugal that the Patriarch of Lisbon (in the consistory of the 19th June) has been made Cardinal, a new Archbishop has been appointed for Goa in the person of Father Silva de Torres, a Benedictine, who has made his profession of faith in the hands of the Nuncio, at Lisbon, and a Bishop has also been named for Macao, viz. Padre Borgia. But the Brief "MULTA PRÆCLARE" remains unaltered."

The letter of the Sacred Congregation informs us that His Grace's jurisdiction does not extend to the regions and people confided to the Pope's Vicar's Apostolic, and that the Holy Father has recommended to him the observance of the well known Pontifical Briefs on this subject, the principal of which is unquestionably "MULTA PRÆCLARE"—wherein express mention is made of Melimpore, Cranganore, Cochin, and Malacca, and the Apostolic letter "ETSI SANCTA," concerning the erection of the Archbishopric of Goa, is derogated, so that the Archbishop of Goa cannot in future exercise any jurisdiction whatsoever, even worthy of special mention, in those countries. In the extract from Dr. O.'s letter, it is expressly stated that the Brief "MULTA PRÆCLARE" remains unaltered. Hence it is evident that His Grace was appointed by the Holy See upon condition that these Briefs, so long disregarded, should be inviolably and faithfully observed; to that condition the crown of Portugal has consented, by taking part in and approving of the appointment, and by so doing has received and acknowledged those Briefs. It does not appear whether any efforts were made to obtain either a revocation of those documents or at least some modification of their provisions. To us it seems not only possible, but also most probable that there was no attempt made on the part of her Most Faithful Majesty to regain her influence respecting Ecclesiastical affairs in British Territory, but that the will of His Holiness on this head was at once acceded to, particularly as there is little doubt that the obstacles to a reconciliation were to be found not in India, but in Portugal itself. If so, the boasted rights of that Crown have been easily surrendered, and it looks very like an acknowledgment, that said rights had long since ceased to exist, and that all who rested on them were grossly mistaken in the line of conduct they pursued. But perhaps the Portuguese Ministry attempted something; perhaps they even urged the appointment of Bishops to Malacca, Cranganore and Cochin, and also (of Don Antonio) to St. Thomé; yet no such appointments have taken place—and why? because the Brief “MULTA PRÆCLARE” remains unaltered; His Holiness would not consent to any thing else; the authority of his Vicars Apostolic must be maintained, respected, and acknowledged by all who wish to live and die his children and members of the Holy Catholic Church, of which He alone is the Supreme visible Head. It is worthy of remark, that Portuguese India has been provided for, that Pastors have been given, under the exercise of the right of patronage, to Goa and Macao, whilst the Dioceses mentioned in the Brief “MULTA PRÆCLARE” have been overlooked, nay even whilst in regard to them it has been agreed, as is evident from the terms of His Grace’s appointment, that the said Brief should be observed by him, and that it should remain unaltered.

This being the case, we beg most respectfully to submit, first, that Portugal has formally accepted the said Brief “MULTA PRÆCLARE,” (with the others referred to in the extract of Card. Fransoni’s letter, and which his Grace was recommended to observe,) thereby renouncing all claim to the right of patronage, and to any interference whatsoever in Ecclesiastical affairs in British Territory; and hence there can be no shadow of excuse for further opposition to the authority of the Vicars Apostolic—and secondly, that it has accepted them, not merely from the date of his Grace’s appointment, but from the beginning, from their publication, thereby acknowledging their intrinsic validity and authority and the consequent obligation of all to submit to them without reference to the temporal power.

Under these circumstances we put it to those who have hitherto refused submission to the Vicars Apostolic, whether they will still persist. It has been rumoured that such is the determination of some; that they will accept his Grace’s patronage, if they can have it on their own terms; but that if, as the Holy See expects, he take part with the Vicars Apostolic, they will have nothing to do with him. How far this may be true, time will most probably tell us. They certainly promised, that if Portugal consented, they would freely and cheerfully acknowledge the Vicars Apostolic; that condition is now verified, let the promise be fulfilled.

Portugal, as we have already said, has not only consented to those briefs, but acknowledged them from their very date, thereby confessing, that they were binding, from the very outset, on all concerned and consequently that those who refused submission, under plea of maintaining the rights of that Crown, are answerable before God for the consequences of their resistance. This is nothing more than what we have ever maintained, and we are happy to find that Portugal has at length subscribed to our opinion. Notwithstanding all that has been already said on this subject, we feel assured that many have been led astray, rather through ignorance, than through malice; we therefore request the serious attention of our readers to the following considerations.

According to Catholic doctrine, Our Holy Father the Pope is the Vicar of Christ upon earth, to whom, in the person of St. Peter, was given full power to feed, rule, and govern the Universal Church, both Pastors and people. It is admitted by all that no one can limit, alter, or do away with authority once conferred, unless either the party who conferred it, or his successor in office, or a person superior to both. As then Christ, who gave his authority to the visible Head of His Church, has neither superior, nor successor, but is a priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedek, it follows that he alone can set bounds thereunto or destroy it altogether. But has he done so? we confidently answer in the negative. If we look to Scripture as interpreted by the infallible authority of the Catholic Church, we find our Divine Redeemer pledged to give unto Peter and his successors the most ample powers—even “the keys of the kingdom of heaven” that whatsoever he should bind on earth should be bound in Heaven, and whatsoever he should loose on earth should be loosed in Heaven. If we look to tradition, we meet with the most convincing proof the same truth, not a word about limitation or diminution of authority, St. Peter and his successors have received full powers for the government of the Universal Church. And if so, has not our present Venerable Pontiff the same plenitude of authority as was enjoyed by St. Peter, Paul V. or any other of his predecessors. Paul V. who had full power to make whatever arrangements he liked for the government of each and every portion of the Church, independently of Portugal or any another temporal power, agreed to a certain Concordat he had equal powers to revoke it the next day, if he pleased, and to make a different arrangement, and although he might perhaps personally be considered as acting badly towards the other party, were he to change his mind so suddenly, and without reason; yet the act would have been perfectly valid, (having emanated from the plenitude of Apostolic authority,) and binding in conscience on all concerned. What that Ven. Pontiff could have done, had it so pleased him, Gregory XVI. has done; yet his power has been questioned, and his authority despised, because forsooth, Paul V. made a Concordat with Portugal, and thereby restricted the Papal power in himself and his successors! Who ever heard of such a principle? There is a great difference between the position of authority and its exercise. The one depends on the giver, the other on the receiver. Thus for instance the Governor’s authority is given him by act of Parliament; whilst he is Governor, every iota of authority is so vested in him, that he cannot deprive himself of it, much less limit it in himself or his successors. But as to the time and manner of exercising it, and whether he should exercise it fully or only in part, that is left to himself, unless where the law may specially provide. Let us suppose, that he makes a written Concordat with one of his friends, giving him the patronage of a certain situation, would that Concordat be so binding on himself and his successors that neither he nor they could fill up the place without reference thereto? Certainly not. The question is not how far he would be personally justified in disregarding the agreement, but whether an appointment made independently thereof would be valid. Undoubtedly it would be perfectly valid; nor would the agreement be a proof of the contrary as the law under which he acted, limited not his power. Let us apply the case. The Pope's authority is given him by God; and so long as he is Pope, every iota of that authority is so vested in him, that he cannot deprive himself of it, much less limit it in himself or his successors. As to the time and manner of exercising it, and whether he should exercise it fully, or only in part, that is left to himself. It is a fact that a Concordat was made by Paul V. of happy memory, giving the Crown of Portugal the patronage of certain Dioceses; but was that Concordat so binding on himself and his successors, that neither he nor they could provide for the government of those places without reference thereto, and in a different manner? Certainly not. The question is not how far His Holiness would be justified personally, before God, in honour and conscience, in disregarding the Concordat, but whether appointments made independently thereof would be valid. Undoubtedly they are perfectly valid; nor can the Concordat be urged as a proof of the contrary, since Christ, as the Council of Florence has defined, gave St. Peter and his successors full power to feed, rule and govern the Universal church. It is not our business to enquire whether Portugal was treated well or not, in this case, or to question the motives which actuated his Holiness; for these let him answer to God, he is personally as liable to err and sin as any one else. We have seen that he has the power to decree as he did; the Briefs were therefore valid from the beginning, and it was our business to submit cheerfully to his will. This has not been done by many, and Schism and dissension were the melancholy consequence. It is not however too late to remedy the evil. Let those who have hitherto resisted return now to their duty, the Father of the Faith will receive them with open arms, and heaven will rejoice at their conversion.

We have now said enough in vindication of the validity and authority of the Briefs under which British India has been confided to the Vicars Apostolic. In only remains for us to examine the Concordat, and to enquire into its conditions, and their observance by the contracting parties. To this we will devote a few pages of our next number, hoping by this means, to undeceive those who have hitherto strayed from the paths of unity and peace, and to restore them to the bosom of that Church to which, at baptism, they promised eternal obedience.

DEATH OF THE REVEREND EUGENE SHEIL.

It is our painful duty to announce the demise of this young and pious Ecclesiastic, which melancholy event took place at the Cathedral Presbytery on Wednesday, the 1st November, at 10 o'clock P. M., at the early age of 25 years and 7 months.—Abandoning home and country, and friends for the sake of Christ, he accompanied our venerated Bishop to Madras, and received at his Lordship's hands the holy order of Priesthood on the 11th March last. The talents which he displayed, both in his preparation for the sacred ministry and in the exercise of its important duties, and the zeal with which he labored for the salvation of souls, inspired all who knew him with a hope, that he was destined to do great things in the vineyard of the Lord. It has however pleased Divine Providence to ordain otherwise, to his sacred will it behoves us cheerfully to submit. Scarcely had he entered on his sacerdotal career, when the symptoms of Consumption, the fatal disease of which he died, began to appear. Though somewhat ailing, he assisted as Sub-deacon at the Pontifical High Mass and Procession on the Festival of Corpus Christi. This was the last solemn function in which he took part. Within the last fortnight the decline set in with fearful rapidity, and it was deemed advisable to administer the last rites of Religion on the 1st November. These he received with sentiments of truly Christian piety. On the image of our crucified Redeemer being presented to him, a few moments before his death, he shed it most devoutly, and gave vent, by tears, to his feelings of confidence in Jesus with which he was animated. To Mary, the immaculate Mother of God, to SS. Francis Xavier and Aloysius in company, he also addressed himself, imploring their intercession with God for him. At length, amidst the prayers of the Church, he calmly delivered himself into the hands of his Creator, and we have every confidence that "he is numbered among the children of God, and that his lot is with the Saints." (Wisdom V. 5.)

The mortal remains of this lamented Clergyman, after having been clothed in the Sacred vestments, were removed privately on the following morning to the Cathedral, where from an early hour, the Divine office was recited for his eternal repose by the Clergy, Monks and Students, who relieved each other throughout the day. The solemn office and High Mass of All Souls was also performed in presence of the body. At 6½ P. M., the funeral service commenced, our venerable Bishop reciting the De profundis as the Ritual prescribes. The procession then moved in the following order, first the cross bearer and Acolytes, next the Monks, Students and choir, two and two, chanting the Miserere, then the Rev. Fathers Michael and Lourenzo, of Royapuram, the Right Rev. Bishop of Castoria, V. A. Madras and Meliapore, supported on the right by the Rev. Thomas Mac Auliffe D. D. as Deacon, and on the left by the Rev. Aloysius Gallo, as Sub-deacon, and last the body, borne by the Rev. Messrs. Mitchell, Gannon, Murphy, Carry, Balma, and Griffa, and followed by an immense concourse of the community of Madras, assembled to pay last tribute to departed worth. Indeed, if we except the occasion of our Venerable Bishop's arrival among us, we have never witnessed a more numerous assemblage at the Cathedral. On the return of the procession, the Bishop sprinkled the coffin at the gate with holy water, and the choir chanted the subvenite. His Lordship having arrived at the bier recited the Non intres, the Libera with the prescribed versicles and prayer were next chanted; the procession again moved in the same order, the choir chanting the Suscepit te Christus to the grave, prepared within the Sanctuary of the B. V. Mary of the Rosary, where the rest of the Burial Service was celebrated, and the corpse consigned to the earth, amidst the tears of many and the regret of all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance.

We must not omit to notice the kindness of a few friends, who came forward unsolicited, and provided candles to be distributed among the Congregation assembled at the Funeral. We beg to thank them for their timely provision, which the gentlemen at the Cathedral would, in their affliction, have forgotten, but which, whilst it added so much to the solemnity of the Sacred yet melancholy scene, afforded at the same time proof of the respect and affection entertained by the Catholics of Madras for their Clergy, and of their eagerness not only to co-operate with them, but even to anticipate their wishes for the advancement of Religion and the decorum of Catholic worship.

It now only remains for us to recommend this departed minister of the Sanctuary to the prayers of our Catholic Brethren. May he receive from his Divine Master the reward of all his labours, and be admitted into that kingdom of eternal glory prepared for him from the foundation of the world.—Madras Catholic Expositor.

DEATH OF THE REV. MR. DESCHAMPS.

Copy of a letter from the Hon. and Rev. W. Clifford to the Right Rev. Bishop of Castoria, V. A. of Madras and Meliapore.

MY LORD,—On my arrival here yesterday from Madura, where, as I before mentioned, I had been staying a few days, I was shocked to hear news for which I was totally unprepared, the addition of another to the many losses we have this year sustained among our brother missionaries. It has pleased Almighty God to call to himself, at the very outset of his career, our dear Father Deschamps, who had the honour of your Lordship's acquaintance last August at Madras, where he and his religious brethren were so hospitably entertained by your Lordship on their way hither. This amiable and estimable clergyman died of fever after a short illness last Monday. He was born 22d July, 1810, joined our Society in 1840, and reached Bombay last July. He had however been priest for some years, during five of which, previous to entering our Society, he had been Cure in the diocese of Besancon. Here he gave every promise of rendering great service to religion, and his progress in acquiring the language was surprising. But other were the designs of Heaven, to whose kind Providence we humbly resign ourselves, still persuaded, that, notwithstanding these trials, which have come so thick and heavy on us these last few months, our Heavenly Father will not abandon those who have no other hope but in his fostering care and guidance. Certain of your Lordship's sympathy with our affliction, allow me to recommend our dear Father, whose loss we most sincerely and deeply deplore, to the prayers and holy sacrifices of your Lordship and Clergy, and to renew my assurances of the esteem and respect with which I have the honor to be, your Lordship's obedient humble servant in Christ.

DEATH OF THE REV. MESSRS. DURANQUET AND PERRIN.

Copy of a letter from the Hon. and Rev. W. Clifford to the Right Rev. Bishop of Castoria, V. A. of Madras and Meliapore.

MY LORD,

Soon indeed again have I to resume my sad task of announcing still further losses among my fellow missionaries. The cholera is raging here most violently, and never perhaps have its victims been swept away so hastily as at present. Among these we have to lament two of our religious brethren, Fathers Duranquet and Perrin. The latter was one of the companions of Father Deschamps when he passed by Madras on his way hither last August, and your Lordship will forgive me if I repeat over their graves "quomodo in vita sua dilexerunt se, ita et in morte non sunt separati," words which would apply with equal truth to F. F. Duranquet and Garnier. There was the friendship of the first, and between them existed that union of heart and soul, which death itself does not sever but binds more closely, uniting them for ever, never to part again, where grief and pain shall be no more. Fr. Perrin was in his 30th year, entered our Society in 1842, and, as I have remarked, had only just arrived in the country. Fr. Duranquet was one of the four first who had entered upon this mission in 1837, and of these four Fr. Bertrand alone is now left us. Like Fr. Perrin, Fr. Duranquet was hurried away after a very few hours illness and gave his soul to God on the 8th inst. at Strivegomdaur near Pallamcottah. Fr. Perrin passed as we hope to a better world on the eve of the festival of our angelical St. Stanislaus, who seems to have wished he should celebrate his feast with him in heaven. Fr. Duranquet entered our Society in 1826 and was in the 39th year of his age. Excuse these hurried lines, and with every assurance of esteem and respect allow me to recommend our departed brethren to the prayers of your Lordship, clergy, and congregation, begging all to unite with us in praying our Heavenly Pastor to guard his flock, to save and spare his people who have no other hope in those days of death and pestilence but in his mercy and compassion, and believe me to remain your Lordship's obedient humble servant in Christ.

SITUATION OF IRELAND.

VII. ARTICLE.

Fourth period continued—1778 to 1800.

In 1775 the English colonies in North America declared themselves independent. At first the mother country took little care of what was considered as a rash undertaking, but when the royal troops were beaten by the insurgents, after Burgoyne was made a prisoner in the camp of Saragota by General Gates, when, in addition to a formidable insurrection, England had to fight against the conjoined forces of France, Spain and Holland, there was some alarm entertained. England might well fear that insurrection might become contagious; Ireland, up to that time governed as a conquered country, might have followed the example of those colonies that were rising in arms, protesting against the imposition of a tax: it therefore became of consequence to obviate the temptation; concessions were therefore the order of the day. The rigour of the penal laws was relaxed; Catholics were declared capable of possessing and of enjoying property on the same conditions almost as Protestants. The older statutes had limited to thirty years the maximum of the duration of leases; at this time they were permitted to have leases of nine hundred and ninety nine years. It was acknowledging an inherent right of very extended possession, without yet conceding the entire right of property. They abolished (1778) that barbarous law, which deprived the Catholic father of his authority to transmit it to the son that had declared himself a Protestant. The law of succession was so far modified as that children, remaining faithful to the religion of the family, were no longer disinherited to the profit of him who had adjured it.

It was a very narrow breach made in that edifice of iniquity which fanaticism and hatred had raised in Ireland; yet this insufficient reform excited a storm against the ministry which had dared to propose it with the view of escaping the imminent danger of a separation. The Orange party, the Holy League of Protestantism, stirred up popular passions, and soon after a violent insurrection broke out in London. The houses of Catholics were plundered and demolished. Protestant associations were formed in various parts of the Kingdom: their object was to prevent the dangers that threatened the reform. All the good Protestants were invited to join against the invasions of Popery.

At the head of this movement was the son of a Duke, Lord George Gordon, a bold and venturesome man (1). On the 2d June 1780 he came with his partisans to the gate of Westminster Hall, to present a petition to the effect, that the concessions made to Catholics should be withdrawn. A volley of musketry announced their arrival; they forced every member of the house they met to cry with them "Down with Popery!" and made them swear to vote for the abrogation of the bill of 1778. Lord George demanded that the petition should be read and discussed while they then were sitting. At the time when Parliament was thus coerced in the very hall of its deliberations, the mob spread into the streets, repeated its outrages against the houses of the Catholics, and in particular against the Residence of Sir George Saville, who had made the motion for the bill of 1778. Government had infinite trouble in checking the outbreak, and the execution of nineteen of the principal leaders could hardly bring about an apparent and temporary tranquility.

The war with America became meanwhile more and more serious, and difficulties on the side of Europe increased daily. Washington and his Lieutenants were defeating the generals sent to restore the authority of the mother-country; the combined fleets of Holland, Spain, and France were driving the trade of England before them, and humbled the flag of her Admiral even in the Channel itself. It had been found indispensable to recall from Ireland the troops which had been kept there to force the country beneath the yoke. In this extreme crisis the British Government was again driven to be moderate by policy as well as by necessity. The laws prohibited the possession by Catholics of arms and ammunition: these were granted or given to them; they were advised to guard their coast, they were promised that they would never more see actively exercised the privilege by which Protestants till then, had been alone considered worthy of carrying a musket or handling a sword. The reform of 1778 was completed by permitting Catholics purchase lands without restriction. They were authorized to open schools of their religion, a price ceased to be set upon the heads of their teachers, the laws regarding their clergy were lenified, the Habeas Corpus act was promulgated; and last, and not the least, the Government allowed to pass without censure some recent acts of the Irish legislature which taking advantage of circumstances, had rendered itself independent (1782) of the English parliament (2).

In the main, all these reforms were as much for the advantage of Protestants as of Catholics. Thus, it is certain that in admitting the latter to the tenancy, that is to the temporary possession of lands, the income of the Protestant proprietors in Ireland was greatly increased; thus also, by granting them the right of purchasing and possessing lands on their own account, a considerable over-tune was given to immovable property, as is the case in all countries where land property is sought after and is sure to find constant purchasers. Therefore every one was a gainer by the new regime. The permanent interests of Ireland were in this case exactly concordant with general principles of right, setting aside the consideration of those large resources which England derived from Ireland, and which enabled her to brave the dangers of the actual crisis.

But such is the blindness of passion, or rather such is the strength of antipathy, that those reforms advantageous as they were to the cause of England, were accomplished but with reluctance and regret. They yielded to the necessities of a somewhat desperate situation, but there was no conviction that what was doing was good, and in petto a hope was entertained of cancelling at some distant period the concessions extorted by circumstances. Meanwhile as much only was granted as was impossible to be refused.

In 1792 the Catholic Irish, on account of the services they had rendered, to the English Government, fancied that the time had come for them to claim their portion of political rights. They therefore prepared a petition, demanding that the legal professions should be opened to them, and also that they should be admitted to the electoral franchise. The two points were peremptorily denied them; but soon after events happened that ground down the opposition of those most averse to concessions. The French republican armies were every where victorious: it became again necessary to look to Ireland for assistance, and what had been haughtily refused in 1792, was spontaneously offered in 1793, yet with some restrictions.

The Bar was opened to Catholics; they were then allowed to become pleading advocates, but not King's advocates: they became attorneys, and solicitors, and were eligible to corporations; they were admitted on the grand jury; they even obtained commissions as justices of the peace. In the army they could attain the rank of colonel; at last the elective franchise was granted them, that is, they were admitted to vote for the election of members of parliament, but they were not permitted to elect a man of their own religion.

However, notwithstanding all the changes that in some measure were taking place in the relations of the two people, distrust remained the same on either part. If England maintained a secret after-thirst of hostile intention at the very moment that she was affecting philanthropic cordiality, Ireland on her part, was feeling no deep gratitude for the ameliorations granted to her. On either side they entertained a mutual detestation, although some apparent symptoms of reconciliation existed. The former country was as heartily determined to throw away the mask of conciliation which circumstances had forced her to take up, as the latter laboured unwillingly under the idea of being indebted for any thing to a power which she took a sort of pleasure in hating. There are situations where one is vexed to see that some apparently good actions seem to destroy our motives and our very right to nourish ill-will towards people for whom one feels a deep antipathy. Such was in reality the situation of the Irish Catholics with regard to the English Government. They were not reconciled to it by the measures of reparation which had successively been voted; their presentiment was that this pacific mood would last just so long as the fear which had caused it existed, and this explains why the Irish so easily were seduced at the end of the last century, by the visionary perspective of complete and irrevocable separation from England. The French republic had promised to assist them in this attempt; they rose en masse organised a Directoire like that which then ruled over France, and, had they been supported more efficiently, no doubt the separation would have been achieved, at least for a time. One may read in the memoirs of Wolf Tone and others the interesting details of this period of the history of Ireland.

The consequences of this rebellion were that England at once resumed her old system of absolute and merciless domination. The suppression of the Irish Parliament was in contemplation, and on the 2d July, 1800 was proclaimed that Union of which the Irish are now more than ever the determined opponents.—Calcutta Star, November 30.

REVIEW.

Notes on the Ministry of Cardinal B. Pacca, Secretary of State to His Holiness Pope Pius VII. Translated from the Italian of Cardinal Pacca. Dublin: Cumming. London: Dolman. 1843.

This book will do something to fill up the want that has often been remarked in English literature of works treating on the all-important ecclesiastical affairs of Rome and Europe in the early part of the present century; when Infidelity towered aloft in admitted supremacy; when the "Italian old man" was scoffed at and derided; when the temporal dominion of the Pope was ravished away; when

(2) Our next article will be entirely devoted to a summary of the proceeding of the Irish parliament, which now so earnestly wishes to have re-established.

Popeedom itself seemed for a time extinct—the either being vacant, or the holder of it shut out all communication with both his spiritual and temporal subjects. Such an epoch is, indeed, of high and deep interest to every faithful son of the Church; nay, it should be of high interest to every one, whether of the Church or not of it. A French writer complains bitterly of Napoleon, that he “a reality” a great man, he “wrapped his reality in tinsel and mummery;” “apostatized from his old faith in facts, took to believing in semblances, and strove to connect himself with Austrian dynasties, Popeoms, and the old false Feudalities which he once saw clearly to be false.” What an unfortunate man this poor Napoleon—this creature of a day—must have been to degrade himself by connecting himself with such poor, weak “Chimeras” as Popeoms and Catholicisms and Concordats! He, the mighty Emperor, the lord of invincible legions, the creator of kingdoms, the deposer of monarchs, the remodeller of vanquished Europe—he, this man connect himself with a weak, old, Italian exile! What a futility! What an insanity, judging according to the world and its notions! But, indeed, it is in this very thing that we are forced to acknowledge the shallow judgment of the modern writer, and the half-true and penetrating judgment of Napoleon. If we were asked to point out the circumstance which displays most clearly Napoleon’s intuitive genius, we should refer to this very circumstance which the anti-Catholic derides. Putting down half-worn-out insurrections by artillery, gaining battles, conquering empires, are, comparatively, vulgar exploits, achieved in a vulgar direction. This was the course marked out for him in the opinion of the world; this was the direction in which every man’s understanding, even the shallowest, heralded him on to a common and ordinary greatness. But when, with eagle eye, he looked back into the past, seeking to find in it some element of permanence and stability, and discerned it not in anything that was saluted by the applauses of the world, the sound of trumpets and drums, the roar of artillery, and the waving of banners, but in a poor, weak, despised old man, whom all the world had been despising, and ridiculing, and execrating, and longing to get destroyed and abolished—then, indeed, all the clever, little, vulgar men exclaimed that he was losing his head and mistaking his position; and of his consecration and coronation at Notre Dame, a Marshal of the Empire could exclaim “that nothing was wanting to complete the pomp of it but the half-million of men who had died to put an end to all that!” So said Augereau at the time; and we rather wonder to find this exceedingly small saying repeated with acceptance forty years afterwards. Of a truth, the “half a million of men who have died to put an end to all that,” have died in a rotten cause. They have gone to their account; to answer why it was they threw away their lives “to put an end to all that;” but “all that” lives still with an immortal life, and though seeming dead when it amazed men to find a Napoleon patronizing it, it has outlived his life, and his dynasty, and another dynasty; and is now, amidst many elements of disorganization in France, the most powerful thing now alive there; is, indeed, the only vital organic thing there extant.

How this thing so strangely vital, was able, in its utmost feebleness, to struggle with the imperial mightiness of Napoleon, and to tire it out, watching patiently till his downfall, this volume shows us in a very interesting and instructive manner. The book itself is too well known (though as yet untranslated) to need much detailed analysis, but we shall make a few extracts, to show those of our readers to whom the book may be unknown the value which attaches to it. The following description will be read with interest of

ROME DURING THE FRENCH OCCUPATION.

I at all times inculcated to them in my despatches to watch over the preservation of the peace and tranquility of the people, and I therefore forbade in the year of my ministry, bull-fights, fireworks, and different fairs outside the city of Rome. I forbade several solemn processions, and chiefly those at night, and I took all the precautions possible to repress, at Assisium, all tumult at the feast of the Porziuncula, and to prevent a great concourse of people, whence generally strifes and fights arise, which might be the beginning of greater disorders. I did the same in Rome, and the good people of that capital, during the whole time of the imprisonment of the pope (notwithstanding the daily tyrannical vexations given by command of the French military to the pontiff and the Sacred College), maintained an attitude and a conduct really admirable, keeping themselves as much as possible at a distance from the French, to evince their affection to the Government, without, however, showing any want of civility or offering any insult, and blindly obeying not only the orders, but even the wishes of the pope; a conduct ascribed by many to the special protection of the blessed Virgin, to whom the Romans pay a particular devotion, and which tended much to preserve the honour of the pontifical government unstained; a conduct, in fine, which filled strangers then residing in Rome with astonishment, as well as those who in distant countries heard the true and faithful account from people of their own nation. A Russian nobleman, who was in Rome at that time, said one day with bitterness, that he delighted at being in the capital to witness so rare a phenomenon: that there were in Rome two governments one opposed to the other: one, having at command the troops, the police, the citadel and prisons; in fine, all the means to make themselves obeyed, to make regulations and give orders to which nobody listened, and in the execution of which it was necessary always to employ force; the other government, on the contrary, deprived of all these means, and of the armed force, shut up in a palace, in reality a prison, surrounded by troops of the enemy, still, by means of short manuscript notifications, acquainted the public with its wishes, and remark, that whatever she commanded was on the instant voluntarily executed. Beautiful and consoling proof, that even without numerous and expensive troops, and often an insecure police, there are means for a government to make itself respected and obeyed. This admirable conduct of the good Roman people in these calamitous times, deserves to be handed down to the latest posterity.

One lesson, very forcibly inculcated by many parts of this volume, is the immense value to the Holy See of a bold unyielding policy in all times, whether times of crisis or not. This lesson, applicable to our times as strongly as to those of the preceding generation, is recognized in the fullest manner by this admirable cardinal, who leaves it as a legacy to us from his own troubles and imprisonment.

On the announcement of the violent expulsion from Rome of the two popes, Pius VI. and VII., nations became enraged, and the good complained but no remonstrance, no voice issued from the thrones of the Catholic princes in favour of these sacred and august personages. Providence permitted this, to confirm more and more the Divine lecture given to the popes and ministers of the Church, often repeated in the sacred Scripture, not to repose their trust in the princes of the earth; and to render it palpable, and give evident proof, even to the unbeliever, that all happy events befalling the Holy See and the Church, proceed directly from the supreme dispositions of Providence. Too much, alas! had this Divine counsel been sinned against at Rome for many years; and what was afterwards the reward thereof? Throwing a veil over the events of a more ancient date, which prudence suggests should be passed over in silence, what happened with the French Government in the pontificate of Pius VII., suffices as a proof of this. Every decree, I will not say even every request of Napoleon Buonaparte, first consul, afterwards emperor, became at once law for Rome. The same pontiff allowed himself to be persuaded that he had found a protector and a friend in that man; but when locked up in a carriage, surrounded by gendarmes, we were carried off to France like two malefactors, he then held a very different language.

Our readers will be amused with the following unsophisticated.

SPECULATIONS ON POPES.

I continued my journey, and arrived at Annle-bourgh, where we passed the night. The arrival of the pope was already known in Savoy, and his passage by the post road, whence the whole population was in movement, and a crowd was collected in the country through which he was to pass. Seeing three carriages, and one of them with the arms of the pope, they all ran, thinking they saw him; one knelt, another cried, and all implored his blessing. We told them that the pope was to pass the next day, and they did not believe what we told them. In one part of Savoy, and if I remember rightly it was at Modana, whilst we were changing horses at the post house, a crowd of people collected round my carriage, and began to question whether or no I was the pope. One said, "He is the pope, and I saw him plainly the time he passed before, and I recognise his countenance." Another answered, "No, it is not he; I saw him also the last time, and he was older than the person who is now in the carriage," pointing me out. A third added, "Most certainly it is not the pope; see, he is dressed like a cardinal." The first answered, "They have dressed him like a cardinal, in order that he may not be recognised." During this debate, a venerable old man came out of an adjoining house, made his way through the crowd, and came up to the carriage. All then looked on, and, listening attentively, stood in silence. The old man looked at me, and then turning to the bystanders, "This," says he, "is not the pope, because the popes wear beards." This good man had seen in some house the portrait of some one of the pontiffs of the gone-by ages, and was not aware that the popes had changed the customs of their illustrious predecessors in other things less frivolous than this.

A great deal of needless cant has been and still is often uttered about the harsh treatment received by Napoleon at the hands of England. If any one is infected with this cant, the best remedy for the disease is to read in this volume the treatment to which Napoleon, in the height of his prosperity, subjected two old men, both priests, one the deposed possessor of the oldest throne in Christendom—the Pope;—the other a Cardinal and secretary of State.

NAPOLÉON'S INHUMANITY TO THE POPE.

All the following winter, and in the spring of 1812, the holy father was left tranquil in his prison at Savona, Napoleon having then turned all his thoughts to the so celebrated, and to him fatal expedition to Russia. But the evening of the 9th of June, towards seven o'clock, the pope suddenly received orders to prepare to return to France, and having made him change those clothes which might cause him to be recognized on the road, he was forced to leave towards ten o'clock in the morning. After a long and painful journey, in the hottest part of the day, he arrived at a very late hour of the night at the hospice of the Cistercian monks, at Mons Cenis.

They took Monsignore Bertazzoli up into the pope's carriage at Stupinigi, in the neighbourhood of Turin, and he from that day never left his side. The holy father fell alarmingly ill at the hospice, to such a degree that the officers who escorted him thought it their duty to forward the news to the Government at Turin, and to ask for instructions if they ought to remain there, or continue their journey. The answer given them was to execute whatever orders they had received; whence, though the pope had on the morning of the 14th received the holy viaticum, he was forced to begin his journey again the following night, and to continue it night and day until the morning of the 20th, when he arrived at Fontainebleau. He never left his carriage the whole of the road, and when he required any food or repose, his carriage (as already mentioned) was driven into the court-yard of the post-house in the least populous towns. The porter at the imperial place of Fontainebleau having no orders, as yet, from the minister at Paris could not admit him, and he was brought to a house of his, not far distant from the palace. A few hours afterwards the order came to admit the holy father into the palace, where some of the emperor's ministers came from the capital to pay their compliments to him.

This brutal conduct to a dying old man is well matched by the reception of Cardinal Pacca in his three years' prison at Fenestrelles.

I had scarcely entered my room, than I ran instantly to the window to observe if I should have even the benefit of the fine view, if it were possible in this horrid prison, but I found that it looked upon a flight of steps in the interior of the fortress, and had in front a high wall, which in fact excluded all view. I went to the other window of the room, and saw a very high Alpine mountain, the Aberjan, of which the summit only was visible; and in several places the snow was to be seen in the summer season, which I left still master of the field in the same place, after three years and a half's imprisonment. The apartment in which I passed almost all that time, was on the ground floor; the roof was cracked and rent in several places, from the shocks of an earth-quake of the year before; the walls, black and smoked, resembled those of kitchens and blacksmiths' shops, and from the flooring to the height of the cornice, the walls were covered which disgusting remains of those dirty writings, which Monsignore Giovanni della Casca forbids even the mention of. The flooring was composed of boards, half rotten, covered with dirt, and fit only to be, as they were, the receptacle of mice. I found no other furniture in the room than what I had hired at first, at my own expense, consisting of a bed, four old broken cane-bottomed chairs, and a wooden table, roughly made, exactly like a shoemaker's bench. Whatever I saw around me, and what I had heard from the commandant on my first arrival in the fortress, caused a terror in my mind which increased when I saw that my servant did not return from the village where he had remained with my clothes. The thought of being left alone, totally abandoned, in the hands of the governor, excited other painful ideas in my mind, upon which I had recourse to the means of consolation which religion administers, and recited some devout prayers on my knees. On a sudden my mind became serene, and a short time after my faithful servant returned, and I had the assurance that he was to remain with me. The Major Jumas, who inhabited the fort, came in the evening to visit me and learn if I wanted anything, and how I found myself. Having thanked him for his attention to me, I told him that being a priest and also an archbishop wished to say mass in the chapel of the fortress, which I considered certainly would not be denied me; and I begged him to have a priest brought by the commandant, as a confessor many days having elapsed since my last confession. The major answered me, that he believed there would be no difficulty with the commandant as to the celebration of mass, but that it appeared difficult that a confessor should be assigned to me after the strict orders from the government not to permit any one to speak to me. "But you can," said he, say mass when you wish." I replied, "I have not the good fortune of being without sin, and if a confessor is not allowed me, I must, to my great regret, abstain from celebrating mass." He then concluded by saying he would report my request to the commandant, and afterwards give me the answer.

The wind, which rose that night, produced immediately a great cold in the atmosphere, unusual at this season, and made a great impression on me, not being well provided with winter clothing. I wished to make a fire in the grate, but was obliged to put it out immediately, from the great smoke which filled the room, and nearly took away my breath; and was forced to close the opening of the chimney, because the wind shook and threw down the few articles of furniture I had.

To these sufferings of the body were added the afflictions of the mind. I had the night before asked for some book to occupy my time, and distract me a little, and was sent a volume of Voltaire by an officer. I heard a bell ring in the corridor in front of my room, and learnt that a priest, a prisoner, was going to say mass in the chapel. I immediately desired my servant to ask Major Jumas if I could go with the other prisoners to hear it. He sent me word that he had not had any instruction from the commandant on this point; that he would ask, and let me have an answer for my satisfaction the next day. This rigorous conduct began to tire me, and was, indeed, extraordinary towards a cardinal archbishop. He asks for a confessor, and the answer is, that it cannot be granted; he asks for a book, and they send him a volume of Voltaire; he expresses the desire of hearing mass, and does not obtain the permission, and is even answered that they will ask instructions, whether they shall grant it or not in future. How could one not be stung to the quick at such harsh treatment?

Everything appeared directed to take away that comfort which religion only can administer under such painful circumstances. I held my tongue, and suffered with patience, "hoping the good, and tolerating the evil." The commandant came to pay me a visit with Major Gazan, and I instantly introduced the subject of the mass and confessor, praying him to comply with my request on these two important points. He answered me that he would give orders to the gaoler to come and let me know in the morning, when mass was to be celebrated, and to accompany me to the chapel, but that it was not in his power to grant me a confessor, from the express order given to him by the Government not to allow me to speak with any one whomsoever.

But, enough of this. We conclude with a characteristic anecdote of Cardinal Maury, which does something towards settling any doubts that may have existed as to this personage's character. We do not recollect having met it before.

CARDINAL MAURY.

This worthy ecclesiastic found the means one day of entering my room, and we held a long conversation on the religious affairs of France. He talked much about the Cardinal Maury, and I remember well what was said about this member of our body. Towards the end of our conversation, I said to him, "Signor Hannon, I have heard great eulogiums of a panegyric in praise of St. Vincent of Paul, composed many years since by the Abbé, now Cardinal Maury. I am persuaded you must have heard it; it is really a masterpiece of sacred eloquence." To which he replied, "Yes, your eminence, that praise may be given it." "Why then, did not Maury publish it, as he has his other literary productions?" "I suspect," he added, "your eminence, that he has not done so, nor will he at any time, that he may not be given the lie as to a fact he states." "What does this mean?" I answered. "Know," said he, "that we, the community of St. Lazarus, were surprised on hearing a fact stated in that panegyric, which is not mentioned in the life of the saint, nor in any of the memories preserved by us. We, consequently, ask the Abbé Maury where he had found so important a fact of the saint's life, which was unknown to us all. He answered, he had found and extracted it from the proceedings of his canonization. We, who had the originals, made researches, and could not find it. It is, therefore, to be suspected that he had invented it; and talking of Cardinal Maury, I will mention a curious anecdote. We had the custom at the convent of St. Lazarus, of inviting the preacher to dinner with us, and acquainted him, at the same time, that he might bring with him any other confidential friends. The Abbé Maury accepted the invitation, and brought three literary friends to dinner that day, belonging to the Academy, and noted in Paris for their incredulity and the irreligious writings they had published. Your eminence may well imagine that this was highly displeasing to the whole community, and some of our oldest members would not appear in the refectory, refusing to sit at the same table with these pretended philosophers.

We conclude with recommending this volume to our readers, merely adding that this is a translation from the original edition, unpruned by the scissors of the censors. The consequence is that the names of persons in authority are given in every instance. The translator closes his short preface by informing us "that whatever trifling sum may accrue after the expenses of the publisher are paid, will be handed over for the benefit of that excellent institution established and conducted by the Sisters of Charity, the Hospital of St. Vincent, Stephen's Green, Dublin, where patients are admitted and attended without religious distinction."—Tablet, Sept. 2.

FATHER MATHEW'S BIRTH-DAY.

The Middleton Temperance Society, on the evening of the 10th instant, in commemoration of Father Mathew's birth-day, had their room brilliantly illuminated; the band played several enlivening airs, and 150 persons sat down to tea.

On the anniversary of the birth of the Very Rev. T. Mathew, the members of the Bee Club illuminated their room, in conjunction with the other societies in the city.—Limerick Reporter.

On the anniversary of Father Mathew's birth-day, a soiree was given at the Castle Street Temperance Hall in the evening, to do honour to the name of that distinguished clergyman. The rooms were brilliantly illuminated on the occasion, and no fewer than three hundred persons sat down to tea, which was prepared in a manner that did credit to the worthy president and stewards.—Tralee Examiner.

On the anniversary birth-day of the Apostle of Temperance, the members of the Church Street Temperance Society, Killearney, attended an evening tea-party in their rooms, the windows of which were illuminated and tastefully decorated.

Tuesday evening week, the birth-day of the Apostle of Temperance, was celebrated with great joy and festivity by the members of the various temperance societies of Cork, who were most anxious to take this occasion to testify their gratitude and veneration towards their beloved president. Upwards of forty temperance-rooms were illuminated; many of them were ornamented with excellently executed and appropriate devices, temperances, &c., and had a most enlivening effect. The bazaar on Sullivan's Quay was most brilliant illuminated with a gigantic star, and decorated with a profusion of variegated lamps, and wreaths and flowers. Several other places were so illuminated. Bonfires were lighted, bands played the streets and the greatest hilarity prevailed.—Examiner.

MISCELLANEA.

ANGLO-AMERICAN DOCTRINE.—Bishop Doane and the members of the Cross insist that Dr. Pusey has not gone beyond the limits of Anglican doctrine on this point, which is, likewise, that of genuine Catholics in America. Unfortunately he has advanced far enough for us to claim him as one of our own.—Catholic Herald.

ORDINATION.—On the 26th ult. there was an ordination in the cathedral, and the order of priesthood conferred on the Rev. Mr. Hughes, by his Grace the Most Rev. Dr. M'Hale, archbishop of Tuam.—Tuam Herald.

CLONFERT.—On Tuesday, the 29th ult., the Right Rev. Dr. Coen, Bishop of Clonfert, terminated his triennial visitation for the present year. His lordship, after visiting the parishes of Ballinasloe, Toughon-a-Connell, Clontuskert, Kilconnell, Fohana, Ballymacward, Capatagal, and New Inn, has administered the Holy Sacrament of Confirmation to 1,645 males, and 1,907 females; total, 3,552. In each of those chapels which his lordship visited there was a sermon preached in English by each parish priest, or his officiating curate, on the nature and dispositions necessary for the worthy reception of the Sacrament of Confirmation. His lordship subsequently, on each occasion, exhorted in Irish, in order to give a full explanation of that holy Sacrament to all such postulants as were about to receive it from his hands. He detailed the virtues which they should practise, in order that the seven-fold gifts of the Holy Ghost might dwell in their souls. He also repeatedly expressed much satisfaction at the manner in which the postulants answered the different questions put to them on the leading principles of their holy religion. The reverend bishop seemed rather surprised at beholding such vast numbers of persons presenting themselves for Confirmation—he having divided his diocese into three districts, in order to afford an opportunity in each parish every third year for complying with that sacred obligation. His lordship and a great number of his clergy who assisted him on those occasions, were entertained at dinner on each day by each respective parish priest. Truly callous, indeed, to every feeling of piety, and to every sense of religion must the heart be which warms not after beholding the holy and indefatigable zeal of such a prelate, in imparting to such a portion of his beloved flock the seven-fold gifts of the Holy Ghost.

ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.—The subscriptions received by the Irish Central Committee, in Dublin, for the month ending Monday last, amounted to the sum of 534l.

The Rev. Jas. M'Kenna, the zealous pastor of Rathbrum, has distributed 120 copies of the Catholic Bible just published in Dublin, as recommended by all the Catholic bishops of Ireland to those under their jurisdiction, and by the Very Rev. T. Mathew to the members of the various Temperance societies throughout Ireland, England, and Scotland.

DUMFRIES.—CATHOLIC SCHOOL.—A building which promises to be the most handsome in town, is now in progress in Shakespeare's-street—a school house adjoining the Catholic chapel. It will contain two large rooms, one above, and the other below, for boys and girls; and the whole will be surmounted by an elegant tower fifty feet high. We understand that the original plan was sketched out by Mr. Maxwell, of Ferniglass. There has been a school in connection with St. Andrew's Catholic Chapel here for many years; but hitherto instruction has been in a temporary school room.—Dumfries Courier.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1843.

THURSDAY, JUNE 22.

The Star has some speculations upon the probability of Lord Ellenborough's returning home. His Lordship will of course throw up the Government as soon as the confidence of his own party slackens. They have had enough to do to defend his measures already; and if a great outcry be raised about Scinde and the Ministry are put to their shifts to defend this measure, they may intimate to His Lordship that they cannot spare any more time for the continual defence of his plans. Lord Ellenborough has spirit enough to relinquish his post the moment the Duke and Sir Robert are tired of him. There is this difference between the connection of the present and the late Governor General with the reigning Ministry; that whereas those measures of Lord Ellenborough which his friends have been required to defend, originated with him, the Afghan war originated as much in Downing Street as it did at Simlah. Indeed there is said to be evidence that the first idea of this war in Asia sprang from Lord Palmerston's indisposition to plunge into a European war in order to curb the ambition of Russia.

We are happy to learn from the Star that the Assam Tea Company have obtained a remission of the Three per Cent. export duty charged on their tea.

The Bombay Times couples the burning of the Thomas Grenville, which was not accidental, with the burning of no fewer than five Bombay ships last year, which could not have been all accidental. The Editor affirms that this is the first of a series of vessels which have been already doomed. The offenders are in every case the crew, who having received six months advance, find it their interest to set the ship on fire and enjoy the money at home. Would it not be possible to establish a strict Registry office for Native seamen, and to make it a part of their engagement that the advance should be refunded if the ship was burnt. To secure a complete remedy nothing can certainly be wanting on the part of the merchants and commanders at Bombay, but a determination to put down the practise. An oriental apathy pervades all classes of society in India, which is most unfavourable to the removal of evils.

Mr. Montriau, a Barrister of the Supreme Court, has been appointed to the vacant Magistracy. In accepting it he relinquishes all private practise; the gain in this case therefore is more on the side of the public than of the Barrister. The appointment has given general satisfaction. It is much to be wished that the allowances of the Magistrates and of the Commissioners of the Court of Requests in Calcutta could be raised to a greater equality with corresponding appointments held by the Covenanted. This would enable Government always to secure the services of gentlemen at the bar; which would be a most decided improvement.

FRIDAY, JUNE 23.

A case of some importance has just been decided in the Court of the 24-Pergunnahs. Mr. Imhoff, who was attending the Court of Requests as plaintiff, was seized on coming out of it, by the Sheriff, on a writ issued from the 24-Pergunnahs. An application was made to the Judge for his release grounded upon two Constructions of Sudder Court.

The Judge said that it was only defendants and witnesses, who being compelled to attend the Court were exempted from arrest, cumdo, marando et redeundo and refused the request; but he advised the petitioner to appeal from his order to the Sudder, whose decision would be final - whether satisfactory or not.

The papers state that Mr. C. Tucker, now one of the Judges of Sudder Dewanny Court, has been appointed provisional member of Council, and will succeed on Mr. Bird's vacating his seat on the 11th of October. It was generally understood that the race lay between Mr. Tucker and Mr. Millett, the former of whom has the advantage over the latter of eleven years of additional service. Sir W. Casement's retirement in less than a year will create a second vacancy, which will probably fall to the lot either of Mr. George Clerk or Mr. Millett.

The Hindoostan has thirty five passengers already registered for the August trip. We hope the suggestions of the passengers will be listened to, and such alterations made in the accommodations as shall suit the climate. Four more trips are advertised for November, December, February and March. The December and March voyages are expected to be performed by the Bentlinck, the twin of the Hindoostan, as she is called, though born a twelvemonth after her. The Bentlinck is expected here in November.

The Englishman states on the authority of a correspondent at Benares, that there were five persons locked up in an insane hospital, and that one of them strangled two of his companions.

SATURDAY, JUNE 24.

The Hurkaru mentions 'a rumour, which has an aspect of credibility,' that the Tenasserim Steamer will be employed in conveying Mr. Bird and Sir W. Casement to Suez in October. The rumour is we think entirely without foundation. The necessity for employing a Government Steamer in keeping up the directed monthly communication between Calcutta and Suez will diminish in the approaching cold season by the arrival of the Bentlinck. The orders of the Court against the measure are understood to be absolute. Mr. Bird will be able to avail himself of the Hindoostan in November.

We are happy to learn from the Star, that the quarantine between England and Egypt has been reduced from 21 days to 16. As the days employed in the voyage will be counted in the period of quarantine, there will be scarcely any detention in England, except when the Steamer reaches it in less than sixteen days. It is somewhat singular, that while such strict precautions are observed in reference to the voyage from Egypt to England, none should be deemed necessary relative to the voyage from Egypt to India.

Lord Ellenborough has arrived at Allahabad on his way to Calcutta and taken up his residence with Mr. Matthews, a wealthy indigo planter.

We are sorry to observe that the Bombay post office has this month been more dilatory than ever. It is now nine days since the Express arrived, and newspapers still continue to drop in one after the other.

MONDAY, JUNE 26.

The Madras Athenaeum states, that the Marquis of Tweeddale has rendered himself extremely unpopular by abolishing the indulgence hitherto enjoyed by the community of sending letters by the Express. This act will be as disadvantageous to Government as it is distressing to the merchants. The whole expense of the Express will now fall on the state whereas under the previous arrangement the postage of private letters fixed at a very high rate, not only relieved Government from all charge, but when the wallet was full, left a small profit to the Post office.

The Delhi Gazette states, that Omernote, in the desert on the eastern border of Scinde, has been made over to the adjoining state of Joudpore. In our hands it would only have been a source of expense. The same paper also states, that the well equipped Joudpore legion has been warned for service in Scinde; a very judicious measure, as the men are less likely than other troops to suffer from the climate, which resembles their own.

The Englishman states, that circulars have been issued at Barrackpore to join in a party to be given to the Governor General on his arrival at the station.

One of the most benevolent actions of Lord Ellenborough, is the recent permission given by him to the disbanded men of the 4th Madras Cavalry to re-enlist. These men, by their insane attempt to resist Government in its determination on the batta question, forfeited all claim to consideration; but their deep contrition, combined with the recollection of their former good conduct, has induced his Lordship to overlook the ebullition of the moment and to permit them to enlist again under the British banner.

We learn from the Delhi Gazette, that Mr. George Thompson was daily expected at Delhi, and that the Emperor had given orders for suitable arrangements to be made for his reception and accommodation.

TUESDAY, JUNE 27.

The Star informs us that Lord Ellenborough has arranged to leave Allahabad by the 22d of the present month. As the river is now we suppose open, or may be expected to open in a day or two, his Lordship may probably be expected in Calcutta, early next month.

At the last Opium sale, the drug fetched the same extraordinary price, which ruled at the preceding sale, and which is by no means justified by the last advices from China. The Patna sold on an average of 1446 Rs. and the Benares of 1295 Rs. the chest. The outturn of the sale was a little above 40 lakhs of Rupees. The gross receipts of the year have been two millions sterling. If this source of revenue is continued to India for three years more, the debt incurred in the war beyond the Indus will be wiped out.

The confusion at Gwalior increases. The insurgent chiefs are taking advantage of the strength they have gained to help themselves from the public treasure; and plunder is the order of the day. The degraded Resident has fled; and the authority of the British Resident is set at defiance. It was reported on the 15th of June at Agra, that the insurgents had ordered the Resident to quit Gwalior, and the report gained ground up to the 19th, the date of the last advices from Agra. In that case, he will of course apply for advice to Mr. G. Clerk, who will take the most energetic measures. It would be a singular, but not surprising event, if the next or the succeeding Mail were to announce to the good people at home, that the territories of Scindia had been occupied by a British army.

The Englishman gives an extract of a letter from Tirthoot of the 20th June, which states that a sad change has come over the golden dreams of the Indigo planters. Many days of drought have burnt up half the crop, and the prospects of the year are blighted. Notwithstanding a few croakers in Bengal, it is all but certain that the season will turn out favourably. 125,000 maunds are now spoken of, but the crop will more probably rise above than fall below that mark. Seldom have we known the river so low at the close of June.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

THURSDAY, JUNE 29.

Letters and papers have been received from Singapore to the 1st of June; but they contain no information of importance relative either to the Straits or to China. Our advices from Hong Kong do not extend beyond the 7th of May, at which date the commercial negotiations had not recommenced, in consequence of the non-arrival of the new Commissioner from Peking.

The Star states, on the authority of letters from Bangalore, that Sir Hugh Gough was to take his departure en route to Calcutta about the present time. He may therefore be shortly expected here to assume the office of Commander-in-Chief.

The Penang Gazette of the 1st of June mentions, that Mr. Blundell arrived there on that day from Calcutta on the Lord Amherst, and landed immediately. We have not been able as yet to obtain any farther and more certain intelligence regarding his removal by order of Government, in consequence of certain vigorous measures pursued by him at Moulmein, to resist the encroachments of the Burmese. Government must, to all appearance, have had full knowledge of all his proceedings at that settlement before he took his departure for the Straits. If any dissatisfaction was felt in reference to those proceedings, it seems incredible that the authorities should allow him to proceed to Penang and assume the administration of the three settlements, and then send to recall him. Until, therefore, we have more satisfactory evidence of the fact, we must withhold our confidence from the report we have received. Besides Government must be fully aware that nothing is more likely to maintain peace between Tharawaddy and ourselves than a firm, and immediate resistance of any encroachments on the part of his officers.

The Soomamooky Pinnace, in two of the Berham-pooler Steamer, arrived at Allahabad on the 20th of last month. Lord Eellenborough may therefore start for Calcutta as soon as he desires.

FRIDAY, JUNE 30.

The Star states, that a letter from Dinagopore mentions the discovery of the tea plant near Kursi-ong, in the Darjeeling range, by Capt. Biddulph.

Papers were yesterday received from the Mauritius, to the 6th of the last month, which mention the total loss of the Regular, a vessel of 650 tons, bound from London to Bombay. During a heavy squall the vessel sprung a leak which gained on her and at length compelled those on board to take to the boats. The weather continued very rough, and little hopes of ultimate safety were entertained, when they were happily descried by the French frigate, la Cleopatre. They were picked up in a state of complete exhaustion and generously brought onto the Isle of France, when the Governor went in person, accompanied by his Staff, on board the French vessel of war, to return his thanks to the Captain for his generous kindness.

The same vessels announce the wreck of the Thomas Rickinson, Capt. Newy, bound to the Mauritius with a general cargo. She struck on the reefs off Pondre d'Orton, on the morning of the 27th, the Captain supposing himself to be a degree to the eastward of the island through an error in chronometer.

Another wreck is announced—the third—in these Isle of France papers. The Queen Victoria, which left Bombay on the morning of the 11th of March, was wrecked on the S. W. reefs off Rodrigues on the 7th of April last. Mr. Peck, the 1st officer, Mr. Robert Plunkett, a passenger, and three seamen were lost in endeavouring to save themselves. The rest of the crew were brought in safely by H. M. French brig Colibri.

The Raja of Ulwar, in imitation of the example of the King of Delhi, has established a Lithographic Press in his Capital for the publication of a weekly newspaper. Such is the march of intellect!

As though commotions were not to cease in India, we now learn that considerable excitement prevails among the Soones and Soeas in the city of Delhi in reference to the collision between the two sects on the frontiers of Turkey and Persia. Great festivals have been given by the Sheas in honour of the victory their brethren have gained, and the King of Lucknow has made similar demonstrations of his joy.

There has been some trifling delay in opening the Bank at Madras, but it is pleasing to learn that it is not, as in a similar case at Bombay, attributed to the jealousy of a Bengal clique. On this occasion however it is equally placed on the wrong shoulders. It is said to arise from Lord Tweeddale's mismanagement. It arises from the absence of the Governor General from Calcutta.

Col Roberts left Sehwari on the 6th June to attack Share Mahomed at Sukkurind. His force at that place is respectable, and his post is strong. Sir Charles Napier, it is understood, will simultaneously move to that point from Hyderabad. Sukkurind is on the left bank of the Indus.

The Murkaru states, that Baboo Prusunucoomar Tagore has applied to be admitted as Vakeel in the Sudder Court. It is believed that the Baboo looks to the post of Government Vakeel, the very unambitious title given to the Advocate General in that Court.

SATURDAY, JULY 1.

A letter from China of the 7th May, the latest date yet received, appears in the Bombay papers of the 20th of June, with some particulars which have not yet appeared. The reader will remember that two vessels had been detained by the British authorities at Chusan for trading with the eastern ports contrary to orders. It is said that the big houses at Canton and Hong Kong had determined to send vessels laden with opium to those ports under American colors, and that Sir Henry Pottinger was thus constrained to release the two ships and take off the embargo. Seven ships had gone up the Yang-tse-kiang and were openly selling opium and British goods at Woosung. Trade is also brisk at Shanghae. Gold of fine touch is readily given in exchange for opium, and strange to say, the exportation of it is not forbidden like that of silver.

The Rao Raja of Boondie, a Rajpoot chief, who was on his way to Brindaban to worship at the shrine, has been induced to return home without doing so, in consequence of the heats and animosities which have broken out between the Hindoos and Mahomedans. The Gates have fomented the dispute. Thus there may be peace in Asia, and discord in India.

MONDAY, JULY 3.

The Hon. Mr. Maddock has been obliged to undergo the amputation of one of his thumbs, in consequence of an injury received a short time back from a deer.

Lord Ellenborough was expected to reach the Presidency this week; but a correspondent of the Star states, that his Lordship was not to leave Allahabad before the 28th of last month, and did not expect to be at Calcutta before the 12th instant. The following is the proposed route: Chunar the 29th, Benares the 30 June, Ghazepore the 1st July. Buxar the 2d, Dinapore the 3d and 4th, Monghyr the 5th, Bhagulpore the 6th, Rajamahall the 7th, Berhampore the 9th, and Barrackpore the 12th July.

The Star on Saturday last published a short Extra announcing that Col. Roberts had come up on Shah Mahomed, a brother of Shere Mahomed, by a forced march of fourteen miles, during the night, and completely surprized and routed him. The enemy made but little resistance and fled in every direction. Eighty were left dead on the field, and Shah Mahomed himself, his wife and his standards were captured. The troops under Col Roberts were to march forward immediately to form a junction with Sir Charles Napier, by whose admirable arrangements Shere Mahomed will be completely hemmed on all sides and prevented crossing the Indus by the armed Steamers. The large body of men collected to the north of Sukkur, and who were supposed to be friendly, have turned out to be our enemies under Meer Mahomed Alee, who has been plundering a number of villages. Brigadier Paul, commanding at Sukkur, has been directed not to go to such a distance from the post that he should be unable to return to it by night; but he has deemed it necessary to march out with a good force against this new enemy.

The number of letters and covers sent by the last overland Mail which left Bombay on the 20th of June, was 41,544, namely Letters 31,599 and covers 9,945.

One John Howell has been taken in Scinde fighting against his country, and his case, which is somewhat singular, is to be referred we learn to Government. He is said to be a man about 32 or 33 years of age, a native of Islington, near London, who has been in Scinde eleven years. He sought to escape with the savings of many years to join the British army on the eve of the battle of Meanee, but was stopped by the Beloochees and obliged to point the guns during the battle. He did so in such a manner as to inflict no injury on his fellow subjects. As soon as he could, he gave himself up to Sir Charles.

TUESDAY, JULY 4.

From the Resolutions adopted by the Cabul Relief Fund Committee, at Kurnaul, the 5th of June, we gather that the entire fund, including the subscriptions at Bombay, amounts to about three lakhs and a half of Rupees. The scheme now proposed embraces, 1st, a permanent provision for the widows of European officers and their children. It is supposed there will be ten annuitants of this class. 2dly. The widows of European non-commissioned officers, soldiers, subordinate medical officers, and all others of a similar class, and their children. The committee suppose that the number of annuitants of this class will amount to 200. 3dly. The maintenance of every description and rank, the number of whom at present is about 150, and may hereafter amount to 200.

Mr. Montriau, the barrister, who has been appointed one of the Magistrates of Calcutta, was this day sworn in as one of the Justices of the Peace. The Herkarn says, that he will take the Native division, and Mr. Blackquiere, the Chowringee division, which seems almost as whimsical a division of labour as that which prevails among the Court of Directors in Leadenhall street. Mr. Blackquiere is the best Bengalee scholar in India, Mr. Montriau, being a stranger, cannot be supposed to know a word of the language.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 5.

The Carriage belonging to the Governor of Madras which went to the bottom, between the ship and the shore, had not been recovered, though divers have been employed in endeavouring to find it.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1843.

[Vol. V.

THURSDAY, JULY 6.

Last night's Gazette publishes an official despatch from Sir Charles Napier, relative to the operations of Lieut. Anderson. His Excellency states that Shere Mahomed, finding he could not recruit his troops in Scinde, resolved to draw reinforcements from the mountains of Belochistan. Lieut. Anderson was therefore sent with a steamer and a hundred men to destroy the boats collected on the right bank for the Beloches to cross over into Scinde. This officer has performed his duty in a brilliant manner. Yet on turning to Lieut. Anderson's despatch, we find that he says nothing of having destroyed any boats, but alludes only to an engagement with the Beloches who had assembled to the number of 300. They were soon driven away; and the Steamer kept up a splendid fire of grape shot, killing and wounding it is supposed 140, or nearly half the number. One or two such attacks from the ubiquitous steamer, will soon teach the Beloches that it is safer to keep to their mountains; in which case the tranquility of Scinde will be an easy work. Here again do we perceive the vast advantages which Government derived from the agency of Steam.

The President of the United States, reposing especial trust and confidence in the abilities and integrity of Mr. James B. Higginson has appointed him Consul of the United States in the Port of Calcutta. The French had already the start of America in this matter of a Consul. It is singular that Calcutta should for so many years have been the only port of importance in which no foreign nation thought it necessary to appoint a Consul.

Mr. Montrou, a member of the bar of Calcutta, who has just been appointed one of its Magistrates has, it is said, introduced a novel practice into the Court, which will probably give rise to some observations. It has been the custom hitherto for petitions to be presented in writing to the Magistrate. He has directed that they shall in future be made orally. If Mr. Montrou, were as strong in the Oriental languages as his colleague Mr. Blaquiere, the innovation might have been tolerable, though from the peculiar habits of the people likely to occasion some injustice. But it appears preposterous that all petitions should be addressed by word of mouth to one who does not understand the language.

The Bengal Bank, has just declared a dividend for the last six months at the rate 14 per cent. per annum.

FRIDAY, JULY 7.

The Madras papers announce that Col. Butterworth, the Deputy Quarter Master of the Army, has been appointed Governor of the Straits Settlements.

Mr. A. G. Paterson, the Deputy Secretary of the Union Bank, is about to proceed to Singapore on business connected with that institution. Mr. Calder Stewart acts for him in the mean time at the Bank.

The Star states on good authority, that Dost Mahomed had obtained the complete ascendancy at Cabul, and that all those chiefs who were at first opposed to him have succumbed. This was to have been expected. There was no party strong enough to oppose him; and it was for the interests of the people to support the only individual who was capable of establishing a strong Government. Candahar is in a state of great distraction. All those who had manifested any good will towards the English, had been plundered, and were about to fly. It has, we fear, fared ill with that large number of Hindoostanee servants who accompanied our army, but having become domesticated, refused to quit their new connections in the country and remained behind.

The insurrection of Ali Mahomed to the north of Sukkur does not appear likely to be serious. He declares it to be his wish in all things to submit to our Government. He has taken up arms only, to oppose the usurpation of his territories by Ali Morad, the British ally, to whom it is said, Sir Charles Napier has incautiously made over large estates belonging even to those who were friendly to our rule. Ali Mahomed has never interrupted our dawks, which is the first thing he would have done had he been hostilely disposed.

SATURDAY, JULY 8.

We regret to find the death of the Honourable George Turnour, late Acting Colonial Secretary, announced in the Ceylon papers. If we mistake not, this is the gentleman who has been so successful in tracing out the ancient history of that island and of Buddhism, from Pali records.

There is a report in Calcutta that Lord Ellenborough goes home in the Endymion frigate, but it is certain that no one knows any thing of his Lordship's movements; and it is probable that he himself does not know the next move he will take. The intelligence by the next mail will, it is said, decide the point of his continuance or return. It will probably decide nothing. If the Gate and other Proclamations, did not drive his Lordship from India, certainly the conquest of Scinde will not. His Lordship reached Ghazepore with his suite on the 1st instant.

The papers announce the death of Major General Hopper, of the Artillery at Dum-Dum, in consequence chiefly of an accident which occurred to him a month ago, and which at his very advanced age proved fatal. The General had been not less than sixty years in the service, having come out during the administration of Warren Hastings. He had attained the age of 78.

MONDAY, JULY 10.

The Star states that the Governor Generals party reached Singapore on Monday, the 3d instant.

Singapore papers have been received to the 8th of June. They give us but little intelligence, because there is but little to give. They however mention a report that the Plenipotentiary had been invited to Peking as a more convenient position for the settlement of affairs.

The Madras Athenæum says, it is the intention of Mr. Smyth to return to the Bombay Times the amount of damages awarded against him. The Times of course has spirit enough to refuse such an offer with the scorn it deserves. It is stated that Mr. Smyth's object in bringing the action at the end of eighteen months, was a hope that the threat of it would have induced the Editor to give up the author. The Star very properly observes, that to pay the costs as well as to relinquish the damages, would be the proper way of confessing the error into which the prosecutor had been led.

The Agra Ukhbar states, that Dost Mahomed Khan had demanded of Amernoolia all the plunder he had obtained during the war with the English, but that he had refused to give it up. Khan Shereen Khan, the head of the Kusilbashes, had arrived at Cabul and had an interview with the Dost, who endeavoured to conciliate him, but he had returned to the hills. Mahomed Akbar Khan was busy in rebuilding Jellalabad, and settling the country.

The British Resident at Gwalior left that place on the 16th. The Deputy Vakeel, who accompanied him from the Durbar, was not permitted to cross the Chumbul. The Resident dismissed him.

It is now confidently affirmed, that the Resident was not expelled by the Usurper; but that the Dost on the contrary used every effort to retain him. Then why did he leave the Court? The residence of our Envoy at the Native Courts should be regulated by the same rules which prevail in Europe. His departure should be the signal for a war, and he should not depart till his Government is prepared to enter on hostilities.

The Delhi Gazette states, that Mr. G. Thompson was to remain at Delhi two months and that thousand Rupees had been laid out in putting a house in order for him. It is affirmed, though on what authority we know not, that the members of the Imperial family have been called to contribute to the embassy, and have reluctantly paid 7,000 Rupees.

The Hurkaru states that the office of the Principal Cazy of the Bengal Presidency has become vacant by the death of the incumbent, and that it is the intention of Government, to reduce the salary from 650 Rupees a month to 300. The Hurkaru recommends that the whole system of Criminal law should be altered. Why, it was for this very object that the Law Commission was constituted; and the only attempt it made at legislation was the production of a Criminal Code, which shared the odium attached in this country to its chief contributor, and has never been noticed since it was printed and reviewed six years ago. We want an entirely new Code of Criminal Law; but if Government could not obtain one that it could adopt, even at an expense of ten lakhs of Rupees, how can we ever hope for one?

The Bombay Times in noticing that rumours have been abroad for some time that Sir Henry Pottinger was labouring under disease which would shortly constrain him to leave his post, states that the very last letters from him make no mention whatever of any such complaint.

TUESDAY, JULY 11.

The four Steamers, with four other vessels in tow, having on board the Governor General and his suite, were at Monghyr on the 5th, and are expected this day at Barrackpore, where every preparation has been made for his Lordship's reception.

The Madras Bank was to have commenced business on the 1st of the present month. We perceive that some of the Bombay papers have charged it on the misconduct of the Bengal Government that it did not open earlier. The unavoidable cause of delay, as we have stated, was the absence of the Governor General from the Legislative Council.

The Madras United Service Gazette states that Col. Smith of the 2d Cavalry killed no fewer than eleven tigers on his way from Kamptee to Secundrabad.

The Agra Ukhbar publishes intelligence from Scinde which leads to the impression that the case of Sheer Mahomed is desperate, and that our troops will not be much longer kept out in troops at so inclement a season, exposed at once to insufferable heat, and dreadful inundation. It is said that on the report of Col. Roberts' force being in his rear, Sheer Mahomed resolved to attack it, but several of his adherents falling off, he was obliged to "run for it." He had only 5 or 600 men with him, and it is supposed that the line of his flight will cross the south of Capt. Jacob's force and this may lead to his apprehension.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 12.

The City of Madras is agitated by two events; the commercial community by the election,—through the public influence it is said—of Mr. S. D. Birch, as Secretary to the new Chartered Bank of Madras, which has been set a going at last. The bar is indignant at the appointment of Mr. Serle, as Registrar, by the Chief Justice Sir Edward Gambier; and some very stringent resolutions have been adopted. The matter will lead to an open schism between the bench and the bar. The attorney General made some observations about a criminal indictment. The Chief Justice told him to adopt what course he chose, and in reply to some other observations which had been made said that the bench could maintain its own dignity and respectability without the aid of the bar. This announcement caused some laughter among the gentlemen of the bar.

The following is the latest account of the progress of the Governor General.

9th July.—The Governor General reached Moorshedabad last night. This morning he landed at Berhampore, and like a good Christian attended Church. A salute of 19 guns notified his presence in the cantonments, and this evening his Lordship entertains General Raper, Col Voord, his Staff and Civilians. To-morrow he will retrace his steps on a visit to the Nawaub Nazim, who has invited the whole gentlemen of the station of Berhampore to meet him at dinner. Rumour says it is his Lordship's wish to establish once more an European Regiment here—and for that purpose he intends visiting the Barracks having directed the Executive Officer and the Station Staff to be in attendance. Better Barracks India does not boast, and in spite of prejudice, the station itself is delightful. His Lordship leaves us for Calcutta on Tuesday morning. You shall hear further from me about the party.—Eng.

His Lordship reached Barrackpore at four o'clock this evening. He was saluted first from the Danish battery at Serampore, and on landing at Barrackpore by the artillery brought up from Dum-Dum for the occasion.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1843.

[VOL. V.

THURSDAY, JULY 13.

Yesterday evening's Government Gazette announces, that Major General Simpson of Her Majesty's 29th Foot, has been placed at the disposal of Sir Charles Napier for employment in Scinde. Capt. Baker, of Engineers, at present Superintendent of the Delhi Canals, has also been sent to Scinde, to be employed in the survey and superintendence of the water courses, canals, and forests of the country. The fertility of a considerable portion of the newly acquired territory depends upon keeping up the canals; and there can be little doubt that the disafforesting of the forests, would not only contribute to the comfort of the people, but to the salubrity of the country.

The constitution of the several Studs has been remodelled. They will in future constitute one general department, remaining as usual under the control of the Military Board. The department will consist of two divisions, that of the North Western, and that of the Central Provinces. The salaries will be thus arranged; 2 Superintendents at 1000 Rs. a month, 2 First Class Assistants at 400, 2 Second Class, at 300 and 5 Sub-Assistants, at 200 Rs. Lieut. Col. Gwatkin takes the superintendence of one division, and Capt. Moyle Sherer of the other.

The Bombay Times states, that H. M. S. the Endymion, which was under orders to proceed to England immediately after the arrival of the mail, has been detained; and it is reported that she remains to take home the Governor General. This is the second vessel which the papers have destined to convey His Lordship to England.

The Bombay has reached the port of the same name from Plymouth, in Eighty days, which is considered one of the most remarkable passages on record.

There is a vessel from China of the 19th of May, which announces the arrival of some Mandarins at Hong Kong where they were received with much distinction, and witnessed the imposing ceremony of conferring the highest order of the Bath on Sir W. Parker.

FRIDAY, JULY 14.

It is stated that Lord Ellenborough, after having viewed the barracks at Berhampore, which are among the finest in India, but have been abandoned because of their unhealthiness, expressed a wish again to place a European corps there. The Englishman is doing all in his power to dissuade his Lordship from such a course. It appears that the expense of these barracks was ascertained some time ago from the office of the Military Board and the Accountant General, to have been nearly seventeen millions sterling; but on looking into the account we find that sixteen millions of this sum consist of compound interest on the outlay for 77 years; rather an odd mode of computing the cost of a building. At this rate Westminster Hall must have cost a sum which figures cannot comprize. It is stated moreover that the barracks cost 38 lakhs in the year 1757, which is impossible. The battle of Plassey was fought on the 21st of June of that year, and certainly the barracks were not finished in six months after.

The Governor General proceeded to Calcutta yesterday, and landed in a private manner, accompanied only by his own staff. His Lordship refused to allow the troops to be drawn out either at Barrackpore or at Calcutta, from a consideration for their comfort.

SATURDAY, JULY 15.

The Delhi Gazette states, that Raja Dhyani Sing, the powerful Mayor of the palace in the Punjab has regularly quarrelled with Shere Sing and has retreated to the mountain fastnesses of his own domains in Jumboo, and that the Maha Raja has sent General Ventura to bring him to reason with fourteen Regiments of Infantry, two of cavalry and a brigade of guns. The minister however has an equally powerful army of his own; and also the superior advantage of a difficult and almost inaccessible country. If discord once gains admittance into the Punjab, its independence is gone, whoever be Governor General.

All apprehension regarding the Ameer Shere Mahomed is at an end. Being hemmed in on all sides by the toils of Sir Charles Napier, he faced the weakest of his opponents, and came down upon Capt. Jacob of the Scinde Irregular Horse, with about 4000 men, and three guns. His whole army fled on receiving a few shots from our artillery. The Ameer himself has escaped in the direction of the desert, with ten or twelve followers. The spirits of the Beluchers appear to be completely broken; and unless we lose the country by our own folly, we are not likely to lose it by the energy or valor of the enemy.

MONDAY, JULY 17.

Sir Charles Napier in his despatches to Government of the 19th June stated that a sudden change of the weather to extraordinary heat just after the troops marched from Hyderabad, had proved fatal to many of the Europeans, who were struck down by the sun and died within a few hours. He had thus lost in the field, 1 Lieutenant, 2 Sergeants, and 20 Rank and File. In the fort of Hyderabad, there had at the same time been 'carried off by the same cause, 3 Sergeants, 1 Drummer, and 14 Rank and File. In all 60 individuals.

A Decree has been obtained in the Delhi Court against the eldest son of the King, and an order was issued to seize all his property which was found beyond the Palace. The decree was no sooner known than he took steps to remove his property beyond its reach, and to place it in safety within the precincts of that sanctuary.

The Delhi Gazette mentions that leave has been refused to Mr. George Thompson, by the British authorities at Delhi, to enter the palace and see the King!! This is an act of such superlative folly that we suspect our Western contemporary must have been misinformed.

TUESDAY, JULY 18.

The Bengal Spectator again adverts to the circumstance that eight years have passed since a fund was raised for a testimonial in honour of the late Rammohun Roy, and a Committee appointed to carry the design into execution; and that nothing has since been heard of the matter. The Editor a twelve month ago called on the Committee to inform the public of the steps which they had adopted in furtherance of the design. But the Committee still continues in a state of "profound somnolency" and the public is yet kept in a state of "cimmerian darkness."

The Bombay papers, on the authority of letters from Hyderabad, describe the mode in which General Napier hemmed in the "last of the Ameers" Shere Mahomed, and obliged him to take to the desert with only a dozen followers. Col. Roberts was ordered to advance from the North; Sir Charles himself moved up from the South, while Capt. Jacob with the Scinde irregular Horse advanced against him from the East. The Ameer, thus encompassed, made an attack on the weakest of his opponents, and advanced against Capt. Jacobs, the first few shots from whose guns, dispersed his force. There was a report at Hyderabad that he had been taken, but it was a commutation. Upper Scinde is said to be in a state of tranquillity and the dawks between Hyderabad and Bhooj have been re-established.—Friend of India.

* [FROM THE LONDON MAIL, JUNE 6]

Her Majesty, the Queen, entered her 25th year on the 24th of May.

The ceremony of the baptism of Her Royal Highness the Infant Princess, second daughter of Her Majesty and Prince Albert was performed in the Chapel Royal, Buckingham Palace, on the 2nd of June, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Archbishop of York; the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Norwich. The sponsors were the Duke of Cambridge, the Duchess of Kent, the Princess Sophia Matilda, and the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz; and her Royal Highness was named "Alice Mary."

The Queen has nominated His Royal Highness Prince Albert, K. G., to be the First and Principal Knight Grand Cross of the Most Hon. Order of the Bath, and Acting Great Master of the said Most Hon. Order, in the room of His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, deceased.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert K. G., has been appointed Governor and Constable of Her Majesty's Castle of Windsor, in the room of Augustus Frederic Duke of Sussex, deceased.

The Marquis of Bute and the Earl Mansfield have received the "Green Ribbons" vacant by the deaths of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex and the Earl of Abergavenny.

The Queen has appointed the Duke of Cambridge Chief Ranger and Keeper of Hyde's-park and St James's-park.

Ministers intend applying to Parliament for the settlement of an annual grant of 3000*l.* on Her Royal Highness Princess Augusta of Cambridge upon her marriage with the Hereditary Grand Duke Frederick of Mecklenburgh Strelitz.

Letters and papers from Bombay, dated 1st April were received in London via Marseilles on the 8th May; those via Falmouth on 13th May.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint the Right Hon. Frederick John, Earl of Ripon, her Majesty's Commissioner for the affairs of India, in the room of William, Lord Fitzgerald and Vescei, deceased.

Mr. Gladstone has been appointed President of the Board of Trade, and been succeeded as Vice-President by Lord Dalhousie.

It is stated that Mr. James Weir Hogg, M. P. for Beverly, has offered the Vice Presidency of the Board of Trade, the appointment to which Lord Dalhousie has succeeded, but that it was declined, as acceptance would have necessitated a fresh election for Beverly. Mr. Hogg will we hope, ere long be one of the Secretaries to the India Board, in which case a seat in the East India Direction will be vacant.

Sir Eardley Wilmot, Bart. has sailed in the Cressy, in progress to the seat of his government at Van Diemen's Land.

On the 24th May, a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when it was resolved that, in reference to the present state of the Council of India, the terms of Mr. William Wilberforce Bird's tenure of his seat therein be extended for one year beyond the prescribed period; and it was also resolved, that Mr. Frederick Millet be appointed a provisional member of the Council of India.

A society has been formed at Berlin, chiefly consisting of ladies, who are anxious to improve the condition of females in India.

The Dublin Evening Post says, it is with great delight we have to state, that we have seen a letter from India, which flatly contradicts the report of the murder of Messrs. Connelly and Stodhart, by the barbarians in Bokharra. The account comes via Meshid, and is grounded on letters received by certain Jewish houses in that place. The writer has no doubt of their veracity.

The committee appointed to receive subscriptions in England for the relief of the sufferers in the disastrous retreat from Cabul, has been dissolved, and the following is a statement of the fund raised. Amount received, 4832*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.* Disposed of thus:—Remitted to India, 4124*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*; paid Mr. Kershaw, by direction, of Kurnaul committee, 100*l.*; advertising, 443*l.*; clerks, 60*l.*; stationery, servants, &c. &c. 100*l.* 3*s.* 11*d.*

Mr. J. S. Buckingham has just completed his work on the United States and Canada, in nine volumes. It appears that Mr. Buckingham made 3000*l.* by his lectures in America; the loss of which sum, by the failure of the public securities in which it was invested, has prevented this gentleman from fulfilling his original intention of traversing Mexico crossing the Pacific China by the Sandwich Islands, visiting as much of the Celestial Empire as possible, and returning through India, via Bombay, the Red Sea, Egypt, and the Mediterranean, to England, then to furnish the world with the results of his labours.

The aspect of affairs in Ireland is one of very threatening importance, the entire country having been roused to a state of fearful agitation upon the question of a Repeal. The Duke of Wellington and Sir R. Peel have, on the part of the Queen, reiterated the declaration made by his late Majesty upon this question in 1843; and as a means of maintaining the legislative union vis et armis an immense military force has been sent from this country. A battalion of marines is on its passage to Cork, and orders have been issued that recruiting shall be recommenced, in order to add sixty men to each regiment of the line, except those serving in India and China.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

THURSDAY, JULY 20.

The Star mentioned yesterday that information had been received by the last mail, of the appointment of Sir Lawrence Peel, as Legislative member of the Supreme Council. It is contradicted in this morning's issue. It was supposed at one time that the office would be abolished, but the advantage of having the disposal of such a piece of patronage, worth more than the post of any Cabinet Minister, the Lord Chancellor excepted, will be duly weighed by the Ministry before it is thrown away. Why should not the Advocate General, who is paid 30 000 a year, act as legal adviser in the preparation of laws which require a reference to English legislation? Hitherto the Advocates General have been men fully qualified by their legal experience and acumen to afford such assistance. If this legislative duty was entrusted to that officer it would constrain Directors invariably to fill up that office on the ground of merit and on no other.

The Star gives an account in this morning's number, of the capture and death of an enormous Alligator at Accra, on Saturday evening last.

Sir Hugh Gough may, we suppose, be daily expected at Calcutta to assume the command of the army. Garrison orders were issued by the Governor General on the 17th instant directing the whole of the troops in garrison, as well as the town guards to hold themselves in readiness to turn out in full dress, as might be hereafter directed, to receive His Excellency.

The Hurkaru states that Mr George Thompson reached Delhi on the 9th of this month. Three miles from the city he was met by half a dozen of the nobles of the Court with a large phalanx of attendants and was conducted to the residence allotted to him on the king's elephant, richly caparisoned, with a glittering Howdah and splendid trappings. Every possible attention was shewn him. It appears, that no obstacle was made to his entering the place, and the report that the Commissioner had forbidden it is therefore, as we suspected, utterly groundless.

FRIDAY, JULY 21.

The accounts received through the Delhi Gazette of the insubordinate proceedings of the two powerful Rajah Dhyani Sing, seem to indicate the approach of a conflict between the Sovereign and his Minister, which will probably end in the establishment of a paramount British influence in the Punjab. It is said that the Minister has abstracted ten crores of Rupees, or ten Millions Sterling, from the public treasury since the death of Runjeet Sing. When called on to account for the expenditure of this sum, he said that it had been laid out in securing the allegiance of troops, but he appears to have given no other explanation. It is known that a large portion of this sum has been abstracted from time to time from the treasury, and sent to Jumboo. The Minister, in the usual oriental style, said he was the Raja's slave; but his actions are those of a Master. He has betaken himself with a large force, to his own mountain fortresses in Jumboo, accompanied by many chiefs of distinction. General Ventura is said to have been sent to bring him to reason. The country appears to be on the eve of a civil war. If at this juncture, a strong and united Government existed at Cabul, an effort would assuredly be made to recover the lost province of Peshawur, and to extend the Afghan dominion again to the banks of the Indus.

The Raja Kaleekissen Bahadoor, again figures in the papers of this morning. He got up a translation of a Sanskrit work, the Maha Natuk, with the aid of others, and sent copies of it to all the Kings and princes of the earth to whom he could obtain access, and their flattering acknowledgments have from time to time been sent to the public journals for publication. On the present occasion, he announces the receipt of a letter from the King of Prussia. We suppose that as an amicable intercourse has been established between the Emperor of China and the British Government, a copy of the Maha Natuk, will be sent forthwith to Peking, and that the papers will be called on to minister anew to the Raja's vanity, at no distant period by the publication of a letter signed with the vermilion pencil.

The Star, in reference to the announcement of Sir Lawrence Peel's having been appointed Legislative member of the Council of India, states this morning that the post has been offered to him. The Chief Justiceship is worth 8 000 a year; with a retiring pension of, we believe, 15 000 a year, after ten years service. The situation in the Supreme Council gives 10,000 a year, without any pension.

The Star of this morning states that notwithstanding the vigilance of the British officer in Scinde, the Ameer Sherie Mahomed had contrived to cross the Indus and had betaken himself to the mountains of Belochistan, where he will endeavour to raise the tribes, and bring them down to the reconquest of the country.

The same paper has a long and interesting article on the Assam Tea Company which the Editor says, "promises well, all things considered." It appears however that the extravagance of expenditure which has marked its career, from the beginning has not ceased; and an agent is to be deputed to Assam to examine the establishments. Is it true, that Mr. Masters, the only practical botanists connected with the Society, has been dismissed?

The Hurkaru states, that an army of observation 15,000 strong, will be assembled in the ensuing cold weather on the Sikh frontier, under the command of Sir Robert Dick.

SATURDAY, JULY 22.

The express reached Calcutta last Monday afternoon. Up to yesterday evening, the first instalment of the regular mail had not arrived. Seldom has the patience of Editors, and of the community been put to so severe a test, and we are sorry to say the strength of this virtue has not been improved by the experiment.

A number of the Christian officers, commissioned and non-commissioned, who were employed in the service of Scinde, have addressed a letter to the Rev. Mr. Price, the Chaplain at Agra, laying their grievances before him, and stating that they were seized, tied up to the guns, abused, kicked, thumped, and cruelly and unmercifully belaboured, besides being deprived of eight month's arrears to pay. It is not a case in which the British Government can interfere. Nothing can be done for them, but through the sympathy and generosity of private individuals.

A general meeting of the Dum-Dum Temperance Society was held on the evening of the 18th for the purpose of presenting Sergeant Major Wolfe, with a silver medal, having a suitable inscription previous to his leaving the station, and proceeding to Agra. It is a testimonial of the respect and esteem of the members of the Society for his unwearied endeavours and disinterested zeal in promoting the cause of Temperance.

MONDAY, JULY 24.

Saturday's Calcutta Gazette contains an extract from a letter of the Court of Directors relative to the splendid victory gained by the troops under Sir Charles Napier on the banks of the Fallailee, in February last. The Honourable Court have postponed the bestowal of marks of distinction on the Troops, having heard that there had been a subsequent battle in which they trust another victory had been achieved. In this they will not be disappointed. The most gratifying portion of this despatch is that in which the Court have supplied an omission in Lord Ellenborough's notification, and made the most honourable mention of Major Outram's services, giving the stamp of their own authority to the epithet "the fearless and distinguished Major Outram," bestowed on him by Sir Charles Napier.

The Star states on the authority of letters from England that Mr. Dyce Sombre had become deranged in intellect, and is placed in a lunatic asylum. The borough of Sudbury, with which his name is so disgracefully associated, retains its franchise. The papers brought by the last Mail state that the Bill for disfranchising it, which had passed the Commons, had been thrown out by the Lords, because general bribery and corruption could not be proved against it. It was saved because ten righteous men were found therein.

The Pelhi Gazette affirms that Shah Kamran has been murdered, that the Persian Monarch,—whose occupation of Heart is confirmed,—has commenced the coining of money in his own name at that place. Central Asia is thus again in commotion as it was in 833; and, to add to the confusion, we have now the prospect of disturbances in the Punjab. The Afghans, when we were quitting their country last year remarked to several of the officers that we should assuredly be back there before many years had elapsed. Will their prophecy turn out to be as correct as that of Dost Mahomed, who long before there was any appearance of the insurrection, affirmed that the country could not be settled without him, and that he should be at Cabul in two years?

A meeting of the Creditors of Messrs. Fergusson and Co. was held on Saturday, Mr. Beckwith in the Chair. There were 30 or 40 gentlemen present, and it was resolved to cancel the trust deed, and to transfer the estate to the Insolvent Court. When the trust was originally established, it was remarked that the estate could not long be kept out of the Court. It is affirmed and believed that the intermediate operation of the trust has been beneficial to the interests of the creditors.

The Matter of the appointment of Mr. Serle, as Registrar of the Supreme Court at Madras, has been again brought under the cognizance of the Court. There is evidently some under current of private interest, in this matter, which we at a distance are unable to discover, and which the Editors on the spot are too prudent too unfold. Whether the opposition arises from private disappointment or from public virtue, it is not for us to say, but it is rather a novel sight to see the two Judges pulling one another's caps, or rather wigs in open Court. We are told that the Chief Justice "was very severe in his language with reference to Sir John Norton, and the course which that judge had pursued." We are also told that on the breaking up of the Court, Sir John said he would have nothing to do with Mr. Serle's appointment, in any shape whatever, and looked as if he would carry the matter farther.

A correspondent of the Hurkaru states, that "some short time back, the corpse of a respectable gentleman was seized by a bailiff of the Court of Requests for a certain sum of money due to a certain creditor, and the friends of the defunct were obliged to pay it before they got the remains removed for interment." Our contemporary states that the practice is illegal, though it was successfully employed to procure the payment of poor Sheridan's debts, whom his friends allowed to pine unnoticed in a spunging house, and when his spirit had sunk under his misfortunes, paraded their carriages at his funeral.—We have understood that the same disgraceful procedure was adopted in the case of William Pitt, and that the body was released by Parliament's paying his debts, but as the Hurkaru does not mention the circumstance, we conclude that our impression was erroneous. But how shall the Hurkaru's idea of the illegality of the act, obtain legal force, and prevent a creditor's resorting to this disgraceful practice for the payment of his debts with this example of success before him?

At the last meeting of the Landholder's Society, Mr. G. Thompson was appointed Agent for the Society in England, and Mr. Theobald accepted the office of honorary Secretary. An instance was brought to the knowledge of the Society of a Collector's having refused to receive Company's paper from a mortgagee for the postponement of the sale of an estate, when it was resolved immediately to memorialize Government on the subject.—Friend of India.

[VOL. V

THURSDAY, JULY 27.

The convention with France regarding the conveyance of letters by way of Marseilles, which was announced by the last mail, has by some oversight not been made public by the post office authorities, and the last Calcutta Gazette still contains the old announcement of three years standing, that all letters sent by way of Marseilles will be charged 2s. 8d. under a quarter of an ounce. As a double mail will be despatched this day week to England, one by the Hindoostan, the other by the way of Bombay, it is important that the public should bear in mind the new arrangements which we copy from the Star.

"Most of our readers will rejoice to hear that under the new convention with France the postage for letters to England via Marseilles has been reduced to 1s. 10d. for letters under a quarter an ounce; and to 2s. 3d. for those under half an ounce—but on the other hand newspapers are to be charged 3d. instead of 2d. each as formerly. This increased postage on Newspapers has occasioned some remonstrance which it is stated will probably have the effect of reducing it to the former rate of 2d. Arrangements are in progress for the convenience of persons posting letters in England for places beyond India, as China, Australia, &c. &c. and the late regulation of the Post office prohibiting such letters being sent by the India overland mail has been cancelled."—Eastern Star.

Mr. A. F. Smith, the Sheriff of the year, has presented the Jail with a number of books calculated to amuse and instruct. This library is intended equally for the unfortunate and the guilty, the debtor and the culprit.

The Hurkaru states, that the last express reached Madras on the evening of the 13th, just four days before it reached us; the difference of time is said to be disproportioned to the distance of space. The distance between Madras and Bombay is 763 miles; the transmission of letters therefore in six days is at the rate of five miles and a quarter an hour.

The Managers of the Military Orphan establishment have resolved to maintain the Boy's school, instead of placing the wards at other institutions. As the expense of the establishment was excessive beyond all precedent, owing to the very small number of boys educated in it, it was proposed to break it up and send the lads to England, where they would be better educated for the same sum. The plan would also have had the advantage of destroying an odious and galling distinction now made between those born in and out of wedlock. The Court of Directors however refused to sanction the arrangement, and the question therefore came up whether the present expensive establishment should be kept up, or a more economical and equally efficient plan adopted. The managers have it seems resolved on the former.

FRIDAY, JULY 28.

The last Delhi Gazette seems to hold out some hope of an accommodation between the Rajah of the Punjab and his refractory minister. The son of the minister, a young man of excellent abilities, has been sent to persuade his father to return to Court. This he may probably effect, and the storm may blow over the present, but only to burst with greater fury at no distant period. The relative position and strength of the parties, now that mistrust has been manifested, forbid the hope of any permanent reconciliation.

Mr. Cochrane, formerly of the Calcutta bar, who proceeded to Bombay two or three years ago, and met with much success, has now returned from England, to which he had gone, and has determined to give Bombay the benefit of his talents, which, considering the overflowing state of the bar in Calcutta is a wise determination.

The King of Delhi has given Mr. George Thompson a document in Persian, handsomely engrossed and framed, in which he is styled "the wise, the high in rank, the well wisher of either side, the deputed of the Shah of Hindoostan."

At a meeting of the creditors of Messrs. Ferguson, Brothers and Co. held in pursuance of the orders of the Insolvent Court, it was resolved to recommend Mr. R. C. Jenkins to act as assignee in conjunction with Mr. O'Dowda. It was also resolved to give the Assignees a remuneration of five per cent. which, as the estate is valued at Fifty lacks of Rupees, will be a handsome purse of two lakhs and a half of Rupees.

The Delhi Gazette states, that Alee Mahomed as well as Shere Mahomed, has succeeded in crossing the Indus, and reaching the Solean mountains. Scinde is therefore quiet while the river overflows it. Should the Ameers succeed in raising the Hill tribes, there may be some more honours for our troops in the next winter, but the Belooches will do little in the plains against disciplined troops.

Lord Ellenborough has presented Capt. Scott, who was Commodore of the fleet which brought his Lordship down, with a silver tankard as a token of approbation of the particular zeal and attention manifested by him. Lord William Bentinck presented a similar token of his approbation to Mr. Tudor, who first introduced the blessing of Ice into the country.

The Hurkaru states, that Mr. Lang has been admitted as an authorized pleader in the Sudder Court. But the Editor does not say in what language he is to plead, if in English, then the rule of the Court regarding the use of Oordoo is suspended. But in whatever language he may plead, the admission of European barristers into the Native Courts will be the beginning of a new and happy era. In England the improvement of our Courts has been far more owing to the bar than to the bench.

SATURDAY, JULY 29.

The Bombay Times states, that the schism in the Scottish Church has extended to that town, and that it has been resolved to set up a free Presbyterian Church, and bring out a free minister.

The Police of Calcutta has taken the field in earnest against the unlicensed Punch Houses in Calcutta; and three men have been brought up on the charge of keeping them, and have been fined on their conviction, the first in the sum of 50, and the two others in the sum of forty Rs. each.

The Board of Revenue for the Western Provinces, it is said, has applied to the Commissariat for 600 cases for packing up their records, preparatory to their moving up to Agra. There can be no longer any doubt that the Sudder Court and the Sudder Board will be removed from Allahabad to Agra in the ensuing cold weather.

The Gentleman's Gazette mentions a series of operations recently conducted in Lower Scinde, under the judicious arrangements of Mr. J. G. Lumsden, Political Agent in Cutch, and Col. Stalker, commanding the troops in that province. The first attack was made on the Fort of Deeply, across the Runn which was taken possession of and blown up. Meeteer was occupied on the same day. It contained eighteen large guns, nine of them brass. The force then advanced to Wanga, which was occupied on the 10th. Nawakote, one of the strongest forts in Scinde, was taken on the 13th, the enemy dispersing as our troops advanced. It contains good barracks, has two wells and ten guns, four of them being brass. The fort is 330 feet square. In consequence of these successes, it appears that the mail communication between Hyderabad and Cutch, had been completely re-established. All these operations have taken place in Sher Mahomed's territories, he himself being a fugitive in the mountains of Belochistan.

MONDAY, JULY 24.

The Delhi Gazette states, that the Lieut. Governor of the North West Provinces has replied to the King of Delhi's application regarding Mr. George Thompson, that he might have free access to the Palace, and that His Majesty was at liberty to appoint him his Agent and depute him to England; but that he was not to confer a Khilut upon him;—that is, he is not at liberty to perform an act of sovereignty.

The Madras Athenæum states, that Sir Hugh Gough was to leave Bangalore for Madras on his route to Calcutta, to assume the command of the army on the 15th of July. His Excellency cannot therefore be here much before this day week. We perceive that General Smith, the Adjutant General of the Queen's Troops, has already passed through Delhi, on his way to join Head Quarters in Calcutta.

The Star states, that the H. C. Steamer Queen is ordered to proceed on an early day next month to Bombay, with treasure. Lord Ellenborough does not proceed in her, as some of the papers intimated.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 1.

The plot thickens at Gwalior. On the night of the 16th July, all the men under Col. Jacob's command, and those under his son, went over to the Usurper. All the Christian officers of the Brigade are placed under arrest and are to be dismissed. Col. Jacob, and Col. Baptist, who was previously dismissed, are said to be enormously rich, and will have little cause to regret their separation from the Gwalior army. They say that three hundred guns are undergoing repair, and the utmost activity is apparent in the arsenal; and the conjecture of course is that these exertions have reference to objects the British Government will not approve of.

A letter addressed to the Athenæum at Madras, on the subject of the new chartered Bank, gives us the singular fact that of a capital of thirty lakhs of Rupees, not more than three lakhs and a half are held by the Merchants of the town, and that seven lakhs are held by the public servants of Government.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 7.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, AUGUST 12, 1843.

[Vol. V.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 3.

Sir Hugh Gough arrived at Madras from Bangalore on the 21st ult. His Excellency intended to embark on the Samarang for Calcutta.

The latest accounts from Bombay lead us to fear that the monthly Steamer may take her departure without our Mails. Though we are perishing here for want of rain, there has been so great a redundancy on the road to Bombay, that the progress of the Mails has been greatly impeded. Neither the Express nor the Mail of the latest safe day had arrived on the 18th, and the despatch of the Steamer was postponed to 6 P. M. The Mails had not arrived at 4 P. M. and it was resolved, if the Governor General's Express arrived during the night, to despatch the Steamer—leaving the whole of the letters of private individuals behind. Most fortunately the Governor General's Express did not arrive during the night; and at 5 A. M. the next morning another notice was issued stating that the Mail would be kept open till 4 P. M.

General Simpson of H. M. 20th Regiment goes to Bombay in the Queen Steamer, to be placed at the disposal of Sir Charles Napier for employment in Sind.

Last night's Calcutta Gazette contains the draft of an Act, which may truly be called an Act for a General Jail Delivery without oyer or terminer. It ordains that whereas prison discipline has been made more strict of late, every man now in jail is to be let off one-fourth the remainder of his period of confinement, and that in future, every man is to be sentenced only to three-fourths of the legal term of imprisonment. We may offer a few comments on it next week. At present we would only observe that some of those who are fond of looking on every occasion at the lame leg of Government, have remarked that since the abolition of corporal punishment, the jails have been crowded beyond their capacity of comfortable accommodation; and that two alternatives were before the Supreme Council; the one that of enlarging the prisons; the other that of letting out some of the jail birds; and they have wisely and economically adopted this latter alternative.

The Hindoostan Steamer goes full; if possible more than full. Among the passengers are two of the gentlemen who rendered themselves memorable in Afghanistan, Captain G. Lawrence, and Major Rawlinson. Sir John Peter Grant, Mr. W. P. Grant, and several others, go to Galle in the Steamer, and from thence to the new and charming Sanatorium of Neuralia which will shortly become rather a formidable rival of Darjeeling.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 4.

Our Mails have gone by the Bombay Steamer. It seems that the Government Express, arrived after some of the public mails of the last safe day, the 5th July. Those of the 6th and 7th had also arrived and were quite in time for the Steamer, which was originally advertised to start on the 18th, but did not quit the harbour before 3 P. M. on the 20th. At half past two all the missing Mails from Calcutta came in, and were sent on board.

The Delhi Gazette states, that Dost Mahomed has thrown the "infamous" Ameenoola and his sons into prison; and that Khan Shereen Khan, the head of the Kuzelbashies, had fled to the Hazarah country. Dost Mahomed does not appear to be firmly fixed on his throne; the nobles still continue to indulge in the national propensity of intrigue.

The Governor General has considerably ordered that the troops and officers for the monthly relief sent from Barrackpore to Town, shall be accommodated with the use of Steamers. Two Steamers came up from Calcutta on Wednesday afternoon, and the next morning took down the troops in two cargo boats. In the evening they returned with the boats filled with troops which had been relieved from Fort and Town duty.

The Governor General has also ordered the gun which used to be fired at eight in the evening in winter, and nine in summer, to be fired at noon every day. A noon day gun is convenient; but why could we not have had the convenience of both?

A Buggy Mail is just advertised for the first time to start from Meerut to Delhi and Delhi to Meerut on the first of next month. It will continue to leave either station each day at 3 P. M. Accommodation is afforded to passengers at the rate of 16Rs. a head.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 5.

At the last Meeting of the British India Society there were twenty members and visitors present, it was resolved to send thirty questions to the interior of the country. We wish there had been a little more discretion in drawing them up. One of them runs, thus, "What, in the opinion of the Ryots, constitutes the necessities, the comforts and the luxuries of life?" What distinction can a poor ryot draw between luxuries and necessities, who if he is found to be enjoying anything that will bear the name of a comfort is soon squeezed dry. It was said that Mr. George Thompson had written to a member of the Society complaining of the "croaking of the Press on his accepting the appointment of Ambassador from the King of Delhi." Certainly the acceptance of that appointment after the professions made in Calcutta, was very singular. Mr. Thompson cannot surely have been so foolish as to complain of the remarks of the press on the occasion, which were remarkable chiefly for their lenity.

The Bombay Times has some very pertinent observations on the refusal of Lord Ellenborough to grant compensation to the Cabul Captives for the loss of their baggage. They lost indeed every thing but their lives and their honour, in the service of their country; and the resolution to refuse them any relief, after the heavy pecuniary sacrifices they have incurred is harsh and ungenerous.

MONDAY, AUGUST 7.

The last Delhi Gazette quotes letters from Sukkur to the 18th of July. They supply no news. The country is under water, and quiet. The two refractory chiefs, Shere Mahomed and Ali Mahomed, had crossed the river and betaken themselves to the mountains. All opposition has ceased, and unless the Beloches hordes can be prevailed on to leave their mountain homes, cross the river, and make a fresh effort to recover their hold on the country, it may be found to submit as peaceably to our rule as Bengal did.

The Delhi Gazette says, that the Nuwaub, Hussun Ali, the uncle of the present Nuwaub, being dissatisfied with his present allowance of 3000 Rs. has resolved to enlist the services of Mr. George Thompson, with the hope of getting more. If Mr. Thompson resolves to undertake the cause of all those who have anything to complain of, or anything to expect, he will soon find his hands full of engagement. He will find in fact that there is no end to grievances in India.

Sub-Assist. Surgeon Chunnum Lall has been presented with a pair of shawls of the value of 250 Rs by Mr. Joseph Skinner, as an acknowledgement of his services. This young man was brought up at the Medical College in Calcutta, where he was distinguished for his professional acquirements.

Standfast, the correspondent of the Hurkaru, says that we have misapprehended him; that he did not say that a Council of War had been held at Jellalabad, about retreating, but that discussions were in those days frequent within the walls of the beleaguered fortress, and that a retreat to Peshawar was proposed; and that he is not at liberty to mention the name of those who urged the step; nor does he think that any advantage would be gained by the disclosure. In this he is acting not only with consideration, but generosity. The Hurkaru, in a note says that the fact mentioned by Standfast is unquestionable, and that he could name the parties to whom allusion is made. Does the Hurkaru mean, only that "discussions were frequent," or that a Council of War was held, the proceedings of which were recorded? In Sir Robert Sale's Narrative of events at Jellalabad, there is no mention of a Council of War. It is important, highly important in a historical point of view, that this fact should be known, if for no other purpose, at least that we may ascertain whether the honours which have been given to some, and the neglect with which others have been treated, be just or not. We will not lose sight of this Council of War.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 8.

His excellency Sir Hugh Gough's arrival from Madras in the Samarang was announced by Semaphore yesterday. He was expected to land yesterday afternoon, and the troops were accordingly in readiness.

An advertisement appears in this morning's Exchange Gazette from Messrs Carr, Tagore and Co. stating that the Steamer Assam with a flat in tow would be dispatched to Allahabad on the 18th, and that during the present scarcity of freight in consequence of the Government Steamers not being able to meet the public wants, this was an eligible opportunity, &c. &c. It appears then that the Assam, paid in her last trip. We are happy to see any prospect that internal steam navigation will become an object of private speculation. Government cannot be expected to supply the wants of the public in this respect to their fullest extent.

The Sheristadar of Dinagepore as it seems, going to bring an action for libel against the Hurkaru, for saying that he had amassed a large property, though in the receipt of a small salary; and had been at length dismissed. The man had better be content to remain in obscurity with what he has gotten, than tempt public scrutiny. We have a list of his estates before us, and a memorandum of his pay during the period in which that property was accumulated. If the state of that district and its administration should become matter of public observation through means of an action, all those who provoked the enquiry will rue it to the end of their lives.

The number of letters and cover sent by the last Mail from Bombay, was 49,950; namely letters, 39, 143; papers 10,827.

The Hurkaru publishes a letter from a correspondent signed Derry Diggs, stating that in a certain district, name not given, "the Magistrate has taken it into his head to leave the station, and to hold his Court at B, some thirty miles off. Hundreds of unfortunate suitors already far from their homes are obliged to follow him in the heat of a July sun, and the middle of the rains, without a place to lay their heads in." Looking farther into the letter, we find the under current of motive in which the charge may probably originate. The writer has had a summary suit which has lingered seventeen months—no wonder his patience is exhausted—and he considers the Magistrate actually tyrannical to Europeans. The removal of the Court however to a distance of thirty miles to suit the Magistrate's convenience, if true, must be a matter of notoriety. We have heard of such fantastic tricks; but we are satisfied that Mr. Bird has only to be made acquainted with the fact that any Magistrate has wantonly inflicted such injury on the suitors in any district, to relieve him of his public duties.

There has been some discussion in the papers about the sale of Fergusson and Co.'s Union Bank shares, 200 in number, at 860 Rs. each, which is 140 Rs. below par. Mr. Roberts, the Broker, declares that he has found many buyers but no sellers at that price. The brokers who correspond with the Englishman affirm that these shares have positively been sold for 860. On this ticklish subject, in which the interests of so many are involved, we say nothing. We give statements as we find them.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 9.

Mr. Roberts, the Broker, has come forward in his own name and affirmed in the Hurkaru that the whole of Fergusson and Co.'s Union Bank Shares, amounting to 500, have been bona fide sold for 960 Rs. each.

Sir Hugh Gough landed yesterday morning about half past six with all honours.

By the Water Witch intelligence has been received from China to the 26th of June, The Imperial Commissioner, Keying had arrived at Canton, and was expected at Hong Kong on the 24th, where he was to be received with the highest demonstrations of the Treaty. It was understood that the ratification had been fixed for the next Tuesday, after which it was expected that a Steamer would be dispatched forthwith to Singapore and Bombay. A Criminal and Admiralty Court had been established at Hong Kong.

The Hindostan Steamer starts to-morrow morning at sun rise, with a full complement of passengers.

The Marine Board, it is said, is to be abolished, and a Marine Superintendent appointed on a salary of 3000 Rupees a month. Mr. Greenlaw is to be Marine Secretary upon a salary of 2000 Rs. a month. The Star of this morning seems to think that the office and the pay of the Master Attendant will be merged in that of the Superintendent, and that it will be conferred on Capt. Rogers. The Marine Board has been the same as the Customs Board, and the Salt Board, and the Opium Board. In all such cases, the Board is a cypher, and the Secretary, the integer; or as some will have it, the Secretary is the manager, and the Board his skreen.—Friend of India.

[VOL. V.]

THURSDAY, AUGUST 10.

General Cartwright, not having the fear of the Hurkaru before his eyes, ordered up guns from Dum-Dum on Wednesday, to salute "Lord Ellenborough," to whom he gave an entertainment that evening, which four hundred merry hearts enjoyed. About half past nine, a salute of nineteen guns announced Lord Ellenborough's arrival, and about midnight, half the children in Serampore were waked by another peal of cannon which told of his Lordship's retirement. As the Hurkaru seems to be really in earnest on the subject, and appeals to Sir Hugh against the Dum-Dum nine pounders being used like Chinese crackers.

The Star states on the authority of Mauritius papers that the number of emigrants landed in the Island up to the 30th of June, after the interdict had been taken off, was $253; namely, from Calcutta 4909; from Madras 2260; from Bombay 505; from Anjouan, one of the Comoro islands, 111; and 468 Chinese.

A letter from Kerachee of the 5th July published in the Bombay Times states that Sir Charles Napier is likely to succeed to the post of Commander-in-Chief at Bombay, and that Sir George Pollock will probably be his successor in Scinde.

The Semiramis Steamer which left Bombay on the 19th June, in the teeth of the Monsoon, arrived at Aden on the 7th July, in eighteen days. When the weather was favourable, she made the voyage in half the time. On reaching N. L. 100, the winds were found so moderate that she was enabled to cross over without finding it necessary to approach the equator so near as 4 or 5 degrees, as is usually done.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 11.

The Bombay papers arrive very irregularly. The Times of the 25th ult. reached us yesterday, the 10th, having been fifteen days in reaching Calcutta. The paper of the 28th arrived this morning, having reached town in thirteen days. The roads are evidently very heavy. We fear therefore that advantage of the early arrival of the July Mail at Bombay, which is expected, will be neutralized by the length of its transit across the country.

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette of the 29th, says, there is a rumour that Ali Morad's Army had turned against him and taken possession of the fortress of Dejee ka kote, just above Khyrpore. Ali Morad has, according to the Bombay Times, obtained through the impolitic generosity of Sir Charles Napier a territory which yields eighteen lakhs of Rupees a year, while the British Government has kept lands only of the value of 22 lakhs, to pay all its expenses. May we hint to the Editor of the Times that he would confer a favour on many of his readers, and on us among the rest, if he would give us a Genealogical Tree of the Talpoora dynasty. We cannot trace out the relationship of the Ameers now in our power or at large, with any satisfaction, though we have consulted all the books which have appeared on Scinde.

The Steamer Hindoostan went out into the stream very early yesterday morning, and got away about half past 11 with 142 passengers. How many more would she have room for if she had been destined to Bombay, to take up the passengers of that port?

We had scarcely said we could not tell what had become of the draft of the Magistrate's Act, when it made its appearance as law in last Thursday's Calcutta Gazette.

The friends of Mr. Robertson, late Lt. Governor of the North West Provinces, have resolved to raise a subscription for a full length portrait of him to be suspended in the Metcalfe Testimonial at Agra. The surplus funds will be devoted to the foundation of a scholarship in Mr. Robertson's name in the Agra College. The sum subscribed, as given in the Delhi Gazette, amounts to 2,818 Rupees.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 12.

A very splendid entertainment was given to the Governor General by the officers at Dum-Dum on Thursday last which came off with great eclat. Sir Hough Gough was also present on the occasion, and was highly eulogized by Lord Ellenborough, for his able conduct in China. This terminates the series of entertainments given to his Lordship by the officers of the army in and around the Presidency. There was one circumstance connected with the entertainment at Dum-Dum which we find it difficult to account for. It is said in the report of the Hurkaru that the health of Her Majesty was given by Col. Powney, and drank in solemn silence; while the health of Lord Ellenborough was drunk with three times three, and all possible enthusiasm.

The Sessions of the Supreme Court was opened on Friday last, when Sir Henry Seton, now the only Judge on the Bench, charged the Grand Jury. The Calendar is rather longer and more formidable than usual.

MONDAY, AUGUST 14.

The Mauritius papers last received seem to intimate that the number of Cooly emigrants had reached the number of 12,000, that the Colonial treasury had been exhausted in paying a bonus for their importation, and that the Government could and would pay no more. The Star seems to doubt the accuracy of the intelligence, having advices of a later date from the Island which make no mention of it.

Major Irvine has been appointed Superintendent of Marine. Col. Benson, now at Barrackpore, succeeds Major Irvine as member of the Military Board.

Sir Jasper Nicolls, we are told by the Bombay Gentleman's Gazette, goes home to England from Bombay in one of the Steamers on the 1st of January next. If this intelligence should be correct, he will probably embark on the Sutlege and move down the Indus to Kerachee, without visiting Calcutta.

The Hurkaru states, for the convenience of the public, that a visiting book is kept at Government house, and that parties wishing to pay their respects to the Governor General have only to enter their names and residences. But we cannot see of what use that this visiting book can be since private audiences are abolished, and no man is allowed to address the Governor General in person on any matter connected with his own interests. Besides, his Lordship now lives with all the hospitality of a country gentleman at Barrackpore, and goes down to Calcutta generally on Friday morning and returns on Saturday afternoon. What time is there on these two Council days for these private visits the Hurkaru alludes.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 15.

We regret to see the death of Lieut. Col Pogson announced in the papers. He had been nearly forty years in the country, and during the whole of the period was constantly engaged in some literary pursuit or other, in which however his success was not equal to his diligence. He had latterly turned his mind to historical speculations, which were of rather an eccentric character, and of which the only advantage was that they served to interrupt the monotony of cantonment life, and afford occupation for the mind.

We were informed at the close of last week that the troops at Agra and Muttra had been directed to hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's warning. The Hurkaru of this morning states, that the formation of three corps, for the ensuing cold weather has been determined on; one of 10,000 men at Agra; one of 5000 in Bundelkund, and one of 5000 at Khytul. The Commander-in-Chief, we are told by the same authority, will be at Cawnpore about the 14th of October. The object of this assemblage our contemporary does not explain. Why 5,000 men should assemble in Bundelkund does not appear. Every thing is perfectly quiet both there and in the Saugor District, with the exception of a small portion of the northern part of the Saugor territory which borders on the Gwalior district of Chunderee, where the very few adherents of the ex-rajah of Jeitpore have joined the few insurgents still at large from Saugor and would fain attempt some enterprise, for they have little food. They have been joined by many of the marauders with which the Gwalior district abounds and on the 20th of last month they had a brush with the police, in which that police acquired little renown. But there is nothing in the present or prospective state of Bundelkund to call for an army of 5000 men. The assemblage of 10,000 men at Agra has evidently an aspect to the state of Gwalior, where the Dada Khasjee has shut himself up in the palace with the Tara Baee, aged 13, and the Maharajah, aged 9, in whose names he rules. He dares not move out; and the insurgent troops are prevented from seizing or killing him only by the assurance that they can quietly squeeze out of him all the juice of the Gungajulee Orange, or Treasury, which still contains one Crore of Rupees. In these circumstances, with a rebel army glutted with plunder on our frontier, the assemblage of troops in the neighbourhood is a precautionary measure, which could no longer be delayed with safety.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 16.

The Commander-in-Chief held a levee yesterday morning, which was numerously attended, not only by military officers, but by many civilians and gentlemen not in the service, who availed themselves of the opportunity of being presented to his Excellency. The Hurkaru says, that the presentation of the mercantile community would have been greater had it not been the morning for despatching the Express "to which all other things give place."—Friend of India.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 17.

The Overland Express arrived this morning at 10 o'clock.

Of domestic events strictly, perhaps the Marriage of Her Royal Highness the Princess Augusta of Cambridge with the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz claims the priority.—The Royal nuptials took place with all the pomp of regiments, on the 28th of June, at the Chapel of Buckingham Palace, and in the presence of Her Majesty, Prince Albert, the members of the royal Family and a large concourse of the haute noblesse of the land. On the proposition of an annual stipend (£3,000) for Her Royal Highness, on the occasion of her marriage; the great economist of the lower House, of course, opposed the grant, as exorbitant and ill-advised in the suffering condition of the country; however, notwithstanding the loud cacklings of "the capitoline goose," as the Times classically designates the honourable member for Montrose, the measure was carried by a large majority and he has since been venting his pseudo-arithmetic spleen on the King of Hanover, who, having arrived among us to celebrate the Hymeneal gala aforesaid, has been feted and abused alternately, with the most inconsistent ardour. Of Royalty, indeed, within the last calendar month, we have had, perhaps, an unparalleled redundancy; for in addition to His Hanoverian Majesty, we have had the King and Queen of the Belgians and their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Oldenburgh among us; and the Court, in consequence, has been gay exceedingly; the last Drawing Room (the first this season) being a rare bumper of beauty, rank and royalty. We are sorry to say that a rumour is in circulation to the effect that Her Majesty's Government intend to appropriate only 200,000*l.* as prize money to the captors of Hyderabad. The Peninsular and Oriental Company's new steamer Bentinck, will leave Liverpool in a few days for Dublin in progress to Southampton. She will leave this country for India about 24th August. Dr. Pusey, it is true, has been condemned by the University of Oxford, but it is not so much because he offended, as that he offended in degree; he has been sentenced, but it is not because he has preached a doctrine that is false, but that he carried the doctrine too far for the spirit of the times. The matter cannot rest here. The Tractarians have demanded the precise points upon which their champion has been condemned, and have published the denoxious sermon. The Rev. Theobald Mathew, has from his own private resources distributed some thousand copies of the Douay version of the Holy Bible; and with the approbation of the Roman Catholic Prelates of Ireland, has in the press a new edition of the Sacred Volume, to be published in twelve numbers, at the low price of 6*d.* each number. This will place the Old and New Testament within the reach of every teatotaler in Ireland. Mr. Pinworth Whelan has been appointed a stipendiary Magistrate for the county of Sligo, and Mr. J. B. Kerman, brother to the Roman Catholic bishop of Clogher stipendiary Magistrate at Loughrea. The Repeal movement continues unabated and Mr. O'Connell every week address from one to five hundred thousand in some part or other of the south and west. In the meantime Government are preparing for any emergency by placing strong military garrisons all over the country, in quarters or barracks loop holed and defended by cannon. The fortifications at Athlone have been remounted with cannon, and reinforced with double guards. In addition to the Grand Cross of the Military Order of the Bath the indomitable Sir Charles Napier has appointed to the vacant Colonelcy of the 97th Regiment.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 9.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, AUGUST 26, 1843.

Vol. V.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 17.

INDIAN ARMY.—The Lord Chancellor begged to communicate to their lordships a letter which he had received from the Governor-General of India, dated Agra, April 21, 1843. The letter was in these terms:—

“My Lord Chancellor,—I have had the highest satisfaction to communicate to the army engaged in the late campaign in Afghanistan the unanimous vote of thanks voted by the House of Lords.

“It is gratifying to me to think that your lordships have thought fit to acknowledge the part I had in supporting those military operations.”

On the motion of the Duke of Wellington, it was ordered that the letter should be inserted in the journals of the House. Lord Auckland has been elected President of the Royal Asiatic Society, in room of the late Lord Fitzgerald and Vescei. Sir Edward Ryan, late Chief Justice of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, has been sworn a member of Her Majesty's Most Hon. Privy Council, and sits regularly at the Judicial Committee on Appeals. H. T. Prinsep, Esq., late a member of the Council of India has announced himself a candidate for a seat in the Direction of the East India Company; we have reason to believe with every certainty of speedy success. Mr William Acland has been appointed by the Court of Directors to the office of solicitor to the East India Company, at Bombay. The Board of Customs have ordered that all goods imported from India via Egypt shall be liable to the same duty only as if imported by the long sea route, on the consignee making an affidavit that the said goods are the produce of Asia, and have come direct from thence. The parties who oppose the concession of a Charter to the East India Bank, have forwarded their objections to the Treasury, where the matter is now under consideration. It is stated that the projected railway between Calcutta and Diamond Harbour, respecting which Captain Boileau, of the Bengal Engineers, has furnished a very valuable report, is likely to be taken up by some respectable parties. From a return, printed by order of the House of Commons, we collect that total amount expended for steam navigation to India, by way of the Red Sea, in each of the last four years, towards which Parliament has granted 50,000*l.*, is as follow;—1834-39, 149,723*l.*; 1839-40, 121,236*l.*; 1840-41, 107,209*l.*; 1841-42, 71,734*l.*. The remains of Rujah Rammobun Roy, who died at Stapleton Grove, near Bristol, the residence of M. H. Castle, Esq., several years since, and was buried in the grounds adjoining the house, have been removed to the cemetery at Arno's Vale, and interred in that portion appropriated to dissenters. A sum of money has been forwarded from India for the purpose of erecting a stately monument on the spot. It will be in the Hindu style of architecture, and upwards of thirty feet in height. Private letters from Alexandria speak in very sanguine terms of the probability of a junction between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean, by means of a canal cut through the Isthmus of Suez. The Pasha has recently had an interview with the Consuls of the European nations to discourse with them on the subject. The Austrian Consul has been especially charged to Prince Metternich to sound the feeling of the Consuls; and the general belief in Egypt is, that some project for accomplishing the work will soon be adopted. Boghos Bey has published a notice regulating the terms on which merchandise shall be admitted to pass through Egypt. This document states that a transit duty of one-half per cent. on the declared value shall be paid on all merchandise landed either at Alexandria or at Suez, and in case of fraud in the estimation of the value, the custom-house officers may open the cases of merchandise and enforce a duty of 10 per cent; no persons to be permitted to convey merchandise through Egypt without a special permission. His Serene Highness the Prince of Oldenburgh has visited Haileybury, and inspected the East India Company's College. The Prince was most minute in all his inquiries respecting the constitution of the College, and expressed great admiration at the sound and comprehensive course of study pursued there. It is understood that his Highness (who has already instituted a Law College) is desirous of establishing in his own country an Institution for the education of Statesmen and Civilians; and he has therefore been most desirous of inquiring into the details of the College at Haileybury, which has been so instrumental in raising the character and tone of the civil service of India. Intelligence has been received at the East India House of the total wreck of the H. C.'s iron brig, the Guide, on Hartwell Reef, to the north of Bona Vista, one of the Cape de Verd Islands, but happily unattended with any sacrifice of life. The Guide was entirely constructed of iron, and sailed from Liverpool on the 14th February, under the command of Captain Sercombe, for Calcutta, where she was to be employed in the pilot service. A writer in one of the morning papers asks the Court of Directors of the East India Company, if it is the intention that the gentlemen recently nominated, provisionally, to the Supreme Council in India, is to succeed Major-Gen. Sir W. Case-ment, as the Major-General's seat in council is that which will probably become first vacant; Mr. Bird's period, for some unknown reason, having been extended to another year. By this arrangement Sir W. Casement is excluded from the chance of the Government in the event of its becoming vacant by the death or resignation of Lord Ellenborough, which cannot but be considered by that meritorious officer as an unjustifiable supercession, and by the public as a most impolitic and partial act, when un- services and pretensions of the individuals concerned are weighed in the scales of even-handed justice. Should such be the intention of the Court, there will in that case, not be a military man, with the exception of the Commander-in-Chief, in the supreme Council—a circumstance very much to be lamented—our dominion in Asia being confessedly a military despotism, enlightened and mitigated by our civil institution.—Overland Mail.

The Star gives us the Report of the embarkation of Coolies for the Mauritius during the month of July last. The number was, 1006 men, 183 women and 45 children, in all 1184. As the Mauritius appears now to be stocked to the full extent of the funds available for the encouragement of labourers, it would be advisable to turn the tide of emigration to the Island of Ceylon, in which commercial enterprise has experienced an unusual impulse within the last few years, and appears likely to be checked for want of labourers.

A correspondent of the Hurkaru states, that the Sirdars who fled from Candahar on the approach of our army and took refuge in Persia, have returned from thence, and are plundering and imprisoning all those who have, or are suspected to have, any wealth. Safer Jung, Shah Soojah's son is said to be in their hands. Yar Mahomed, is still paramount at Herat; "the most accomplished scoundrel in Central Asia," as he has been perhaps justly called by those who know him. But the time has passed by when the intrigues or revolutions of Central Asia, excited any interests in our councils.

A large party is to be given by the community of Calcutta to Lady Gough, which has been fixed for the 1st of September.

We mentioned last week that a widely extended confederacy of rogues had been discovered at Bombay; that their books had been seized and examined, and that they confirmed the worst suspicions of the Magistrates. We are now told that the Forty Thieves, as the Courier facetiously designates them, intended to bring an action for damages against Government and its servants for the illegal seizure of their books and papers.

We have placed among our extracts an high wrought eulogy of Lord Ellenborough, from the Bombay World, a paper recently established in that city. The Hurkaru says it has the merit of originality; which is saying a great deal. We have now two papers in India, the Bombay World and the Bombay Gentleman's Gazette devoted to the praise of the Governor General. In time there may be a third. These journals, thus espousing the cause of those in authority, will serve to mitigate the guilt of the licentious press of India.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 18.

The Hurkaru states, on the authority of a Perozo-pore correspondent, that a vakeel of the Persian Prince Aga Khan, has arrived from Candahar, for the purpose of obtaining an interview with the Governor General to solicit either land or money for his masjar. Aga Khan is said to have done the same service, when he was with General Nott's Army. He is also the spiritual head of a sect of Ishmaelees, and possesses great influence in the south of Persia. But as we are not likely again to meddle in the affairs of Central Asia, the probability is that his errand will be bootless.

The sum drawn on the Indian Treasuries by the mail amounts to about sixteen lakhs of Rupees, against four lakhs and a half drawn in July last year.

The Englishman states that Baboo Hurree-mohun Sen, the son of Dewan Ram Komul Sen, has resolved to give a prize every quarter to the best of the students in Mr. Grant's Drawing Class in the Mechanic's Institute.

A case of almost unparalleled cruelty is, it is said, pending before the Magistrate. The complainant is a native of Bengal, who was returning to his native land from England in a Liverpool ship, and who after having been ill-treated in various ways was at length put into an empty cask set edgewise with the top open. The cask was placed in the fore-castle with the complainant in it. He states that he was kept night and day for two months! The case is under investigation before the Chief Magistrate.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 19.

Intelligence has been brought from Moulmein by H. M. S. Syrac which left that place on the 9th instant. It is reported that two King's messengers had arrived at Rangoon to learn and report on the cause of the misunderstanding between the English Chief at Moulmein and the Burmese Governor of Martaban. Notwithstanding rumours of preparations which may look warlike, there can be no doubt that there will, or rather can be no war between the two powers, while their present mutual desire for peace continues. A report was said to be current that Mr. Blundell was to be reinstated; but this is of course out of the question, so far as the wishes and power of the Government in Calcutta is concerned.

The settlement of Moulmein having gotten a new master, the Chronicle has got a new man for its editor, and he seems to enter on his duties with some spirit. He says that salt might be exported from Moulmein to Calcutta with advantage. It appears to sell in the province a little above eight annas the maund, and the Editor makes out that after paying for freight, wastage, and every other charge, and the Government duty here there would remain a profit of some 40 oird per cent. We imported seven lakhs of maunds from Bombay last year. Why should it not be advantageously imported from a settlement at so much shorter a distance?

MONDAY, AUGUST 21.

The Delhi Gazette of the 12th contains items of intelligence from various quarters among which are the following, that Shere Sing was far from satisfied with the conduct of his minister Dhyen Sing—it would be strange indeed if he were—and that efforts were in progress to deprive him of his friends at Court by doing away with their services and filling up their appointments with other individuals.—We are also told that Cabul is in a very distracted state, and that Dost Mahomed's oppression of all people, more especially of those who had been in any way the friends of the English while there, were beyond description.

The Englishman gives a letter which has been received in town, from some place not mentioned, which says that a Syce who had been in Brigadier Anquetil's service had come in and stated he was with him in the retreat from Cabul, that he was not wounded, but taken prisoner by the Afghans, and after swallowing a diamond ring, laid himself down and died. In the same paper, however, we have a narrative of Sergeant Fair, of H. M. 44th, one of the few survivors of the retreat, who confirms the report previously given that the Brigadier fell at the fatal barrier at Jugdulluck.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 10.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1843.

[VOL. V.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 17.

The Madras Athenæum states that Mr. Stocqueler will not return to this country, and that during the brief period of his stay at Madras, he engaged himself as the monthly correspondent of that paper. That paper goes on to say, "A more suitable person could not be found, nor one better qualified to meet the varied tastes of the readers of Indian newspapers."

Col Butterworth, who has been appointed to supersede Mr. Blundell in the Straits Government, embarked at Madras on the 11th Instant on the Charles Forbes, under a salute of eleven guns. The Singapore papers last received, allude to the second supercession of Mr. Blundell, in terms of just indignation. It is evident that when he proceeded on public duty from Penang to Singapore, he had not the least idea of the blow that was likely to fall upon him.

Virtue is sometimes as contagious as vice. The worthy Sheriff of Calcutta, Mr. Adam Frere Smith, having resolved to become the founder of a Library in the Jail, usually denominated No. 1, Chowringhee, the Sheriff of Madras, Capt. Biden, has determined not to be behind his brother of Calcutta, and has resolved, likewise, to found a library in the jail of Fort St. George.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 18.

The Star of this morning has an Editorial article on the subject of Railways in India, occasioned by a proposal which has been published in the Monthly Times that a rail-road in India of any length and cost, cannot be completed by a joint Stock Company. is self-evident. There are no funds here adequate for the purpose, and capitalists at home have no confidence in Dutch management. It must be done by the Government, the great landlord of India; and there can be little doubt, that such a road connecting the Western provinces with the port of the Ganges; there is but one port, and will probably not be another in this century—would be of the highest service, and afford a good return. But we notice this article more particularly on account of the following sentence; "As it is, we have but one made road in Bengal, and that wants bridges."—We think our contemporary will find on examination, that very large sums are now in course of expenditure on the bridges of this road.

The Bombay Times of the 16th August quotes letters from Hyderabad of the 27th July, which state that Shere Mahomed was collecting a force among the Murees and Boogties. It was rumoured that the Affghans from Dadur,—that is we suppose the marauders of the Bolan,—were to join him, and that his negotiations had been extended to Mooltan. That journal also remarks that rumours were rife in England that the conquest was not to be retained; but it is to be hoped that we shall be spared the exhibition of so great an act of insanity.

The Delhi Gazette gives an occasional item of news from Cabul, through the news writers of the Lahore Durbar stationed there, which is not without interest. From this source, we now learn that Dost Mahomed had offered a reward of 2000 Rupees, besides a Jaygeer, to any one who would bring in Ameenoolla; and that nearly all the buildings destroyed by the English had been rebuilt.

The Bengal Spectator states that Mr. Lyall, the Advocate General, has been appointed Law Lecturer at the College of Fort William; and that the students of the Hindoo College will be allowed to attend his lectures. This is the first instance in which an Advocate General has had leisure for any exertion out of Court, and Government has acted discreetly in turning it to the best account. The Lectures here spoken of will, we suppose, refer to the laws of England, and not to the legal institutions of British India.

There has been an unusual degree of sickness in the city of Delhi, for some time past, which seems to have affected all classes. The Delhi Gazette says, on the 16th, that it is on the increase. The king has been advised by his spiritual mentor to order a buffalo to be slain, and the flesh to be subsequently exposed with vessels full of wine, sherbet, and milk, on each of the towers at the three gates of the palace, with a view to stay the progress of the disease. The Editor tells us, that the same superstitious ceremony was observed at each of the gates of the city, by permission of the Magistrate. Impossible.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 26

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has appointed Major Havelock, of H. M. 13th Light Infantry, Persian Interpreter. He held the same appointment in Afghanistan under Sir Willoughby Cotton and General Elphinstone; and subsequently bore an active share in the labours of the illustrious garrison of Jellalabad. The appointment is spoken well of in the Star and Hurkaru, and will we believe meet with general approbation.

A correspondent of the Star, in the number of this morning, informs us that Government has deputed Col. Lloyd to investigate the cause which have led to the frequent insurrections, which have of late broken out in Assam. The writer, who is evidently no friend of the public authorities in the country, traces the dissatisfaction to the repeated appropriations of fresh territory which have been made of late years. We were rather surprised to find him censure the occupation of Poorunder Sing's territory. The resignation of this fine country to a man so totally unfit to manage it was a mistake; and the re-occupation of it was considered by all men at the time as just, politic, and benevolent. We must however have the other side of the question, before a fair and safe opinion can be formed on the subject.

We have papers from Singapore to the 3d of August, on which date the steamer with the treaty, ratified by the vermilion pencil, had not arrived from China. We regret to learn that H. M. S. Samarang, which had been laudably employed in destroying various nests of pirates in Borneo, had struck on a shoal in the river, at high water mark, and as the tide receded, fell over on her side and filled. The only other item of news from the settlement is the increasing ravages of the tigers. It appears that Government formerly gave a reward of a hundred dollars as head money for every tiger brought in. This sum was afterwards reduced to 50; and the inducement to destroy them ceased. The tigers began accordingly to increase and multiply, and they have now extended their ravages to such a degree, as to affect the value of property in the interior. A patch of land which fetched 300 dollars some time back, cannot obtain a purchaser at 25 dollars owing to the dread of these animals. Our Government in Bengal usually gave 10 Rs a head, or rather a tail, for every tiger, and this reward was found strong enough to clear some of the districts of them.

A correspondent of the Englishman states, that the Indigo season has been so favourable in Tirhoot, that the district is likely to yield the enormous quantity of 40,000 maunds, which is, we believe a greater quantity than it has ever manufactured. If the same abundance marks other districts, the year will probably be one of the most productive on record.

MONDAY, AUGUST 28.

The Agra Ukhbar states that the Cholera has been raging at that station with fearful violence, and that several of the neighbouring stations have been visited with this malady. It has created such alarm among the natives that the cessation of rain, which, at this season of the year is a source of deep anxiety, has scarcely been noticed.

Both the Hurkaru and the Star have this morning published the decision of the Privy Council in the appeal case in which Aga Kurbolae Mahomed and others were appellants, and the Queen, on the prosecution of Mahomed Kooles Mirza, was respondent. The Council has reversed the decree passed by Sir John Grant and Sir Henry Selon, and taken the same view of the case which Sir Edward Ryan, and Sir Lawrence Peel, the Advocate General, took.

At the close of last month a volcano broke out on one of the groups of islets lying on the S. E. shore of the Island of Cheduba, on the coast of Aracan. It has led to the formation of an entirely new island.

The Military Staff of Calcutta has resolved to give an entertainment to Lord Ellenborough on the 8th of next month.

The Delhi Gazette of the 19th August states, on the authority of advices from Scinde, that Kokun Lil Khan, one of the Candabar Sirdars, who fled to Persia on the approach of our army, and has returned to it on our retirement, has come down to the Pesheen valley to watch the progress of events in Scinde. It is said that the fugitive Ameer of Scinde, Shere Mahomed, has joined him, which is some indication that he himself has not been joined in any satisfactory manner by the Beloochee tribes.

The Hurkaru this morning affirms that the charge of unheard-of cruelty brought by a Native returning to India against the Captain of a Liverpool ship, who put him in a tub and exposed him to the elements, for two months, has entirely broken down. The case has been carefully investigated by the Chief Magistrate and Mr. Montrieux, and they found that the man had been after all kindly treated by the Captain, that he was ill the whole voyage, and very peevish.

The Hurkaru, also chronicles a rumour that the Board of Customs is to be abolished and the management and responsibility of the department committed to a Commissioner or Superintendent: The Board will in this case have no other duties to attend to but those of the Salt, and the Opium depart-

TUESDAY, AUGUST 29.

From the Madras Spectator, we find that the Rev. Mr. Wolff, who amused the society of India ten years ago by his eccentricities, discredits the fact of Col. Stoddart's and Captain Conolly's murder, and offers to proceed in company with any officer, or, if necessary, alone, to Bokhara, to procure their liberation, if his expenses are found him. He could not be employed on a more appropriate or benevolent errand; and we hope the home Government and the Court of Directors will not fail to encourage him by the promise of ample support.—Friend of India.

EDUCATION.

With the sole view of promoting Piety and Learning I have opened a School for the education of youth. Many years of experience have taught me how a school should be conducted, and I have every reason to hope that the Institution will meet the approbation and support of Catholics in particular and of the public in general.

Everything regarding the morals, education, health, &c. of the pupils will be strictly attended to.

All who wish to satisfy themselves as to the mode in which the school is conducted are hereby invited to call at the Institution denominated, "St. John's School."

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 11.]

CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1843.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 31.

The Englishman gives an erratum, on the report of the meeting of the Civil community to do honour to Lord Ellenborough. The original report ran thus: "Mr. W. Bracken then proposed and Mr. O'Dowda seconded the motion, that all classes of the community be invited to join in this mark of attention to his Lordship." The corrected version of the motion is, that all classes of Society be invited to join. There is a distinction in the City of Palaces between the meaning of the words Community and Society not to be found in Johnson, which a stranger to our local institutions might not at once comprehend. All members of Society are members of the community, but all members of the community are not members of Society. A line of demarcation is drawn between those who are said to be in Society and those who are not. Perhaps the best definition which can be given of the two classes is that all who are on the Government House List are in Society, and all not found there, are beyond the pale.

The Hurkaru states, that, owing to the severe examples made by the Chief Magistrate, and the energy he has infused into the officers employed in the river police, there has been of late a great decrease in the number of thefts committed on the water. Formerly, scarcely a day passed without some complaint; for some time however there have not been more than one or two in a fortnight. A year or two ago the quantity of property stolen on the river, chiefly in the transport of goods to and from the ships, was estimated at five lakhs of Rupees a year. We are happy to learn that there has been such a diminution of crime, and are very willing to attribute it to the increased vigilance of the police; but a share of the praise is due to the new arrangement for the conveyance of goods, and to the construction of Cargo boats, in which the goods are placed under lock and key. We perceive that there is a Cargo Boat Association, and that it holds half yearly meetings, but we do not remember to have seen any report of its organization, or its success.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 1.

There is a long correspondence in the papers of this morning between two houses of business in Calcutta, the one charging the other with having withdrawn the valuable connection of a large Glasgow firm by representing that some of its goods had been pawned to the Union Bank, which charge has been satisfactorily refuted. The other firm asserts that no such advice was ever sent by it to Glasgow, but admits that a gentleman, recently admitted as a partner, did send home some advices to a friend before he was a partner, not very favourable to the character of the injured House. The matter, as we learn, has been put into the hands of Solicitors, and will afford employment to the gentlemen of the bar; and we shall not therefore allude farther to it.

The Bombay Times has received a letter direct from the Sandwich Islands, dated the 6th of April last. It gives a very full account of the grievances for which Lord George Paulet was sent there to obtain redress. The writer, after saying that his Lordship was sent to seek an adjustment of affairs, says, the rest you know. Unfortunately we do not know the rest; for there is a hiatus in the correspondence, just at the most interesting period of the negotiation.

The Rev. Mr. Anderson and his Colleagues in the management of the General Assembly's Institution and Branch Schools at Madras have followed the example of their brethren in Calcutta, and joined the Free Protestant Church of Scotland. Their salaries were drawn from the Missionary funds of the General Assembly in Scotland, and they have ceased to receive them since the first of July, trusting to obtain support, though on a diminished scale, from the funds raised for Missionary objects by the Seceders.

The salary of the Private Secretary of the Governor of Madras, is to be raised, we learn, to Rs. 1500, in the hope of securing the services of some Civilian of sufficient standing and experience.

The Joint Stock Bank of Western India has declared a dividend for the first ten months of its existence at the rate of six per cent. per annum.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER. 2.

The Nawaub Gazeer Ooddeen Mahomed, Nawanb of Dacca, is dead. By this casualty an allowance of about 50,000 Rupees a year reverts to Government.

The Beer on board the Hindoostan steamer was sour, or dead. This alarming fact was discovered before the vessel had got fifty miles down the river, and a remonstrance was drawn up to Capt. Moresby with forty-nine signatures. We can fancy the consternation which must have pervaded a vessel, with more than a hundred qui his, on board when it was found that the Beer was bad, and that there was little prospect of obtaining better before they got to Suez. We rather wonder they did not insist on the Captain's putting back instantly to Calcutta. The fault does not appear to lie with the Commander, who is not the purveyor, and who did all in his power to remedy the evil by purchasing 200 dozens at Madras. Capt. Engledue must look sharply into this matter. All his splendid saloons, and all his rapidity of transit, nay, even the excellence of his Hams and Turkeys, will be a poor compensation for stale beer.

The Englishman of this morning gives us a long and very flattering account of all the great things which Lord Ellenborough is about to do for Scinde. There is however an amusing simplicity in the following remarks of our contemporary; "If we are really to have no more wars, it is to be hoped that these plans of improvement will not be confined to Western India, but that Government will endeavour to lay out the surplus revenues in plans of permanent utility for the improvement of every part of the country under British rule." Why, we have been hoping the same thing for the last twenty years, but in vain. When Government has no money, it pleads poverty; when it is rich, it has no will. Twice within the last twenty years have we had a full treasury, and on one occasion it was emptied by a Burmese, and on the second by an Afghan war. Sad experience confirms the truth that Government has never been found less willing to improve India than when it has had the most ample means of doing so.

The Hurkaru states, that Government is about to make a move in the appointment of Deputy Magistrates, and that they are to be appointed to twelve of the most turbulent districts, namely, to those in which there are the greatest number of Indigo Factories. There are to be two grades; the lowest will receive 300; the upper 500 Rs. a month. The Indigo districts deserve the earliest attention of Government. We hope the new appointments will be followed up by disarming the belligerent powers, the Planters and the Zemindars, and that all private war for the redress of grievances will be rapidly extinguished.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 4.

The Alligator, from China, brings the intelligence that the commercial treaty with the Chinese had been signed, and was forwarded to England by Col. Malcolm, in the Akbar, which vessel sailed from Singapore on the 10th of August.

The papers notice the death of Lieut. Col. Grant, of the 39th N. I. at Nowgong, in Bundelkund, on the 21st ult. He appears to have been greatly beloved by his officers and men. As a tribute of respect to their deceased Colonel, the non-commissioned officers of the Regiment bore his remains to their last resting place.

The Friend of China of the 15th of June, which we happen not to have received, but which has reached the Star, says that the vast empire of China, through its length and breadth resounds with preparations for the possible, and, it is hinted the probable, and not remote contingency of another conflict with the English." We suppose however that the subsequent signing of the commercial treaty, of which we have just heard, may be considered as a sure indication of peace for sometime to come. That we shall have another brush with the Chinese before many years have passed, is however highly probable.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 5.

No addition has been received to the information communicated yesterday that the ratification of the China treaty was on its way to England on board the Akbar; nor have we received a single paper from China by this opportunity.

The Star notices that an "idea" is abroad that the removal of the Sudder Board and Sudder Court to Agra is not unconnected with the possible migration of the Governor General and his Council to that station. The present Lieut. Governor goes home this year, and Bengal being now a firmly consolidated dependency, under Mr. Bird, this transfer of the Governor General and his official suite might be a saving of some four or five lakhs of Rupees to the state. Our contemporary gives it as a rumour. We have no idea that the Council will ever move, however frequently the Governor General may. Calcutta is inconveniently situated for the seat of Government, now that our empire has stretched beyond Bengal, but so is London and so are many other capitals in Europe and America.

The Hurkaru conveys to us the gratifying intelligence that the first of the ice ships, the Angelo, reached Madras on the 22d instant, and may be daily expected in Calcutta. How would the Governor General lay society, both Civil and Military, under everlasting obligations, were he to send one of the steamers now lying idle in Calcutta, down to the lower floating light, to tow up this precious cargo.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 6.

An article appeared some two or three weeks ago in the columns of one of our contemporaries, stating that some of the new Police had behaved ill, in the state of Jhansi; but we have since learned that it is without foundation. There was not a man of the new police within a hundred miles of the scene at the time mentioned; though there might have been some police men belonging to the Jhansi Rajah. We believe our political Officers had nothing to do with the matter, as the robbers, seven in number, were a petty little gang of the remnants of Dhankunjso's party, headed by his nephew, whom he had brought up to his own trade. This nephew escaped when the uncle was shot by Jowabir, and the police of the Jhansi state have been in search of him ever since.

Sir Jasper Nicolls, having heard of the arrival of Sir Hugh Gough in Calcutta, and his assumption of the office of Commander-in-Chief, has, in a very neat and appropriate notification, taken his farewell of the army with which he has been connected for forty-one years.

We regret to notice in the Agra Ukhar, the sudden death, by an attack of Cholera, of Lieut. Col. Urquhart, of H. M. 39th Regiment.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 12.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1843.

• [VOL. V.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 7.

An advertisement, which appears in the last Calcutta Gazette, states the quantity of Salt in store at the various public depots at 61 lakhs of maunds. Supposing Government to receive a profit of two Rupees and a half upon each maund, here is a little purse of a million and a half sterling from a single article.

There is news from China to the end of July. Hong Kong has been erected into a Colony of the Crown, by Letters Patent, and the Capital is to be denominated Victoria. The whole of the debts of the Hong merchants have been liquidated, not however without subjecting the richer of them to large sacrifices. The General Regulations for the conduct of the trade and the Tariff have been published, and it was expected that the four northern Ports, which are to be the resort of British merchants under the treaty, would be open in the beginning of September after an Imperial Edict had been received from Peking. In the Proclamation issued on the publication of the commercial treaty, Sir Henry Pottinger gives the following very judicious assurance to those trading to China of his determination rather to exceed the powers vested in him, than to allow the spirit of the arrangement to be violated. "At the same time, it is the duty of the Governor in the responsible and unprecedented situation in which he has been placed by the course of events, to distinctly intimate, that he is determined, by every means at his disposal, to see the provisions of the Commercial Treaty fulfilled by all who choose to engage, in future, in Commerce with China, and that, in any case, where he may receive well grounded representations from Her Majesty's Consuls, or from the Chinese Authorities, that such provisions of the Commercial Treaty have been evaded (or have been attempted to be so), he will adopt the most stringent and decided measures against the offending parties; and, where his present powers may not fully authorize and sanction such measures as may seem to him fitting, he will respectfully trust, that the Legislature of Great Britain will hold him indemnified for adopting them, in an emergency directly compromising the National Honour, Dignity, and Good Faith in the estimation of the government of China, and in the eyes of all other Nations."

Sir Jasper Nicolls has, we find, taken his passage on the January Steamer from Bombay.

The last arrival from China has brought us the first numbers of a new journal called the Eastern Globe, which has just been started there. This makes the fourth English paper published in China.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 8.

The interesting ceremony of presenting new Colors to Her Majesty's 10th Regiment now in the Fort, took place in the Fort yesterday afternoon. In the evening, the Regiment entertained Sir Hugh and Lady Gough and large party at a ball and supper.

The Delhi Gazette gives a very dismal account of the health of the troops at Sukker. The number in hospital was 918, besides those in the lines who are excused from duty on account of debility. One surgeon, two Assistant Surgeons, and thirteen officers are suffering from fever and dysentery. The Artillery are able to man two guns only, and the three Regiments could not muster more than 500 men fit to bear arms. H. M. 13th Light Infantry is to proceed in a month or two to this station, where the Regiment is likely to suffer more from the effects of the climate than it suffered from the hostility of the Afghans.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER. 9.

The Relief of the Army in the approaching cold weather has been officially published, but it has transpired; and we learn with surprise that three Regiments now at half batta stations are to be removed to other half batta stations, and thus be subjected for two or three years more to diminished allowances. It is to be hoped that this act of injustice, will be remedied before the programme of the Relief is promulgated. While this most unjust, most arbitrary, most preposterous Order continues to disgrace our Military Code, it should be made as little oppressive as possible. Lord Ellenborough at the dinner just given to him in Calcutta, stated that before coming out, he informed the Directors that he intended to take especial care of the interests of the army. It is to be hoped therefore, that he will not fail to send home his own protest against the continuance of this heavy grievance.

Some years ago the Court of Request in its wisdom decided that a man was answerable for all the debts contracted for his wife, while a spinster. It therefore became necessary for every man wishing to become a benedict to enquire whether the young lady's School bills had been paid. The principle has just been banished from the Court. A gentleman has been sued for a debt contracted by his wife during her spinsterhood, and the plaintiff has been nonsuited.

The Queen Steamer has arrived at Bombay with General Simpson on board, but without the Hon. Mr. Maddock. All conjectures regarding the object of his visit are therefore at an end. He did not leave Calcutta to restore the Ameers of Scinde.

The Victoria Steamer left Bombay on the morning of the 27th of August for Suez. The Calcutta regular Dawk of the 13th and the Express of the 11th arrived before her departure.

The number of letters and newspapers sent by this opportunity is as follows:--Papers, 9731; Letters, 35 653. Total Covers, 45,387.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 11.

The Calcutta Gazette of Saturday evening publishes an order for the assemblage of an army on the banks of the Jumna near Agra, under the personal command of the Commander-in-Chief, to be called the Army of Exercise. It is to consist of 4 troops of Horse Artillery and 11 Companies of Foot Artillery, 3 Companies of Sappers, 3 Regiments of Dragoons, 3 Regiments of Regular and 1 of Irregular Cavalry, and the Body Guard, 3 Regiments of European and 9 of Native Infantry; in all 17,000 men. The assemblage of so large a force at a large expense for the mere purpose of exercise is so unusual, and the state of the public finances renders the establishment of so expensive a precedent so improbable, that the object is likely to partake more of a political than a military character. It is probably intended rather to produce an impression on the disaffected, than to afford our own officers a lesson in the art of manœuvring large bodies of men.

The Delhi Gazette states, that Mr. Clerk, the present Lieut. Governor of the North West Provinces, positively goes home at the beginning of next year, possibly in company with Sir Jasper Nicolls, and that the Governor General resumes charge of the North West Provinces.

The only intelligence from Lahore is that General Avitable has leave of absence for twenty days to visit Ferozepore and Ludiana; and that General Court has been permitted to resign the Seikh service and intended to embark with his family on the Sutlege for Bombay. The reconciliation between the powerful minister and the feeble occupant of the Lahore throne, is said to be complete.

The latest letters from Sukker are of the 24th instant. The number of the sick and the dying was increasing daily. Of the 55th, not fewer than 530 were in hospital. The whole number unfit for duty exceeded a thousand.—Friend of India.

TO CORRESPONDENT.

We can inform a SUBSCRIBER on good authority that at the close of the current year abstract statements of receipts and disbursements of all the charities will be published. The Auxiliary Branch of the Catholic Institute here is in abeyance but we have reasons to know that the expediency of reviving it will be maturely considered.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 13.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1843.

[VOL. V.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 14.

A correspondent of the Englishman states, that the rent received for goods lodged in the Bonded Warehouse amounted in the last half year to 29,152 Rs. and that the general charges, including the establishment, during that period amounted to 9892 Rs. or 34 per cent. on the rents. "No wonder the dividends are so small, and the share at a discount." The establishment and charges amount to a little more than 800 Rs. a month. Some reduction may possibly be made in this charge, but when property of vast amount is concerned, some person of respectability must be appointed to take charge of it, and 500 Rupees a month, is not beyond the average value of such an appointment. For augmented dividends, the shareholders must look to augmented rents.

The Ice has at length arrived. The supply is small, within two hundred tons; but the second vessel has now been four months on her voyage, and may be hourly expected. It is to be hoped that the Americans will not again leave us destitute of an article which has ceased to be a luxury, and is now reckoned among the necessities of life.

The Hindostan arrived at Galle late on Saturday evening the 19th of August; and was expected to sail on the 21st. It would thus appear that in Ceylon she was two whole days employed in coaling.

A notification has just appeared in the papers stating that Government had resolved to garrison the whole of the province of Scinde from the Bengal Army.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 15.

The Delhi Gazette states, that such is the ill feeling between the Muharrajah at Lahore and his Minister Rajah Dhyen Singh, notwithstanding their apparent reconciliation, that serious apprehensions are entertained of a serious breach between them. The King has assembled an immense body of troops at Lahore, ostensibly for the celebration of the Dusserah which comes off early next month, but it is far from improbable that the two parties, who are so nearly matched in point of military strength, may bring their disputes to an issue by an appeal to the sword.

The latest account from Sukker received through Delhi extends to the 28th ultimo, when sickness was on the decline. The casualties had not been so great as the number of those attacked might have led us to suppose. Sixteen Europeans, one woman and one child had, up to that day died of the prevailing fever.

Yesterday's semaphore announced the arrival of the Ellenborough from London, after a very short passage. Mr. Theodore Dickens, formerly of the Calcutta bar, then Ecclesiastical Registrar, and latterly a member of the extinct firm of Fergusson, Brothers and Co. is, we perceive, a passenger on her. It is generally supposed that he will resume his place at the bar.

The Star furnishes us with a return of the number of Coolies shipped to the Mauritius during the month of August last in eleven vessels. The number of men was 2109, of women 290, and of children 79; in all, 2479.

The Delhi Gazette has received intelligence from Cabul to the effect, that Dost Mahomed has been gradually losing ground among the chiefs, and that his pecuniary necessities have compelled him to resort to measures of great severity towards the poorer classes. He had even ordered those who were possessed of any English coin to bring it in. These proceedings exasperated both the chiefs and the people and they appeared in open arms against him. He met and defeated them; but though the victory was upon a small scale yet it served for a time to confirm his authority.

The post of Commandant of the King of Delhi's guards having become vacant, it is said to have been conferred on Willayat Ali Khan, on his paying down the sum of 10 000 Rs. which has been devoted to the expense of the Mission to England.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16.

The general Relief of the season has been published in General Orders. It is an exceedingly small one, and extends only to ten Regiments, of which four are unfortunately to be transferred from one half batta station to another. It is supposed however that when the Army of Exercise breaks up, there will be a more extensive relief.

The Bombay Times states, on the authority of letters from Hydrabad of the 6th of August that the weather remained cool and agreeable, and that the health of the troops, both European and Native, continued to improve. The Indus was supposed to have reached its height, the canals, tanks, and ditches were every where full of water. After all, the casualties in Scinde have been far fewer in number than we had been led to anticipate from the dampness of the climate.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 18.

The Englishman publishes a letter written at Bombay at half past six P. M. the 6th of September, which announces the arrival of a Steamer; but instead of being the Steamer with the august Mails, it turns out to be the Victoria, which left Bombay on the 27th August, with the Mails for Suez. She was five days running 550 miles. She experienced bad weather, and finding that her coals must run short before she could reach Aden, thought it prudent to return. This disappointment is owing to some improvements which were made in the vessel at Bombay, and which reduced her speed so much, that instead of being that fastest vessel from that Port, she is become the slowest. Happy are those who took the precaution of sending their letters by the Hindostan from Calcutta.

The Delhi Gazette states, that at a recent Durbar held at Lahore, was mentioned that many of the Sirdars of Moultan were anxious to afford assistance to the ex-Ameer Shere Mahomed, but the Dewan having intercepted the correspondence, had placed them under arrest, and threatened to treat with the utmost severity any one who should be found corresponding with them.

The Bombay Times in reference to Scinde says, that letters come in from Sukker and Hydrabad as punctually as from the most tranquil parts of the world; that the tidings brought are stale and flat; that there is no fighting, no sickness, no adventure, no stir, of any kind, and that even rumours of danger have died away; that the chiefs were coming in daily and that the country was becoming pacified with most unexpected celerity.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 19.

The Bombay Correspondent of the Englishman, in a letter of the 7th instant, states that the Cleopatra steamer was ordered to be in readiness to start with the returned mails and passengers of the Victoria. She was ordered to leave the port at daylight; but the Government despatches were not ready before 3 P. M., and she did not get to sea before 4½. It is scarcely possible for her to reach Egypt in time for the Peninsular Company's vessel.

The Ice from Boston, via Madras, has now arrived and is again for sale at the Ice House at the low rate of two annas a seer.

Papers were received yesterday from the Straits and from China, but their contents have been anticipated by a recent arrival with later intelligence. Numerous have been the conjectures regarding the appointment of Col. Butterworth to the Governorship of the Straits. One has it that he met Lord Ellenborough at the Cape, and got into his Lordship's favour; another that he married the daughter of Mr. John Bird, Member of Council at Madras, and niece of the Deputy Governor of Bengal; and we find a third reason for the appointment in the Singapore paper; namely, that he is the nephew of Mr. Butterworth Bayley, the Director. It seems as though the writers supposed that these separate or united claims were so strong that they need not be supported by any reference to personal merit. We have no doubt that Col. Butterworth will make a good Governor, and that he owes his own appointment to his own conduct in other departments of duty and not to despotism. But the removal of Mr. Blundell, must continue to be a blot on the character of this Government. He will soon be up here, and embark for England to lay his case before the Court of Directors, and if report speaks true, he will make some very singular and rather awkward disclosures. Friend of India.

OVERLAND MAIL.

The Express with news to the 4th August, arrived at ½ past 4 this afternoon Tuesday. The London Mail contains but little news of any interest. The loss of the Pegasus Steamer plying between Leith and Hull is mentioned—upwards of fifty lives lost. We mentioned after the arrival of the last Mail, that Mr. Dyce Sombre was under restraint. We see that a Commission de lunatico equirando has declared him of unsound mind from the 27th October last. The Government vote of 6,000,000 dollars as Opium compensation has been carried. The insurrection in Spain has triumphed, almost without a struggle; the revolutionists have possession of the capital and of the Queen; the government of Espartero is, for the present, at an end, and the Lopez ministry again in power. This revolution has been ascribed solely to the officers of the army, who are suspected to be in the pay of Christian. It was unprovoked and unpopular to an extraordinary degree; its success, therefore, appears to be mainly referable to the misconduct of the Regent himself, who, instead of striking a decisive blow, exhibited an apathy perfectly unaccountable, if not the result of cowardice. He remained inactive in the neighbourhood of Valencia till he lost the confidence of his supporters; and was then out-generated by Narvaez, who got possession of the road to Madrid. By the last account Espartero had joined Van Halen, and was engaged before Seville bombarding the city. It is said that his only motive for this is want of money for some exigency. Had the revolt terminated without bloodshed, his chances of being recalled were many, for when the coalition by which he has been overthrown shall have been broken up, which it is believed will happen soon, he would probably have been solicited to resume the reins of Government. The destruction he has caused, and the blood that he has shed, are calculated to injure him irreparably with his countrymen. Some most important despatches are understood to have gone out by the present Mail. It is said that the Steamer "Precursor" has returned from Russia; so we presume she has not been disposed of. The despatches received last month from India were, by permission of the Board of Control, submitted to a full Court of Directors. The Court of Directors of the East India Company have, at the request of her Majesty's Government, consented to the appointment of M. Jullien, as Vice Consul from the King of French at Bombay. Commodore Brucks, Indian Navy, has presented a memorial to the Court of Directors, praying for increased honours and emoluments to that branch of the service. The Queen has appointed Sir John Steward Richardson, Bart., to be Secretary to the Noble Court of the Thistle, in the room of Lord R. Kerr, deceased. Sir Augustus D'Este has, it is said, presented a petition to the Queen, claiming to be entitled to the titles of his father, the late Duke of Sussex. On the 3rd a dinner was given to Sir B. Brodie by the subscriber to a medal struck in honour of that distinguished surgeon, upon the occasion of his resigning the office of surgeon to St. George's Hospital. Several chests of arms have been seized in progress to the disturbed districts of Wales. The destruction of gates continues without the slightest abatement. The meeting of the British Association for the advancement of Science, at Cork, will surpass, in magnitude and magnificence, any former assemblage of that learned and scientific body. Preparations are being made for the most ample and comfortable accommodation of the multitude of visitors who will attend on the occasion; and arrangements have been entered into for the conveyance of passengers, in steamers, from London, Liverpool, Bristol, Plymouth, Glasgow, and Dublin. The bombardment of Seville by Espartero continues. The Princess de Joinville is to become Empress of Brazil, to the exclusion even of her eldest sister, the Queen of Portugal, if the Emperor Don Pedro II. and the Princess Januaria, the presumptive heiress of the throne, die without issue. This clause has been inserted in the marriage act of the Princess. Messrs. Briggs, Thurnburn, and Co. have paid a further dividend of 12½ per cent, making in all 24 per cent. Major Gen. D'Aguilar, who succeeds Lord Saltoun in command of the troops in China, proceeds to Hong Kong on board H. M. Ship Custard. It is generally stated that the Houses of Parliament will not be prorogued until the last week in August.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 14.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21.

The Steamer which brought the last Mail to Bombay announced the total loss, with all the Mails, of the Memnon steamer, one of the finest vessels in our steam flotilla. Misfortunes are said seldom to come single, and here are a couple of the sharpest disappointments at once. The mails sent from Bombay in July went to the bottom; those of August were brought back; and thus for two months there will be no communication between Bombay and London. Fortunately the bulk of our August Mails were sent on the Hindoostan, and will probably reach England in good time. The account of the loss of the Memnon was happily received in Calcutta in time to enable those who had sent remittances by her to send duplicates by the Express which leaves Calcutta this morning.

Man Singh, the Raja of Joudhpore, the last of the Rajpoot princes, who belonged to the days of independence and misrule, has just paid the debt of nature. His death will probably make the government of his principality more easy.

Sir John Norton, the puisne Judge of Madras, has been obliged from ill health to proceed on a voyage to the Straits.

The Government of India has made a requisition on the Madras Government for a Regiment of Cavalry, two Regiments of Infantry, and a battery of guns to be moved into the Saugur district. This may arise from a new disposition of military duty, by which the station of Saugur will be made over to the Madras army, or it may be connected with some arrangement for an attack on the independent chiefs in Bundelkund, who we are told have harboured the fugitive insurgents. The assemblage of a large army in the neighbourhood of Agra seems to point to something more than mere parade, to some political changes in Owalior or Bundelkund, which the presence or the advance of that army will serve to facilitate.

The Hurkaru gives a list of every Indigo factory at the Presidency, with the quantity of Indigo which each one is likely to supply this season. The sum total is 140,000 maunds; and we believe it is generally supposed that the crop will not fall short of that amount, and may possibly reach 150,000.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 22.

The Delhi Gazette of the 13th give news from Sukker to the 3d of September, which state that the sickness had not diminished. On the 1st of September, the 5d N. I. had upwards of 500 in hospital. There were three officers at muster and 200 rank and file. Dr. Menzies of the 55th had to perform the entire Medical duties of the Brigade, and, to make matters worse, scarcely a house was approachable in a buggy. The Correspondent of the Gazette throws little light on the dismissal of the three young Civilians. He merely says that Sir Charles Napier had written to Lord Ellenborough to say he did not want them, and to request three good working soldiers in their place. It would appear therefore that the severe and degrading punishment to which they have been subject has been brought on by idleness and not contumacy. If we mistake not, this is the first time in which indolence has been considered a penal offence in the Covenanted service.

The Hurkaru has heard a whisper that the reason why there has been so little apparent equity shown in the last relief of the army, by which three Regiments have been transferred from one half batta station to another, is that Lord Ellenborough expects to obtain the repeal of that obnoxious order. We have heard indeed that the Friend of the Army has made it a personal question with the Court of Directors; which is all very right and proper. Should the Directors grant it they will afford the example of a triumph over their own prejudices, deserving of immortal record; for the tenacity with which they have clung to the order has been exceeded only by its injustice.

The London Correspondent of the Hurkaru states that the London Booksellers have held a meeting with the view of concocting a plan for supplying India with cheap books. They think of printing cheap editions expressly for our benefit. We certainly ought to be exceedingly obliged to them for so great an act of generosity; and we hope they will not fail to carry their views into effect. It is but a truism that the cheaper books can be made, the wider will be their circulation, and the larger will be the appetite created for reading.

The Delhi Gazette states that the Press recently established by Rao Raja of Alwar is now in full operation. Two Hundred Copies of the Golistan have been already struck off, and other works are in progress.

Our contemporaries have all received parts of the Scinde Blue Book and are publishing one document after another. Our limited space does not allow us to reprint these papers, but as soon as we can obtain a copy of the work we intend to present an analysis of its contents to our readers similar to the analysis of the Afghanistan Blue Book.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23.

General Avitabile, with a numerous retinue of Seikhs, crossed the Sutledge on the 31st of August, at Ferozepore. His arrival being announced, to Col. Tulloch, commanding the station, who had partaken of his splendid hospitality at Peshawar, that officer immediately proposed to give him an entertainment on a grand scale; but the General declined it, pleading the shortness of his leave of absence, a single month, and that on sick certificate, which is of course moonshine, for he cannot have more than ten days at Simlah, which would be too short for the recovery of his health, but long enough for negotiation with the Lieut. Governor. He left Ferozepore on the 2d and reached Ludiana on the 7th, the Agra Ukhbar says "to arrange some political matter connected with the Punjab." General Avitabile travels en prince, his establishment consists of "numberless beautiful horses, elephants and mules, besides his traveling carriage," and, as it appears a regiment commanded by Col. Le Vant.

The Assam Steamer which has been fitted up for towing in the same manner as the public steamers, advertizes for freight at the very moderate rate of two Rupees a cubic foot or 10l. the ton of 50 cubic feet. Now, a case of merchandize may be brought from Liverpool to Calcutta for one-fifth the price of its conveyance, eight hundred miles from Calcutta to Allahabad by this steamer. It is true the Government freight when put up to auction sometimes sells for double this sum; but the regular charge of the cargo boats is only one-half of that charged by the Assam Company.

There was a rather numerous assembly of ladies and gentlemen yesterday to witness the examination of the boys in Seal's College. The Englishman says, the young gentleman who opened the business of the day was one Master Monmoth Doss Dutt, who acquitted himself with great credit, and made his exit amid a hearty round of applause. The classes were then examined in the History of Bengal, in English and English Grammar and Geography, &c. &c.; the questions were searching; the answers as usual, satisfactory. The examination we are farther told was interspersed with short dramatic soliloquies, and dialogues, and the little actors acquitted themselves well. The worthy Baboo the founder of this "noble Institute" was present,—and, says the Englishman, "if he were only as well pleased as he appeared to be * * * why he has received the reward—which amply repays him for the trouble and expense necessary to support the School."

The Hurkaru states, that Dr. R. H. Kennedy, who recently retired from the Bombay Medical Service, and who accompanied the Bombay division of the Army to Cabul and wrote a funny narrative of its doings which greatly delighted the Bombay Times, aspires to be one of our Honourable Masters, one of the Cabinet Council of the President of the Board of Control. He is about in short to stand for the Direction, and the Hurkaru calls upon all the Medical service to stand by him; and pronounces them not worth their salt if they do not.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 25.

The transgression noticed by the Star, which we committed in our last number, in quoting a part only of an article from his columns without saying that it was not the whole, arose from inadvertence. We should have given the whole article, but were obliged to omit the first part of it and several other extracts when the printers came to make up the form late in the evening, in consequence of the influx of European matter brought by the Mail. We endeavoured to remember not to forget to make a distinct mention of this fact, having before our eyes the chastisement the Hurkaru had received for a similar transgression; but in the hurry of ordering the form, we forgot our duty, and nothing is now left for us but to acknowledge the justice of the Star's condemnation. Yet who that remembers the heat of that awful night, Wednesday, the 20th instant, at 10 P. M. when even the topmost leaf of the tall Casuarina was unmoved with a breath of air, but would forgive such a lapse of memory?

Mr Anthony Desouza, a respectable Portuguese merchant of Calcutta, some time since paid his respects to the Pope at Rome, and was made Count of the Holy Roman Empire and Knight of the Golden Spur. The last Mail has brought intelligence that he has received from the Portuguese Government the rank of Portuguese Consul at Calcutta. Though there has not, we believe, been a vessel with a Portuguese flag in the Port for the last twenty years, yet the appointment of a Consul may possibly be the precursor of a rich fleet of Portuguese Argosies.

Yesterday's Star publishes some farther information regarding the Steam Navigation of the American rivers, which seems strongly to confirm the hope that if our vessels can be improved on the model of the American vessels, we shall be able to obtain greater speed, with a smaller charge for freight on our own rivers.

The Bombay Courier gives a full account of the loss of the Memnon Steamer, and of the sufferings of the passengers and crew before they were relieved. We have placed the melancholy narrative among our extracts. It appears that the Captain had experienced very foul weather for two days, and was quite unaware of his proximity to Cape Guardafui when the vessel rolled in upon the breakers. Our Bombay contemporary speaks of him as an officer of great merit.

The Delhi Gazette under the head of Lahore news states, that Dewan Surun Mull had written to Shere Singh to ask whether he should seize on that portion of the Scinde territory which bordered on his Government, and was told that such a step would be very advisable, but that he would receive his orders after the Dusserah festival. This looks strange. If the Lahore cabinet attempts to appropriate to itself any portion of Scinde, it will of course be tantamount to a declaration of war with the English.

The sickness at Delhi does not appear to have abated. The number of invalids in the hospital on the 15th September was 1395!—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 15.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26.

The Bombay Times received this morning, gives farther particulars of the loss of the Memnon Steamer, which was one of the largest, and most powerful in the Indian Navy, and cost Government eight lakhs of Rupees. It would appear as though the chief blame rested with the chief officer. The commander had been knocked up by two day's fatigue, and had laid down to rest, giving strict orders to be waked the moment land was sighted, as the head land of Cape Guardafui was known to be near. The land was soon after plainly visible. The officer nudged the Captain without waking him, and then continued to steer for an hour and a half right in upon the shore. The Captain was not waked till the unfortunate vessel was among the breakers.

A Correspondent of the Hurkaru states, that on the morning of the 23d of September, a daring dacoity was committed at Muneerampore, near Barrackpore. An old man who obstructed the passage was cut down, and property to the extent of 1000 Rupees taken. On the return of the thieves there was a dispute about the division of the booty, which led to the discovery of the villains, among whom it is said, there were nine sepoy of the 68th. But we have reason to believe that this latter part of the story is altogether fabulous. There has been no evidence as yet to connect any men of the 68th with the robbery.

A pamphlet has just been published in London, by Capt. Grover, entitled, An Appeal to the British Nation on behalf of Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly, whom the writer affirms to be still in confinement at Bokhara. We fear there is very little hope of their existence; the account of their death came from more than one quarter, and was given with so many circumstantial details, that there is too much reason to believe in its correctness.

The Bombay papers of the 13th, received yesterday in Calcutta, announced the departure of the Queen Steamer on the previous day. She arrived yesterday in Calcutta, having thus made the passage by sea round the Peninsula in nearly the same time which has been occupied by the Post in coming across the country.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27.

The Star states, that the Civil Ball to be given to Lord Ellenborough, is to take place on the 13th, and that a fancy Ball on a grand scale is to be given at Government House on the 20th.

The Star speaks of some probable changes in office in the Western Provinces. Col. Speira to succeed Col. Sutherland, Mr. R. N. C. Hamilton to succeed Col. Speira, at Gwalior, Mr. H. M. Elliott to succeed Mr. Hamilton as Secretary to Government, and Mr. Edmonstone to take Mr. Elliott's place at the Sudder Board of Revenue at Agra.

Intelligence has just arrived that Shere Sing, the ruler of the Punjab, and all his family were murdered on the 15th Instant.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28.

Yesterday the Hurkaru issued an Extra, announcing that Government had received intelligence by Express, of the murder of Shere Singh and all his family. How could our cotemporary get such a piece of information? Surely some one officially possessed of it must have blabbed. These are naughty doings, so soon after the Proclamation of the Governor-General.

A Buggalow has arrived at Bombay from Aden two days later than the Atalanta, bringing intelligence that nothing farther had been heard from the Memnon, but that a large Steamer, doubtless the Hindoostan, was seen bearing up for Aden soon after the Buggalow left it.

The news-writer of the Delhi Gazette, stationed at Poondiana, says that the object of General Avitabile in visiting our territories was to arrange a meeting between the Lieut. Governor and the Maharaja Shere Singh. It is as probable it was to be out of harm's way.

The same authority reports, that the Vakell of Bokhara, having been dismissed by Dost Mahomed, has reported to his Master, that the Dost had assured him he would not now be content till he had conquered Peshawur and Toorkistan; and, in consequence, the Khan has summoned his nobles and dependants to prepare for the threatened invasion. Certainly the Dost could never have a more tempting opportunity for the first of these projects. Are we to go to war with him again on that matter, and defend the territories of the Punjab in order to make them virtually our own? He is said, at the same time, to be anxious to enter into diplomatic relations with us: but that he may now suspend, till he has actually got Peshawur, and then the negotiations may be opened in reference to it, as "un fait accompli"—an extremely convenient element in modern diplomacy.

The Englishman says, it is stated in a London paper, that an assurance has been effected at Lloyd's on 24,785 dollars, being the savings of 230 Bengal Coolies, who are on their return from Demerara to Calcutta—which gives an average of about 200 Rupees to each man.

A fearful flood has been experienced at Surat, which began on the 6th ult. The public offices were closed, and many of the inhabitants reduced to a state of starvation.

The Bombay Courier says a drawing has been received from London of the sword intended for Lieut. Col. Outram. The hilt is to be ornamented with the Rose, Thistle and Shamrock in brilliants;—and otherwise it will be a splendid piece of workmanship.

The Hurkaru says that Dr. Bryce is a candidate for the vacant Professorship of Divinity. He was certainly far more in his place, here, as Secretary to the Stationary Committee.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30.

Our Cotemporaries record a deed of charity worthy of all commendation. A Gentleman, whose name is kept from the public, called upon Mr. King at the Great Jail, and made inquiry as to the amount for which the prisoners from the Petty Court were confined. Being informed it was about 1000 Rupees, he instantly placed that sum in Mr. King's hands; and the prisoners were released. May God bless him!

The Star says, that, at the dinner given by the Court of Directors to the Officers lately returned from India, Mr. H. T. Prinsep in returning thanks for the Civil Service of India, took occasion to remark upon the spirit which now operated against this body in high quarters in this country. The occasion was well chosen; and Mr. Prinsep was a very fit man to make the proper use of it.

The Star has a good article on the loss or misuse of the information communicated to Government, in Reports from its servants when appointed on various special duties. The evil has always been great; and now it is likely to be worse than ever. Do we dream—or was it a reality that Lord Auckland once appointed a Commission, to select from the Official Papers sent in to Government what was of general interest, and print their selections for public use? As the Conservative party have zealously promoted an analogous Commission for publishing selections from the public Records at home, we do not see why they might not grant us a similar benefit here.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 2.

The Shipping Report of yesterday, we observe, mentions the arrival of the Louisa Baillie from Demerara. Has she brought back our Coolies, with their 24,785 dollars?

The Amherst, from Arracan, reports the whole of the residents in that province as in excellent health.

The Bombay folks are in something of a quandary about the next mail from Europe; and the Hurkaru is naturally chuckling over our advantage in having the Hindustan to bring us our news at least, even if our letters be kept back. But who knows that the Hindustan may not be sent back via Bombay, as an anticipation of the arrangement that has been talked of?

The Madras Record states that the illegal exactions, for the repairs of heathen temples, lately complained of at Vizagapatam, have been done away with. We are glad to hear of it.

The Star thinks it probable that the affairs of the Punjab will call the Governor-General back to the North-West Provinces immediately; and the conjecture seems reasonable enough. His Lordship however, has not yet said anything, we believe about his intentions. Our contemporary adds, that as the Lieutenant-Governor of the N. W. Provinces is known to meditate a return to England in the cold season, a successor must be found, and rumour whispers that Mr. Thomason has been selected for the office. Rumour is, for once at least correct we believe; and certainly her trumpet gives a very acceptable piece of intelligence. There is no man better fitted for the post, or who better deserves such a reward.

The Gazette of Saturday removes Lieut.-Col. Spiers, to the Residency of Nagpore, so that the revolution at Gwalior will be left to work out its own course, and can be dealt with accordingly by our Government, at its leisure. In the meantime the watching of its progress is committed to Lieut.-Col. Sleeman, in addition to his charge of Bundelcund—an arrangement which at least shews, that, neither from the malicious attacks with which he has been assailed, nor from his independence in defending himself through the press, has he sunk at all in the confidence of Government—proclamations notwithstanding.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 3.

Moulmein Papers have come in, but seem only to shew, that the government of Major Broadfoot has not yet risen much higher in popularity; whilst the residents of the settlement are rather displeased with the abolition of their Debtor-Slavery and of imprisonment for debt—the latter chiefly, because it comes without previous intimation. One vessel is said to be sent off with rice to the south, whilst the place is in such danger of starvation that another has been taken up to bring a cargo of the same article from Calcutta.

Cape Papers bring sad accounts of the impossibility of bringing the insurgent Boors in the north to a settlement. They would be glad, it seems, to get the King of the Netherlands to father them—that is to give scope to their lawless aggressions by the nominal imposition of his authority.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 4.

The Agra Ukhbar of the 23d September reports the devastations of large flights of locusts at Agra, Futtyghur, Etawah and Dholepore. The visitation seems to have been very extensive and destructive.

The same Paper records the capture of a gang of twenty-nine dacoits, who occupied the Bugora jungles, by Lieut. Parker, 74th N. I. Among them were three desperate leaders, who were concerned in the murders at Indaratta in the Jeitpore country. The gang were hovering about a treasure party, of which Lieut. Parker had the command; and they were got hold of chiefly by the instrumentality of Ajeet Singh, an ex-Budhuk, of whom our contemporary has just published an interesting memoir. The capture is one of great importance to the peace of the country, and highly deserving of praise.

A correspondent of the Bombay Courier says, that Raja Mansingh, of Jotepore, having died there at midnight on Monday, the 4th Sept, his remains were burnt, with his Seren Ranees. Are these human practices never to be interfered with among our tributary states?

The Bombay Sunachar says that Government have unexpectedly raised the duty on Opium from Rs. 123 to 200 per chest—against which the Native Merchants have appealed.

The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court at Bombay in Parsee marriages has been maintained by the Judges there, and is expected to have a salutary effect upon Parsee morals.—Friend of India.

FRESH QUARTER TOLA PAPER.

MESSRS. D'ROZARIO AND Co. have just landed from the Atkinson, an extensive supply of large Quarter Tola Quarto Post Paper, stamped "P. S. D'Rozario and Co." at seven rupees per Ream, or seven annas per Quire. They have also received, Octavo Post and Chit Paper, at three rupees, and one rupee eight annas per Ream.

 An allowance will be made to parties purchasing Ten Reams or more.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 16.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1843.

[Vol. V.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER. 5

Colonel Hughes, against whom, from the proceedings on the late Court Martial, there seemed to be some pique in high quarters at Bombay, has been appointed to the command at Deesa, and so replaced in honour and confidence.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 6.

In noticing the remarks of the Bombay Times on the sycophancy of our Calcutta Society to Lord Ellenborough, the Hurkaru justly maintains that, whatever it may have been, the Press has had no concern in it. Nor is it likely to have. His Lordship is so much its friend as effectually to take care he shall not spoil it, by any of the means by which independence is usually corrupted. It has therefore reason to be grateful. The preservation of its integrity is worth infinitely more than the smiles and patronage it may miss.

The Star informs us that the Asiatic Society has determined to address the Government upon the expediency of immediately deputing a properly qualified person to examine and report upon the submarine volcano which lately broke out amongst the islands near Cheduba, on the coast of Arracan. We hope the application will be successful.

The Delhi Gazette of the 27th ult. gives two letters, signed T. on the relations between the British Government and the Royal House of Delhi, which may be taken, we suppose, as the opening of Mr. Thompson's war on behalf of the Shah.

Extensive flights of locusts are still spoken of at most of the stations in the Upper Provinces.

Our Delhi Contemporary has an interesting letter from a Correspondent, describing the advantages likely to arise from the navigation of the Nerbudda, and a plan of accomplishing it by wrought iron pontoons to be run out on the shore by wheels, attached for the time, at every insuperable obstruction in the river: proposing too the formation of a Joint Stock Company to carry the project into effect, under the countenance of Government.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7.

Another cargo of ice, said to extend to five hundred tons, is off Calcutta, in the Dorchester.

The Assam Steamer and her cargo-boat get on swimmingly. They were at Berhampore at half past nine A. M. on the 2d, having left Calcutta at 7 A. M. of the 29th ult.

It is explained, in to-day's Hurkaru, that the Governor General has had nothing to do with the leave given to ten men in each company of the Barrackpore Regiments to go on pilgrimage to Juggurnath. It seems the speedy removal of many of the Regiments from the neighbourhood of Orissa, by the approaching relief, had occasioned an unusual number of applications for leave to visit Pooree; and the extraordinary indulgence was granted by the General Commanding the station, at the request of the Commanding Officers of the Regiments. This is a very different story from the original version of the Englishman.

The Berenice, which was to leave Bombay with the Mail, on the 2d inst. had about sixteen passengers, besides children, engaged.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 9.

It is reported from Gwalior that a second deputation was to be despatched to Dholepore, to endeavour to prevail on Col. Spiers to return to the capital—of course to no purpose.

Moulmein papers have been received to the 20th September in which we see nothing worthy of note except a report that the Governor General has directed Sir William Norris, Recorder of Penang to proceed to Moulmein, to investigate the charges that have been brought against the late local authorities. We think the report very likely to be true: and we trust the investigation will tend to bring all the parties concerned to a right mind, and to heal the discords or discontents that have prevailed through the Province generally. In the mean time, we regret to see a disposition to scoff at serious piety, and to make those who make conscience of fearing God the subjects of silly ridicule.

The Gentleman's Gazette says, that the Parsees of Bombay are going to appeal to the Privy Council against the late decision, which has brought their marriages under the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 10.

The Assam Steamer reached Rajmuhul on the 5th instant at 9 A. M., continuing to do admirably.

The Englishman says, that the Arab Ship Atiet Riman from Muscat, was boarded by the Castle Eden on the 24th September, which reported the death of Sir John Norton, of the Madras Bench, on that day.

The meeting of the Subscribers to the Medical Retiring Fund, yesterday afternoon, was, we understand, rather stormy. At least the reception of the Report was opposed; and at last, the Accounts were passed only on condition that a Committee of Investigation should be appointed, on the continuance of the maximum rate of subscription, and the Reserve Fund. The Committee was appointed, and will proceed to its task immediately.

From the Hurkaru we learn, that Mr Frederick Currie, of the Sudder Court of the N. W. Provinces, is to succeed Mr. Thomason as Secretary to Government, on his proceeding to assume the Lieut. Governorship at Agra: and that the Secretaryship being given to a much younger officer than the present incumbent, Mr. Hamilton, a saving will be made in the salaries of both Governor and Secretary.

From the Singapore Free Press, we learn that H. M. Ship Samarang had been got up again, after nine days hard work and was found to be but little injured in her hull.

Lieut. Col. Butterworth arrived at Singapore, on the 27th August, and was immediately sworn in Governor of the Straits Settlements, and a Judge of the Court of Judicature, under the customary salute.

In the Friend of China of the 3d August, there is a Proclamation from his Excellency the Governor, which states, that it has been brought to his notice, that such a step had been contemplated as sending vessels with Opium to the Chinese Ports opened by treaty to Foreign trade, and demanding that it be admitted in virtue of the concluding clause of the New Tariff, which provides for all articles not actually enumerated in that Tariff, passing at an advalorem duty of five per cent. But his Excellency makes known to all concerned, that as Opium is an article the traffic in which is declared to be illegal and contraband by the Laws and Imperial Edicts, they will take such a step at their own risk, and, if British subjects, will meet with no support or protection from Her Majesty's Consuls, or other Officers.

The Authorities at Formosa connected with the massacre of the crews of the Nerbudda and Anne, have been found guilty of deceiving the Emperor by lies, and been handed over to the Board of Punishments. The Imperial Order closes with this remarkable language:—"In cherishing Chinese and Foreigners, we look upon each with the same equal benevolence. And the General and Intendant aforesaid having become amenable by their crime to punishment, we will not allow, that because the representation came from outside foreigners, it should be carelessly cast aside without investigation. Our own subjects and foreigners, ministers and people should all alike understand, that it is our high desire to act with even handed and perfect justice—Respect this."

A letter in the Hurkaru, from Chandernagore, describes a melancholy accident by which many lives appear to have been lost. Four boats full of young and old pushed off, to throw a large image of Doorga into the water, and one of them listed on one side, filled and sunk. The people jumped helter skelter into the other boats, which all went down too; and before others could reach the spot all had disappeared.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 11.

The Hurkaru of yesterday gave a startling report of an investigation at the Police Office, which shows how fast the duffadars are making the Cooly Exportation scheme work out the worst evils that were ever anticipated from it; and his columns to-day contain a letter from Mr. J. H. Miller, explaining how the case came to be discovered. That gentleman, being at the Botanical Gardens holiday keeping, last Saturday week, observed a human being floating down the river, and made off to save him, after first learning that it was a cooly who had jumped overboard from a ship anchored close by, to escape from emigration to the Mauritius. The man was picked up by a fishing boat, before Mr. Miller could reach him; but though greatly exhausted he crawled into his boat, clung to his feet and besought his protection—which was readily given him. When he was claimed by the people of the ship, (what was her name?) Mr. Miller very properly refused to deliver him up, but on the contrary immediately dispatched a note to Mr. Paton, the Chief Magistrate, by a bearer, informing him of the circumstance. With great promptitude, that gentleman sent two Police constables to the spot, with instructions to institute inquiries, and liberate such of the Coolies as were unwilling to proceed with the ship on her voyage. About forty or fifty availed themselves of the opportunity; and the poor creatures generally were found to be in a wretched condition. One was an insane woman, who, at the Police office said, the duffadars had prevailed on her to go on board, on the pretence that she was to go to Allahabad for her health. The depositions of all shew, that they were inveigled on the falsest representations, kept in rigorous confinement and cruelly treated. We trust the investigation will be followed up as it ought to be.—Friend of India.

Our Lieutenant Governor is said to be in considerable anxiety regarding the late events in the Panjab, and to have expressed a wish that the Governor General were on the spot, at Agra, where he could have joined him by dawk, to consult with him on the subject.

"The Army of Exercise," it is said, will assemble at the Poya Ghat, and, as the Gawlior affair appears likely to be no go, it will march towards the North-west frontier; unless, indeed, some fresh orders come 'the gathering' to take place farther up, probably at Delhi.

It is confidently stated that the Governor General and the Council of India are to proceed to the upper provinces, and that the Hon. Mr. Bird is to be left alone in his glory at Calcutta as Governor of Bengal. It is not, however, said, whether Agra or Allahabad is to be the seat of the Supreme Government; any how, the move would be a good one.—Agra Ukhbar, Sept. 30.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. '17.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1843.

[Vol. V.]

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 12.

Mr. C. B. Greenlaw, who has just vacated the office of coroner, we are told by the Englishman, has presented a cup as "a well merited tribute" to Mr. Von Lintzgy for the ability and integrity with which he performed the duty of interpreter to the Coroner's Court for twenty years, and as a testimony of affectionate regard and esteem for his private character. The Hurkaru states on the authority of a letter from Ferozepore of the 30th ultimo, that Dulleep Singh, who had been placed upon the throne by Dhyani Singh, had taken himself off together with the celebrated diamond, and that it was supposed he had sought refuge in our provinces.—Sawun Mull, the ruler of Mooltan, has been murdered, doubtless for aspiring to independence.—Tej Singh, the nephew of Khoosial Singh, has left the province of Peshawar to take care of itself, and retired to Lahore, for which Dost-Mahomed will not be ungrateful to him.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 13.

The Delhi Gazette states, that a serious disturbance had broken out at Khetree, about 25 miles to the west of Shekamutter, where an old Raneé Blutrathreejee, had collected a body of 5000 matchlock men and taken possession of a strong hill fort, ejecting the young Raneé, who is the mother and the guardian of the young prince. Major Forster, with a detachment of his brigade, was going to bring the insurgents to reason, and there can be little doubt that he will easily allay this tempest in a trice. The Delhi Gazette has taken up the proposal made by the Rev. Dr. Wolff to proceed to Bokhara, in person, and attempt the rescue of Col. Stoddart and Captain Conolly, which is warmly supported by a correspondent of that journal, who assumes the name of Fidelis. The first question is, whether the prisoners are alive or not. A detailed account of their execution was sent by Col. Sheil to our Government; but certain Jews of Bokhara have since declared that they were not put to death, and this has created a hope of their existence; but it is after all very faint. Supposing however that they are happily yet alive, it is much to be doubted whether Dr. Wolff would be successful in his attempt to procure their liberation. The King of Bokhara is now one of the greatest potentates in Central Asia. He has made acquisitions on the right hand and the left within the last three or four years, which have doubled the extent of his kingdom. There has not been so powerful a monarch in those regions since the establishment of the Dourane empire. His pride and haughtiness will of course increase with his power, and it is much to be questioned whether he would listen to any proposal for the release of his victims. Still the attempt ought to be made, if there be any one willing to undertake it; and we are certain that if Dr. Wolff were to come out here at once, instead of wasting his time in proposals at home, the whole sum required for his journey to Bokhara would be raised in a fortnight, and if necessary double the sum. The Hurkaru states, that all the troops which were under orders for Scinde, have been directed to stand fast at Ferozepore till farther orders.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14.

The Star of this morning states that the only Regiment ordered for Scinde, which is to proceed immediately to that province, is H. M. 13th Light Infantry, which will go down by water, preparatory to embarking for England. We have however heard from more than one quarter that the Regiment does not return home before 1845.

The military residents at Simlah have testified their gratitude to General Avitabile for his boundless hospitality to the officers going to and returning from Afghanistan, by an entertainment at which General Churchill presided, and proposed the General's health, in a long and eulogistic speech. Sir Jasper Nicolls was not present. The Hurkaru states that Government has resolved on posting a strong force on the banks of the Sutlege. The number is stated by our contemporary at 36,000, but the Star brings it within smaller limits. The assemblage of so large a force cannot of course fail to create a heavy drain on the Exchequer, now recovering from the effects of the Afghan War. We should not indeed be surprised to find that the unsettled state of things in the North West, produced a manifest effect on the public funds, more especially on the five per cents, which have risen to a premium of not less than Eight per cent., since we evacuated Afghanistan. We question whether this description of Securities have ever stood so high.

The report that the Half Batta order is to be entirely done away and for ever abolished, gains ground. It is affirmed in the most positive manner that the Court of Directors have actually agreed to the measure, and that the good news will be made public on the arrival of the next mail.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 16,

Another scene in the Punjab Tragedy has just been unfolded. A Delhi Gazette Extra received this morning announces that Lena Sing Majestee, was sitting with Hera Sing, making arrangements about the disposal of jagheers and offices, when a dispute arose between them which ended in the murder of Hera Singh. Lena Sing is said to have been joined by General Ventura, and Golab Sing, the fighting brother, is reported to be within forty miles of Lahore with an army of 25,000 men.

Great fears were entertained that the September Mail for Bombay would be delayed at Suez or Aden for want of a Steamer, in consequence of the loss of the Memnon. We are happy therefore to learn from the Bombay Courier of the 2d, that a native boat from Aden had brought intelligence of the arrival of the Akhbar Steamer from China, at that port on the 7th. She proceeded immediately to Suez, which she was likely to reach about the 14th, quite in time for the Mails. The Hindoostan was at Aden on the 2d of September; and we may now have a race between her and that first rate Steamer, the Akhbar. It will be decided, possibly, before our paper goes to press whether the Mail, by the Hindoostan direct, will reach Calcutta, in less time than the express reaches it from Bombay when brought to that port by the fastest of the Steamers. We are happy to find in the Englishman of this morning, a confirmation of the statement which has been some time current, that the lamentable loss of life in the two European Regiments which proceeded up the river last year, through the upsetting of the crazy country boats, had induced the Court of Directors to order the construction of iron vessels, for the transportation of troops. This measure is as much one of economy as of humanity, for the cost of the new vessels will not long remain uncovered by the pecuniary saving which will be effected by the safe conveyance of European troops.

The papers announce the death of Major Craigie, Deputy Adjutant General of the Army, at Dimpore, at the age of 44, deeply and sincerely regretted. It will be no easy matter to supply his place in the office.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 17.

Bombay papers to the 4th reached Calcutta yesterday; they were consequently twelve days on the road. The number of papers and covers despatched by the Berenice on the 3d of October was 44,972; namely, letters 34,480, and covers 16,492. The Calcutta-regular post of the 21st arrived in time for the steamer. The September Mail was expected to arrive early at Bombay if sent on by the Akhbar Steam frigate; and late, if sent by the slow coach of the Cleopatra. The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states, that the latest article of curiosity which has arrived there is a valuable breakfast service sent by her Majesty Queen Victoria to Shere Singh. The cups and saucers must remain in deposit till the last scene of the tragedy has closed, and it is determined to whom the Punjab belongs.

A number of the Bunder gang, who according to the Gentleman's Gazette, had embarked in the most extensive conspiracy ever known in India, have been brought to condign punishment. Eight individuals have been sentenced to transportation as receivers of stolen property. This result is calculated to disappoint those who have been expecting the most astonishing discoveries and the most extensive retribution; but the Gentleman's Gazette which has been sounding the alarm in the ears of the Bombay public, official and non-official, of these crimes against the public interests of society, takes great credit to himself for the conviction. Yet strange to say, the prosecution of this great offence has not been taken up by Government, but left to private individuals. The expense, it is said, has been actually defrayed from private subscription. The Stag, just arrived from the Mauritius, brings up Mr. Anderson, the Protector of Coolies, on a special Mission to the Right Honourable the Governor General, as well as the Secretary of the Governor of that Island. What have they come for? We can suppose no more appropriate errand than that of making arrangements to carry the provisions of the original plan into effect, by establishing a Government Agent here.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 18.

The Hindoestan anchored off Calcutta yesterday at 10 A.M. She has thus delivered her letters and appears in forty days and eighteen hours.—Friend of India.

OVERLAND NEWS.

Her Majesty prorogued Parliament in person on the 24th of August. The royal speech comments on the most important subjects of discussion during the past season; proclaims, as such documents almost invariably do, the continuance of a "friendly disposition" on the part of foreign powers; dwells feelingly on the recent religious schisms in the Church of Scotland; expresses deep concern at the shameful perseverance in the Irish agitation for the repeal of the legislative union, and announces a "firm determination" to maintain it inviolate. It also speaks resolutely with regard to the disturbances in Wales, judiciously observing, as a rider to that vexata question, that inquiry has been directed to be made into the causes of the late disturbance of peace and destruction of public property. Strange to say, no reference whatever is made in this royal address to any affairs connected with the East.

Capt. Douglas, of the 49th Madras N I has been admitted to bail. Mr. Wigram Money is one of the securities. At a meeting of the Privy Council, held on the 23rd Aug. a seal for the island of Hong Kong executed by Mr. B. Wyon, Chief Engraver of Her Majesty's Seals, was approved of. Dr. O'Shaughnessy, of the Bengal Medical Service, is to have the first vacancy which may occur in the list of Deputy Assay-master to the East India Company.

Lieut. Col. C. Carmichael Smith, C.B., has memorialised the Court of Directors, urging upon their favourable consideration the strong claim of the 4th regt. Local Horse, which corps, at his recommendation and while under his command, volunteered their services for Afghanistan. The Press announces that Mr. Lagrenée the ambassador to China, will leave for that destination on the 15th October next, accompanied by Mr. de Ferrière, his first secretary M. d'Harcourt and six other attaches, a physician, and several commercial delegates. Two hundred and thirty non-resident members of Oxford University Convocation have addressed a memorial to the Vice Chancellor, deprecating the treatment of Dr. Pusey, in censuring his sermon without setting forth the reasons. The first signatures are those of Lord Dunsannon Lord Courteney, Mr. W. E. Gladstone (President of the Board of Trade), and Mr. Justice Coleridge. Dr. Wynter refused to receive the memorial; partly rebuking the memorialists for an attempt to overawe the Governor of the University. The Oxford Chronicle says:—"We are informed that a paper containing the signatures of nearly 1,000 of the clergy, to a protest against Tractarianism, has been withdrawn from circulation, in consequence of the earnest remonstrances of several of the bishops." No account of the Indian Mail at the time going to press. Notice has been given that the Mail for India will in future be dispatched from Southampton, on the first day of each month, unless it shall be Sunday, in which case the Mail will be dispatched the day preceding. Her Majesty's ships Erebus and Terror have just arrived from a voyage of discovery. Though the Paris papers seem to think that the Queen of England will visit the French capital, the impression in this country is that her Majesty will embark at Fretport for Brighton early to-morrow morning. It is believed the Queen has received from the King of the French and his respected Consort a promise to visit London next year. The Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice are staying at Brighton. The King of Hanover has left England for the Continent. The Chairman and some of the Directors of the East India Company are about to proceed to Liverpool, to inspect a steamer which has been specially built for the navigator of the Indus; she draws only 18 and 22 inches of water. A public meeting is to be held to-morrow at the Crown and Anchor Tavern for the purpose of taking measures for the immediate despatch of the Rev. Mr. Wolff to Bokhara.—London Mail.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19.

By the last arrival from the Persian Gulf, we learn that Seyed Ben Calfaun has been appointed American Consul at Muscat and its dependencies. The appointment is said to have given general satisfaction as that gentleman speaks English fluently, and has always manifested the utmost kindness both to Americans and English.

We believe that it escaped us at the time to state, that the Directors of the Bank of Bombay had received permission of the Supreme Government to establish a Branch in Calcutta with no other restriction save that of issuing their notes. From the Bombay Times we learn that no effort has been made to take advantage of the permission, though the Bank itself appears to be labouring under a plethora, and is drowy from repletion. We should have thought that at a time when the Union Bank was, as it respects real banking operations, in a state of suspended animation, and the Bank of Bengal dividing 14 per cent per annum, such an opening would have been eagerly embraced.

The Star's home correspondent tells him by the last Mail that there was some half idea of the Ministry's doing justice to themselves by recalling Lord Ellenborough, but the idea has died out and his Lordship will not be recalled,—and he will not resign while his friends are in power. The Scinde affair will not come under discussion before the next Session, and not then—for by that time the internal state of the country will demand all the time that Parliament can command. Mr Roebuck, who seems to act the part to Lords Auckland and Ellenborough which Mr. Paull acted to Lord Wellesley, has according to the last accounts abandoned his opposition to the retention of Scinde and confines his censure to the mode of its acquisition.

The Bombay papers state, that an express had arrived at that Presidency from the Governor General, suspending the order for the withdrawal of the Bengal troops by whom it was to have been garrisoned. All the Bombay troops are, it appears, to stand fast in the province, and the Bengal troops who had been ordered to relieve them will stand fast at Feroz-pore till matters are a little settled in the Punjab.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 20.

The news regarding the detention of the Scinde bound troops at Feroz-pore is confirmed. An express had been received by Col. Richmond from the Commander-in-Chief to that effect; but the express had been anticipated by the Colonel and Mr. Greathead, who would allow none of the troops to pass down until they were relieved.

The festival of the Dusserah, which was expected to be marked by farther commotions at Lahore, has passed off quietly; and the account published in the Delhi Gazette Extra of the murder of Heera Sing has not been confirmed. Neither is it certain that Duleep Sing has left the Capital with the diamond, and sought the protection of our Government. We have indeed no accounts on which any dependence can be placed subsequent to the great tragedy which closed with the death of Ajeet Sing.

Our Bombay friends are dumfounded by the non-arrival of the Mail, while we for once are revelling in its contents, having received not letters and newspapers only, but the whole of our monthly Periodicals, within fifty days after their publication in London. The conveyance costs but a trifle compared with the overwhelming expense which their transmission from Bombay would have entailed.

General Avitabile, who is released from all previous obligations by the recent tragic events at Lahore, is said by the papers to have been earnestly invited back; and, if we are not much mistaken, he is actually about to return thither, a measure for which it is impossible to account, considering the safety of his fortune in English funds.

The troops under orders to move, which are ordered to stand fast on the banks of the Sutlege, are, the 4th Troop 1st Brigade Horse Artillery, 3d Company 5th Battalion Artillery with No. 5 Light Field Battery, the 3d and 7th Light Cavalry, and the 6th, the 15th the 19th and the 64th Native Infantry.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21.

The 52d Regiment of Native Infantry now at Barrackpore has been somewhat suddenly ordered to Goruckpore, to relieve the 41st, which is understood to have suffered much from sickness.

The Hurkaru states on the authority of a correspondent, that a rumour prevails of Golab Sing's having been assassinated on his way from Jumbou to Lahore. No confirmation is given of the murder of Heera Sing, reported in a Delhi Gazette Extra, and it may turn out to be premature. The death of the warlike Golab Sing would produce a greater effect on the destinies of the Punjab, than the removal of the young and inexperienced Heera Sing. The ashes of Shere Sing and his son Pertab Sing had arrived at Loodiana, on their way to the family tomb at Hurdwar. They were received with every demonstration of military respect.

The Hurkaru observes, that at a grand tiffin party given on board the Bentluek Steamer in August last, the Chairman, Sir John Campbell, complained of the little support given to Steam Communication by the Indian community, and our contemporary considers this language to have a suspicious air, and to point to the proposed abstraction of the Hindoostan and Bentluek from our port, which was mooted some time ago. We have however been given distinctly to understand that at the time when the last Mail left England, not the most distant idea of any such arrangement was entertained by that Company.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 23.

The last Calcutta Gazette gives the names of the Officers whom the Governor General has selected for the command of the Army of Exercise. The subordinate staff is to be filled up by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

The amount of Bills drawn by the Home authorities on the Calcutta Treasury by the last Mail, amounts to ninety one lakhs of Rupees. The greater part of this sum is designed to pay the Opium claims, which Parliament has fixed at the rate of about 600 Rupees a chest. This is a far higher sum than the Opium Agents had any reason to expect. The arrival of this large sum will ease, as they say, the money market.

The Express came in from Bombay yesterday. The Mails by the Victoria reached that Port on the 11th of October, and the Express has been eleven days on the road !

We learn from the Star that the Commander-in-Chief landed at Allahabad on the 7th instant, and was received by the Buffs and the left Wing of the 18th Regiment. His Excellency presented new colours to the 37th N. I. in lieu of those which were lost in the disastrous retreat from Cabul. The Regiment was commanded by the brave Major Griffiths, to whom Sir Hugh Gough paid several handsome and well merited compliments on the gallantry he had displayed throughout the whole of the Afghan campaign, and especially on the retreat. Why should it be a rule of the British service, that an officer by falling into the hands of the enemy, through under the most honourable circumstances, should forfeit all claim to any reward for his previous services however noble and exemplary they may have been?

Mr. Paymaster Routh, of H. M. 15th Hussars, has been found by a Court Martial guilty of the embezzlement of large sums of money and sentenced to transportation for seven years.

Great doubt hangs over the report of Heera Sing's death which the Delhi Gazette appears to have published rather prematurely. The last number of the journal now received states that a report prevailed in the city, that some bankers had written to their friends in the Punjab, to inquire whether Heera Sing was really dead or not, and that the answer was that he was alive. The 13th half yearly meeting of the Docking Company was held at the office of the Secretary, Rustomjee Cowasjee, Esq. To all appearance, this is the most flourishing Company in Calcutta. It works with a capital of about six lakhs, pays its Secretaries, as it is said, 2000 Rupees a month, and is yet able to divide a profit of sixteen per cent. There were eight gentlemen present and it was unanimously resolved that the accounts were very satisfactory.

Military stores are daily sent off from the Delhi Magazine to that at Ferozepore.

General Sir Jasper Nicolls and his family leave Simlah on the 20th October for Ferozepore on their way to Srinde, Bombay and England.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 24.

The sixth Criminal Sessions in the Supreme Court were opened for the present year on Monday last. The Clerk of the Crown appears to have ceased altogether to summon civilians, who formerly constituted one third of every Grand Jury. On the present list there is not one Civilian; there are three Natives; the rest are Merchants and Agents. The Chief Justice charged the Jury. The number of cases on the calendar, forty-four, is very considerable, considering that there are now seven sessions instead of four.

WEDNESDAY OCTOBER 25.

The Star has a long and interesting article in this morning's paper on the assemblage of the Army of Exercise, which will consist of as many corps as were originally assigned to it before the disturbances in the Punjab broke out. Our contemporary appears to think that work has been cut out for it in the Gwalior state, unless the demands of Government should be unconditionally complied with. Any arrangement which should leave a shadow of independence to this worn out despotism, would be most inadvisable. It is time that the whole country was brought under one administration. In every instance in which we have occasion to resort to arms, the occupation of the country should be complete and final.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY. OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 19.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 25.

The Assam Steamer reached Allahabad on the 19th, having made the trip in twenty days; no very great feat for so powerful a vessel, encumbered with so light a Cargo boat astern.

The report of Heera Singh's murder is now distinctly contradicted. He is conducting affairs at Lahore conjointly with Lena Singh.

Capt Somerset, Military Secretary to the Governor General, proceeds to the Western Provinces immediately by dawk. This movement is thought by many the precursor of his Lordship's departure.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 27.

The Star has obtained a copy of the Gibraltar Chronicle of the 28th of August which details the loss by fire of the Missouri U. S. Steam Frigate. It appears that every possible assistance was rendered by the English Steamers present, and by the Commandant at Gibraltar. The present year seems peculiarly inauspicious to Steamers both English and American. The loss of the Missouri is an irreparable loss, as it constituted one-half the United States sea-going Steam Navy. John Quincy Adams, some time since ridiculed the idea of America's going to war with us, with only two Steamers against our two hundred. If our memory does not fail us, he said that one of them was laid up, with a large hole in her side. Whether the Missouri was the disabled or the sound steamer, however, we cannot say.

The Deputy Governor has, it is said, given one of the twelve appointments of Deputy Magistrate to Chunder Mohun Chatterjee a relative or connection of Baboo Dwarkanath Tagore, the gentleman who accompanied him in his visit to England last year.

The Englishman gives a letter from Moulmein, of the 12th of October, which contains little news. The writer states that the timber duties still continue a source of vexation to the settlement; that there is a report that the Commissioner intends to remove his present residence;—he is living we believe in a hired house, and to draw the town to Tavoy-Zoo, a mile to the southward, which the writer, and others think will be an improvement. The letter ends with, "Altogether, Moulmein is improving." On the other hand there is a letter in the Hurkaru of this date which says, "It is farthest from my thoughts to detract one iota from the merits of the present gallant Commissioner, Major Broadfoot, but his policy has been to throw suspicion if not blame on his predecessor to shew that all has been wrong." If this be true the Commissioner has been following the example set him by a high authority, which example as it has no foundation in past usages, will we hope have no influence on future functionaries, except by pointing out to them the course which ought by all means to be avoided. It is the part of greatness to correct evils, of littleness to censure them.

A correspondent of the Hurkaru states, that the worship of Doorga has been more diffused this year in Calcutta, the centre of illumination, than on any former year. He affirms that two thousand images have been made, and that the highest sum spent in any poojah was 13,000 Rs. If a hundred Rupees be the lowest average of the expense of each poojah, the sum laid out will have been two lakhs.

Mr. George Clerk, the Lieut Governor of the North West Provinces, has received serious injury by a fall from his horse, and was, according to the last accounts, lying dangerously ill at Simlah.

We were wrong in stating that General Avitabile was returning to the Punjab. We learn from the Delhi Gazette that he had passed through that town on his way to Calcutta. We learn also with much regret that he, who allowed the British officers "to drink his cellars dry," who kept an open table for 30, 40 or 50 officers daily, was not received with honour or hospitality at Delhi, a blot on the escutcheon of Delhi, which will not be soon obliterated.

Government is said to be about to construct a fort at Ferozepore, which is to be capable of holding the treasury and the magazine, and of resisting any marauding attack that can be made.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28.

The Hurkaru of this morning has an article on "American repudiation,"—the transatlantic term for the non-payment of debts—and alludes to a petition from General Sir John Wilson who invested 7500*l.* in American State securities, of which the dividends have ceased to be paid. He writes to an American, General Scott, with whom he fought nearly thirty years ago at the battle of Chippewa, and to whom he says, "I have a wife and six children, and two of your musket balls are lodged in my body. Will you, then, my dear General, pardon my writing to you, and inform me whether or not in your opinion, the Legislature of the above states are wanting in those high feelings of honour and honesty for which I gave them credit, or whether their present embarrassment has risen out of unexpected difficulties and that they have not had sufficient time to meet their engagements?" Our contemporary speaks rather disparagingly of the previous letter of Sydney Smith, and says that with all its force and good sense, "his petition produced no great commiseration for him personally." We do not think he cared a straw about the money he had lost. None of the great Smiths, neither Percy, nor Sydney, nor Courtenay, were ever remarkable for a love of money. Had Sydney cared about money, he might have been worth 300,000*l.* as an Irish Bishop ere now; but his object was to pay off the Americans for their dishonesty; and deeply has brother Jonathan felt his terrific censure. He will not soon forget that sentence, that "the Americans prefer any amount of infamy, however heavy, to any amount of taxation, however light."

Our Bombay friends are again unfortunate in spite of their "advantageous position." Their July Mails were lost in the Mennon; there we suffered in company, for ours were lost likewise. Their August Mails came back, whereas ours did not, as they went in the Hindoostan. And now all their Magazines and Periodicals of September have been left behind, just at the time when we have for the first time received ours early and cheap. But the magnanimity with which the ever cheerful Courier bears these disappointments is truly exemplary, and eminently edifying.

The Englishman gives the names of a number of gentlemen, ladies and families, who go home next month in the Hindoostan; twenty-seven in number; but we have heard that she will go full again—and no wonder, after the splendid run of the last voyage. The sailing vessels will deeply feel the competition of the two Steamers.

The Englishman says that Mr. Thomason leaves Calcutta immediately to assume charge of the Government of the North West Provinces, in consequence of the severe accident which Mr. George Clerk has experienced. The last accounts from Simlah gave strong hopes of his recovery; but this accident will probably unfit him in his weak state for public business, and make him anxious for the arrival of his successor. Mr. Thomason's successor, Mr. F. Currie, has arrived in Calcutta.

The Commander-in Chief announces in General Orders that it has appeared to Government necessary to strengthen the North West Frontier and to maintain a powerful force at Umbala. For this the troops in the Meerut division are to be chiefly employed. Major General East will therefore retain a subordinate command, and Major General Sir R. H. Dick, commanding the Meerut division, will take the command of both the Sirhind and the Meerut divisions, and the charge of all Military movements.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 30.

The Englishman stated on Thursday last that in consequence of the representation of one of his correspondents, the Grand Jury had gone to visit the Grand Jail, which was said to be in a filthy state. The correspondent is disappointed. They found the Jail in the best order, and in the most cleanly state. The nuisance complained of, arose from an invasion of the apartments in the third story, appropriated to the better class of debtors, by a whole army of rats. This circumstance was duly presented to the Judges, but though the members of the Grand Jury informed their Lordships "that measures were already in progress for remedying the evil in a manner which they felt confident would prove effectual," yet they did not descend to particulars, nor inform the Court for the benefit of the country at large what those means were. We hope the next Grand Jury will follow up the matter and visit the third story of the Jail in person to see whether the warm anticipations of success entertained by their predecessors have been realized. There are other places besides the Grand Jail overrun with rats, and the discovery of a sovereign and effectual remedy will be a national blessing.

The Municipal chest is empty; the lighting and watering of the city of Palaces is almost at a stand, and the magistrates are at their wit's end to discover the means of replenishing the chest. At the last meeting various plans for raising a revenue were discussed. That of taxing vehicles was mooted and rejected because of the difficulty of collecting it. At length two of the Magistrates proposed to increase the assessment by 1½ per cent. Mr. Blaquiere opposed the innovation, and wished the lighting and watering to be lessened so as to come within the present means of the Magistrate, which advice, however agreeable to the venerable adage of cutting the coat according to the cloth, is not exactly the most effectual mode of improving the town. Mr. Montrion, who was absent, was called in, but did not feel himself competent to give an opinion. The matter is postponed.

We are happy to learn that the last accounts from Simlah represent Mr. George Clerk as better. Dr. Robertson had been called in to assist at a consultation. It appears that he has received a concussion of the brain by a fall from his horse.

Major Patrick Grant has been appointed to succeed the late Major Craigie as Deputy Adjutant General of the Army with the official rank of Major, and Capt. J. R. Lumley steps into the post of 1st Assistant.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31.

The report of General Churchill's death, though given in all the papers of the Presidency, is now said to be incorrect. Subsequent letters from Simlah make no mention of it, which is fatal to its authenticity. The latest letter from thence, one of the 20th October, states that Mr. George Clerk was going on extremely well.

A Calcutta Gazette Extra, announces the approaching departure of the Governor General for the North West Provinces. The draft of the usual Act for conferring all powers, except those of the Legislative Council, on his Lordship is also published; and Mr. Thomason is gazetted as the successor of Mr. George Clerk, in the Government of the North West Provinces.

The Star of this morning gives a somewhat different version of the remarks which fell from Sir Lawrence Peel last week, regarding a proposed alteration in the law of debtor and creditor. He says "Government has requested the Judges of the Supreme Court to prepare the draft of a new Insolvent Act, the present expiring in a year or two, and that such Act will be passed by the Home Legislature if approved of. Sir L. Peel said he trusted that at no remote day the power of a creditor to arrest his debtor and detain him in prison would be much abridged," &c. His Lordship also stated that any relaxation, however, of the present law ought to be accompanied by more effectual, speedy and cheap means of realizing the property of debtors where any existed—and we may add, in the case of Natives, by a more stringent law of Registration, to prevent that fictitious alienation of property which always takes place when a man wants to cheat his creditors.

Intelligence from China to the 29th of August has reached Bombay. It is not of any stirring interest. The enquiry which the Emperor instituted into the conduct of the Formosan authorities, regarding the murdered crews of the Ann and the Nurbudda, has terminated in a confession of their guilt. They have been made over to the Board of Punishments; but it is thought they will come off without suffering much injury. The opium trade continues to flourish under other flags; though as soon as the treaty came into operation, all the British opium smuggling vessels and an American receiving ship left the river. Hong-Kong had proved very unhealthy, and it had been found necessary to appoint a Board of Health to investigate the cause.

WEDNESDAY NOVEMBER 1.

Cape papers have been received to the 95th of August. They announce the death of Lady D'Urban; also the "glorious intelligence of the entire pacification of Natal." At a meeting of the emigrant farmers at Pietermaritzburg, the terms of the Governor's proclamation for the settlement of Natal affairs was accepted.

The Star states that Lord Ellenborough's departure is fixed for the 1st instant. Most probably it will take place much earlier. His Lordship we learn goes up by dawk, and returns before the hot winds set in next year.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 20.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1843..

[Vol. V.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2.

We accidentally omitted to state last week that Major Mackesson, C. B., who had been employed in high political trusts during the Affghan war, in which he had earned no ordinary reputation, and who was subsequently remanded to his own Regiment, where he was employed on the Staff, has again been placed by Lord Ellenborough in a political situation, in which there will be scope for his talents. Thus the present administration has been relieved from another opprobrium; for no one could fail to perceive that the appointment of one who had earned a Brevet Majority and a companionship of the Bath by his ability, to a Regimental Quarter Mastership was disgraceful only to Government. Of the officers who served with honour under Lord Auckland and were subsequently proscribed, there remain therefore only Col. Outram and Majors Macgregor and Pottinger, of whom the two former are in England, and the latter in China.

The Court of Directors, says the Star, have refused to Mr. Fox, the author of the letters signed Quarter Century, in which the system pursued by Government towards their own European troops and non-commissioned officers was exposed in the most masterly style, the pension of £60 a year to which he is entitled by 22 years service in India and 17 in the department from which he was removed—thereby hearing testimony themselves to the truth of Mr. Fox's statement of grievances.

The Registration Act, which has been long on the tapis, has been at length passed. It is of course only a temporary measure, for all Registration to be beneficial must be compulsory; the validity of a deed must be made to date from its registration and not from its execution. There must be no exceptions; and it is the business of Government to establish such machinery as shall be sufficient for the registration of all deeds without inconvenience to the people. The fees of Registration will always pay for its establishment. We are sorry to learn from the Calcutta Christian Intelligencer that the Archdeacon was unable to return to Calcutta on the Hindoostan from indisposition. We are not a little surprised that this information should not have transpired until more than a fortnight after the arrival of the Hindoostan.

The Lecture on Education, which was to have been delivered by Mr. Montague, of the Parental Academy, on Tuesday evening at the Mechanic's Institute was postponed, and very properly, for want of an audience, for there must be two parties to a lecture, the lecturer and the lectured. On this occasion there were not a dozen present.

A correspondent of the Hurkaru states, that by the extinction of Runjeet Sing's family, the Sikh state on the left bank of the Suttee reverts to us by virtue of a treaty which exists between the two Governments. He calls this resumption; but the estates were never in our possession.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 3.

The Delhi Gazette states, that the Sudder Board, and we suppose also the Sudder Court, were to commence their march from Allahabad to Agra on the 1st of the present month. There does not seem to be any particular object in this movement, unless it be intended to continue to Agra the gift of a separate Government with a Lieutenant Governor to superintend the Civil, Criminal and fiscal details of the administration, for Agra is not more central than Allahabad was. Yet we are told that the question of perpetuating a separate Government at Agra is to be brought under discussion in Parliament in the ensuing Session.

The Hurkaru states, that H. M's. 31st Foot have received orders to march to Ferozepore; that the 1st European Light Infantry proceeds to Loodiana, while H. M's. 9th Foot stands fast at Umballa. The Star adds, that the 2d European Regiment and H. M's. 40th Foot will proceed to Umballa. The assembly of so large a European force on the borders of the Punjab has an evident aspect to the ticklish state of affairs in that country.

The Governor General's establishment, says the Englishman, proceeds to the Upper Provinces on the 5th, and the detachment of the Body Guard left Barrackpore yesterday. His Lordship does not proceed till after the arrival of the Mail, and then by dawk. But there is some hope that the Gwalior negotiations may be brought to a successful issue, without the necessity of the Governor General's proceeding to Agra in person; in which case his Lordship, it is said, will remain here. Possibly a Persian translation of Act 20 of 1843, which announces the approaching departure of Lord Ellenborough may frighten the Khasgee into a compliance with the ultimatum of our Government.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4.

The Agra Ukhbb states, that a Brahmin at Gwalior having died there on the 19th, leaving a young widow, aged 17, and no children, she declared her intention to sacrifice herself on his funeral pile. When everything had been prepared, she ascended it, but no sooner did the flames reach her, than, unable to endure the torture, she leaped from the burning pile, and besought the spectators to save her from so horrid a death; but the Brahmins insisted on her remounting the pile. She refused to do so, and was immediately cut down and thrown into the flames. The principality of Gwalior will shortly either become entirely our own, in which case we hope the Suttee law will be extended to it, or it will be placed under our influence, so that the wish of the Governor General will be law. We hope the opportunity will not be lost to eradicate this diabolical practice. The Romans acquired immortal honour by stipulating in one of their treaties that no more children should be sacrificed. Lord Ellenborough has already taken advantage of the acquisition of Scinde to declare slavery at an end. It will be equally easy for him to provide for the extinction of Suttee in Scindia's territories when settling its affairs.

The Bombay papers of the 25th mention the arrival of the Brandy-wine American sixty gun ship in the port. She is destined to convey his Excellency the Envoy from the President of the United States to His Celestial Majesty. If his Majesty should decline the honour of a visit from the Envoy at Peking, will brother Jonathan put up with the insult, or issue a declaration of war against China?

The Commander-in-Chief reached Agra on the 21st of October, and the various officers of the general Staff came in either with him or soon after.

Two great zemindars of Saldah in the suburbs of Calcutta, Fuzul-Kureem and Buzul-Ruheem, who have hitherto continued to keep themselves clear of the Courts, though they have sent many there, whom they had instigated to acts of violence, have at length been caught. Mr. Dyson, was sent to serve a writ on them, and was immediately made prisoner. The magistrate released him with a large force and in his turn captured the Zemindars, who have been duly fined and imprisoned for resistance of process, and thus lose their much prized hoormut, which in general means nothing more or less than exemption from that legal process to which all other classes of the community are subject.

The Star says, that the Assam Steam Company's vessel, the Assam, has just returned from her trip to Allahabad. She has been absent a month and three days, of which three days and a half were lost by detention. She has therefore performed the voyage there and back in twenty nine days. The Government Steamers have sometimes done the same at this season of the year. But we rejoice to find that there is a competitor in the market; and as this competitor has begun with charging two Rupees a cubic foot for freight, we hope Mr. Robertson who went up in her, will soon be able to establish another rival Association, and thus reduce freight within reasonable limits.

The Star has a letter from Sukkur of so late a date as the 18th October which confirms the intelligence received from Delhi of the extreme unhealthiness of the station.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 6.

The Legislative Council of Ceylon has just resolved that Clergymen shall be compelled to sit on the Jury. This unusual step has excited much indignation both on the Island and at Madras. The writers however seem to forget that every argument they use against the appointment of Clergymen to the Jury applies with ten-fold force to the appointment of Clerical Magistrates at home, which is strenuously defended by a large portion of the Press and of Society.

The papers have noticed, not without censure, that as soon as the Assam Steamer advertised to receive freight, Government put on a Steamer, and fixed to receive freight at the same hour. This is said to be ungenerous. If the Assam Steamer had lowered her freight below that of the Government, she would have had nothing to fear from this competition, but as the Proprietors have chosen to fix their rates at 25 Per Cent. higher than that of Government, we think the public is likely to benefit by the competition. If Government has tonnage to spare, it is better that the public should have it at a rupee eight annas the foot, than be obliged to pay the exorbitant price of two rupees to this new Company.

The Delhi Gazette states that the little state of Shekawuttee is in a disturbed state. There is an insurrection, and 5,000 armed men have set our authority at defiance and are in possession of two forts. Major Forster has gone against them, and Major Thuresby has sent some heavy guns from Ceylon.

Cpl. Spiers has been appointed Resident at Nagpore, vice Major Wilkinson. (Can any of our readers say why the Major has been superseded? His appointment belongs to the Foreign Department in connection with which department it was that Lord Elphinstone issued the order prohibiting the communication of papers and news; but some unofficial person may surely be able to gratify public curiosity in this respect.)

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has presented new colours to the 54th Native Infantry. The regiment was annihilated in Afghanistan; and the only surviving officer of that catastrophe, Capt. Melville, received the highest compliments from Sir Hugh.

An attempt at Suftee has been made at Bombay. A Marwaree had died, and his widow declared her determination to burn with his body. One European and two Native Magistrates endeavoured to dissuade her from her purpose, but she did not relinquish her hold on the corpse without a hard struggle with the Police officers.

The bust of the lamented James Prinsep by the great Chantry, one of his last works, has arrived in Calcutta, and now adorns the rooms of the Asiatic Society.

The Bombay papers announce that the prizes captured in Scinde had arrived there in the Auckland, 500 boxes valued at Seventy lakhs of Rupees.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 7.

The Madras papers mention the death of Mr. Carruthers, the oldest attorney of the Court at the age of 62. We are told that he had previously realized two fortunes, and returned to England, where they were lost—doubtless in the vain hope of adding to them,—and that he was constrained to come out a third time to India.

It has been rumoured for some time that Furloughs would be immediately suspended in reference to the uncertain state of our relations with Gwalior and Lahore. This will be a very great disappointment, and a source of no little expense to officers who have come down to the urgency of private affairs, of business, or relaxation. It will also seriously affect the prospects of the noble sailing vessels now in harbour, or shortly expected. What between the suspension of Furlough and the competition of the Steamers, they must suffer considerably.

The Hurkaru mentions, on the strength of letters from the North-west, that the Sikh troops at Peshawur had deserted the city and fort in great alarm, and were flying to the Indus, plundering the country in their route. This was fully anticipated. There is no longer any Avitabile there to curb the miscreants by his terrific examples of severity.

The same paper gives us an extract of a letter from Gwalior, which will be found among our selections, from which we should infer that there will soon be no government to treat with at all, but that the whole country will fall into a state of anarchy and be subjected to general plunder.—Friend of India.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

In reply to "DANIEL AFFGHAN" we cannot tell him, whether the report current in Calcutta, that the Right Rev. Father in God Daniel Wilson took it upon himself to suspend the Captain of the Steamer, and promote in his stead the first mate to the command, in which, he was a passenger, be correct or otherwise. Hence we care not to answer his question whether the fault of the Captain consisted in anything connected with the "Puseyite heresy" or in fact had any thing at all to do with matters cognizable by crosier and mitre; or the other query, whether the zealous Bishop of Calcutta be an ex officio-member of the Bengal Marine Board with full powers to suspend, or displace its servants, in short to be "at them" as his martial zeal may happen to inspire him.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1843.

[Vol. V.]

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9.

We record with deep regret the death, by cholera, of Major DeBude of the Engineers, and Secretary to the Military Board, at the age of 44. He was well on Tuesday morning and buried on Thursday morning. In him the service has lost one of its most distinguished officers and society one of its most amiable and esteemed members.

The latest accounts from Simlah state, that the Hon. Mr. Clerk is quite out of danger and is doing well; but the severity of the remedies it was found necessary to use, have reduced him to a state of the greatest debility, and rendered his return to Europe more than ever necessary.

We stated a week or two ago that the number of labourers sent to the Mauritius since our ports were opened to emigration, amounted to 26,000. As the statements given in the Star differed somewhat from our estimate, we were supposed to have overrated the number. The Cerneen of the 30th September, a Mauritius paper, however, fully bears out our figures.

It states that since the raising of the prohibition, 16,984 men, women and children had arrived at the Mauritius. The number likely to be sent before the 1st of January next, when the restriction recently imposed comes into effect, will probably be more than 5000; and it is quite possible that with the increased activity which the new Act will give to private enterprise, in the six weeks that remain for its exercise the number may possibly rise to 10,000.

The Star of this morning states, that at the last meeting of the Asiatic Society, the President the Hon. W. W. Bird said that "an application had been made to the Home Authorities for the services of a practical geologist and experienced miner for the sole purpose of exploring the reported mineral sites unworked in Bengal, and developing generally the mineral resources of Bengal." This affords another corroboration of the assertion we made some months ago, by way of correcting an erroneous notion of Mr. George Thompson, that almost every effort at improving the condition of India and developing its resources had originated with the local Government. The most eminent geologists in England have long been striving to prevail on the Court of Directors and the Board of Control to adopt the wise plan of the Emperor of Russia and submit India to a scientific geological survey. The advice appears to be unheeded. It is now sent from India, and will doubtless be attended to.

We stated last week that disturbance had been raised in the Shekawatte territory, and that body of insurgents amounting to 5000 had seized upon a fort. We now learn that the insurrection is at an end. Major Forster marched upon the fort with a detachment of his brigade, and the insurgents fled leaving six pieces of cannon behind them.

The ashes of Rajah Shere Singh, of his son and of Rajah Dhyan Singh which are on their way from Lahore to the sacred spot at Hurawar, have been received with honour by the Rajah of Patesala, who went out six miles to meet the procession, and presented 350 gold mohurs.

The Governor General has given 500 Rs. to the Sailor's Home.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10.

A most distressing account of an attempt to take the ship Harriet Scott, by the convicts who had been sent on her, from Penang to Bombay. The Captain was barbarously murdered, and several of the mutineers fell, some in the scuffle, while others were shot, we were going to say in cold blood by the chief mate, but he was in such a state of excitement from the scene he had witnessed and the wounds he had received, that it became necessary to put him in irons. This is the third Commander who has been murdered by convicts within the last four years in consequence of their having been sent without any guard. Surely it is time for Government to look into the matter; if that be not done, the Insurance officers must do their duty, and refuse to underwrite any vessels sent with convicts without a guard.

The Hurkaru hints that the men of the 2d European Regiment shewed some signs of mutiny on the day of their marching from Meerut. They refused to carry their knapsacks, and destroyed or left on the ground nearly the whole of them. The ring-leader had been seized.

A meeting of the Magistrates was held as usual yesterday. That municipal body, like other municipal bodies in England has raised a loan—a loan of Twenty thousand Rupees,—on their own responsibility. But they separated without doing any thing to lay the dust.

The Englishman states that orders have been issued to countermand the progress of those who had been sent up the country to precede the Governor General; and that this Lordship has abandoned the idea of leaving the Presidency.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11.

The Bombay Papers received yesterday, give a gloomy account of the state of the troops in Scinde. The Steamer Indus had brought intelligence from Kurachee to the 25th of October. The thermometer in tents had risen to 105°. H. M. 28th had 280 men in hospital. On the 22d there were 40 admissions; on the 23d, 30.

Hurree Holkar, the descendant of chiefs renowned in Indian history, died at Indore on the 24th. He ascended the throne in 1834 after fourteen years's imprisonment. His affairs soon became inextricably involved; his expenditure exceeded his income by six or eight lakhs of Rupees. The year after his elevation, he married a woman of obscure birth and poor circumstances; a single child, the fruit of the union, has since died. The prince himself had long been sunk in sloth and disease, and was surrounded by low and debauched companions. This is a faithful picture of half the chiefs, who rule over the independent principalities in India. The greatest blessing their subjects could enjoy would be the annexation of the territories to the British dominions.

The Officers belonging to the Indian Navy at Bombay have given a splendid entertainment to Commodore Parker, of the United States Frigate Brandywine which has recently arrived in the harbour, and is waiting to convey the Honourable, Mr. Cushing, the American Ambassador, to Peking.

The number of passengers proceeding by the Atlanta Steamer from Bombay to Suva, in the present month is eleven. We hear the number already engaged on the Hindustan amounts to sixty. The present is probably the month when the fewest passengers may be expected to leave India by Steam, as they will arrive in England at the very worst season of the year, in the depth of winter.

The Hurkaru of this morning contains a letter from Mr. W. T. Law, corroborating by the most circumstantial details the treatment inflicted on Mr. Taylor by the syces of Cook and Co's, Horse Establishment. There is every reason to believe that his death was occasioned by their brutal assault. They, and the grooms in the stables of Hunter and Co's., are the most ferocious and unruly body of men in Calcutta, and we hope such an example will be made of them, as shall effectually check their violence in future.

The Penang papers last received, are very sanguine about the extensive production of Sugar in that Colony. A Mill, to be worked by a Steam Engine of fourteen horse power, had been imported by one enterprising firm. This, and another machine previously received, were expected to produce in the ensuing year, a sufficient quantity of sugar to draw attention to the capabilities of the Island. Some of its sugar had already been sent to England and was said to be equal to the best West India and Mauritius sugar.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 13.

Capt. Scott, while conducting the Irawaddy Steamer from Calcutta to Dacca, through the Sunderbuns, fell in with the Nacoda and two men of the Arab Ship Soliman Shaw, on the 6th instant. They were exhausted and confused, but said there were 20 more men and four women somewhere about, and that the vessel had been wrecked in the Roymungul River. Capt. Scott immediately proceeded with the steamer in search of them and succeeded at length in falling in with them. They were sent on to Calcutta from Koolna, all but the Nacoda, who is gone with his two brothers, his wife and a servant to Dacca, where he says he has money to receive.

Saturday night's Gazette gives furlough to Cole, Graham and Oliver, thus disproving the report that all furloughs were to be suspended in the prospect of approaching hostilities.

It is now said that Lord Ellenborough positively goes up the country after the arrival of the October Mail.

The Star states, that the Commander-in-Chief was expected at Agra on the 18th instant, and Mr. Thomson the day before, when it would be determined whether the army was to move towards Gwalior or not. The Army of Exercise is to assemble on the 24th.

Mr. J. S. Stopford is to be Sheriff of Calcutta for the ensuing year, and Mr. Frith, Deputy.

Some wag has been quizzing the Editor of the Hills, by sending him a letter from Abdool Ghiaz Khan, the cousin of Akhbar Khan, in which was enclosed a denial on the part of the good Samaritan, of his having ever slayed any man at any time. It is said that Sirdar Ameer Khan has been induced to make this affidavit in consequence of the charge preferred against him to that effect in Lady Sale's Book. The hoax, though clumsily contrived, deserves record. The affidavit runs thus: "I, Mahomed Akbar, son of Ameer Dust Mahomed, do hereby declare most solemnly on the Koran, that I never slayed or ordered to be slayed any man at any time whatever, either Mahometan, Christian, Jew, or Pagan.

Sworn before me, HAFIZ JEE, Head Moolah, Son of SYAD AHMED, HAFIZ WAZIR.
He follows: notice appears in this day's Hurka.
Two duffars have just been convicted, and lined by the Magistrate, Mr. Blaquiere. In this case there were three duffars charged with decoying away thirty-six individuals from Gyah, by the practice of the usual deceit upon them. These men recounted the story of having been brought down on false pretences, false imprisoned, and ill-treated. On the evidence produced, two of the three duffars were convicted of the charge against them and fined in the sum of fifty Rupees each."

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 14.

Mr. George Thompson is coming down to Calcutta. He was to have left Delhi on the 7th instant.

The narrative of the Jew Barenstein, who declared that he saw with his own eyes the execution of four Europeans at Bokhara, of whom two were Col Stoddard and Captain Conolly, is declared by the Delhi Gazette to be an entire fabrication. A friend of the Editor on hearing of it, made enquiries regarding its probability at Lahore, and learned that the man was an impostor.

We stated yesterday that Capt. Scott, proceeding in the Irawaddy Steamer to Dacca, picked up the Nacoda, or Commander of the Soliman Shaw, and a number of the crew, at the mouth of the Roymungul, one of the rivers that run through the Sunderbuns into the sea. The Star of this morning has a long and interesting article,—too long however for our space—on the subject, in which he more than hints that this vessel of Six Hundred Tons could have had no business in such a locality, except for the purpose of contraband traffic, with the marts of Koolna and Dacca. He states that there is every reason to believe that such a contraband traffic is carried on. The matter will furnish an interesting subject of investigation. We may also add that nothing but the vigilance of the Protector of Coolies at the Mauritius prevents the vessels running up the unfrequented mouths of the Sunderbuns and transporting a rich cargo of kidnapped Coolies to the Mauritius, or to Bourbon.

Capt. G. T. Green, of the Corps of Engineers, has been appointed Secretary to the Military Board in the room of the late Major DeBude.

The Hurkaru of this morning contains a statement of another brutal attack made on the two servants of a European Gentleman by the native grooms of Cook and Co's Stable keepers. They appear to be the most unruly set of ruffians within the town. On the present occasion the Police of the two neighbouring thanas did nothing but dispute whose business it was to go into the stables and rescue the men.

The regular post from Calcutta of the 92d October was in time for the Steamer which left Bombay on the 1st instant. The express which was despatched on the 21st, was of course in time.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 15.

A Native correspondent wishes us to publish that a brahminy bull has goaded a man to death, near the village of Agraparah. He thinks "a wise and enlightened Government ought to provide for the suppression of these evils." It is not quite so easy to take these bulls by the horns as our correspondent thinks; but the "wise and enlightened" Baboos who let them loose to prey on society, might easily cure the evil, by dropping the custom. This would render the interference of Government unnecessary.

The accounts from Sukkur extend to the 29th ultimo, and are very deplorable. Upwards of 600 patients were in each of the Native Infantry Hospitals. Of 164 European Artillery men 35 had died since May, and the remainder are quite incapacitated from continued sickness.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 22.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1843.

[Vol. V.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 16.

The Hindoestan steamer left Calcutta yesterday morning punctually at sunrise, with about seventy passengers. The Star says that it has been customary to supply a list of the passengers, but that for reasons not unfolded all information on the subject has been refused.

The state of affairs at Gwalior does not appear to be satisfactory, notwithstanding the capture of the usurper. Last week, says a letter from Cawnpore, in the Star, the Commander-in-Chief directed all corps warned for future service, to stand fast with the exception of the detachments of Artillery. This order we may suppose was issued on the report of the revolution which upset the authority of Khasgee. On the 8th instant, orders were issued to put the whole force in motion, and they were to commence their march on the 13th, 14th and 15th. This counter order may have been occasioned by the fresh revolution, which divided the troops into two hostile parties. Whether we advance, or the differences are compromised, it is understood that the occupation of Gwalior troops will cease. It is scarcely to be supposed that they will lay down their arms and retire to beggary and starvation, without something like a struggle.

The Madras papers notice the augmentation of the Corps of Engineers by two Captains and four Subalterns.

The Delhi Gazette of the 8th states that Dost Mahomed was at the date of the last accounts from Cabul, in good health. He may have been fired at, but was neither shot nor wounded. The Hill tribes demand the release of Ameenoola, the "infamous Ameenoola," but the Dost refuses to comply with their wishes, well knowing that the man, if set at liberty, would breed an insurrection.

We are happy to see among the Orders of the Lieut. Governor of the North West Provinces the appointment of Capt. Coutley, as Superintendent of Canals in the Doab, and Director of the works on the Ganges Canal.

The following notice appears to be the latest intelligence from Gwalior. It is from the Hurkaru, and rather serves to neutralize the prospect of an early adjustment of differences.

Nov. 6. "I have not thought it worth while to write to you, since I gave you the result of the Maharaj Cumpoo's doings in the seizure of the Khasgeewalla. The Bae and her party have, however, organised such troops as continue on their side, and commenced entrenching themselves against the rebels.—The latter defy them and threaten that, on the first shot, off goes the Khasgee's head, and then war to the knife. How far they will carry their threat into execution depends on the resoluteness of the Bae, for if she gives in, there will be an end of all the trouble, until some determination is come to, with regard to the proposals made by the British Government—the ultimatum having, I am told, been received, and a short time allowed for reply."

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 17.

The Star states that Lord Ellenborough starts for the North West Provinces on the 25th instant.

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazettee states that Major Parker, of H. M. 48th, has put a period to his existence in a delirium from a severe fever.

The Puteala Rajah, says the Hurkaru, after having been repeatedly summoned, has set out for Lahore to present himself at the Durbar. Puteala is the largest of the Sikh states, on the left bank of the suledge which is under the protection of the British. We thought this protection carried with it independence of Lahore; but the notice in the Hurkaru shews that we were mistaken.

The Agra Ukhbar alludes to a very valuable collection of ancient silver and copper coins made by Capt. C. H. Burt, of the 6th Regiment, during the late campaign in Afghanistan which he has presented to Lord Ellenborough and which his Lordship has sent to the British Museum. This collection will be particularly valuable in consequence of the utter loss, in the disastrous retreat, of several noble collections which had been made by our own officers. We believe Lady Sale's collection, which was of peculiar value, shared the fate of all others.

A letter from Sandoway in Arracan, dated the 31st October, informs us that a severe shock of an earthquake was felt there on the morning of the 30th; but no injury was done. The same letter states that Lieut. Hopkinson had been deputed to make a geological survey of the Island which was thrown up out of the sea sometime ago near Cheduba.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18.

The Englishman's Overland Summary states that the enterprising firm of Aylwin and Co. have taken to shipping rags from India to England, a branch of trade hitherto monopolized by the Italian States. Not so. England is chiefly supplied with rags from Hamburg. The Italian rags for the most part find their way across the Atlantic; but as the Natives of India never quit their clothes till they are rotten and even then make them up into quilts, the speculation is not likely to be profitable.

The Bombay Times states, that preliminary steps have been taken to establish a branch of the Bombay Bank in Calcutta, and that business will commence as soon as a sufficient number of shareholders have been found to form a Board of Directors.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20.

The dawn edition of the Hurkaru on Saturday, gave an extract of a letter from Lahore, the purport of which was that Heera Singh, and Lena Singh Majetee had quarrelled; that the former was in the fort, and that the latter with the father of Now Nihal's widow, had attacked it with a large force and upwards of a hundred guns. But after the specimens we have had of spurious information systematically despatched from the Punjab, we are constrained to receive all news from the scouts, with some mistrust.

The Agra Ukhbar has revived the report that the Governor General intends to establish the Supreme Government, at Agra. The Supreme Government is coveted both at Bombay and at Agra, but the present Ruler has no idea of removing it, and we question whether its seat will be disturbed for a very long time to come.—Friend of India.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23.

The Bentlack Steamer so anxiously looked for arrived off Town this afternoon.

OVERLAND MAIL.

Englishman Office, 6 A. M. Friday 24th Nov.

The Express has just reached Calcutta.

The mail via Marseilles did not leave London before the 6th.

The Queen had returned from her visit to France—and had taken her departure to pay the same compliment to the King of the Belgians.

The public suspense, entailed by the non-delivery of the mails which were lost by the Memnon was not relieved until the 31 October, when the intelligence reached London.

The non-arrival of these mails occasioned much speculation upon the possible cause of detention—and has produced a movement among the Mercantile classes generally who have taken the subject up energetically, and who expect to obtain a much improved arrangement for the future transmission and receipt of the India Mails. "Out of evil," says the adage, "good sometimes arises."

The Loothiana Steamer built for the navigation of the Indus is completed.

The subscription to ascertain the fate of Col. Conolly and Capt Stoddart have not exceeded £244, Lord Aberdeen has promised his aid—and Colonel Sheil has instructions to prosecute the enquiry.

The death of Schah Kamran of Herat is announced.

In Commercial matters, it is the general impression that an improvement has taken place.

The sale of Cotton in Liverpool on one day, (the 2d Oct) amounted to 25,000 bales, and an advance of 1-8 per lb. was established.

Mr. Murray's new publication of books for the Indian Market has given a check to the piratical practices of the American and French book-sellers.

Colonel Fawcett's antagonist, and his second have not yet been apprehended, and the matter remains in statu quo.

The sudden disappearance of the unfortunate Dyce Sombre, who had been removed to Liverpool for change of air has occasioned a considerable sensation in the quarter in which it occurred.

Lord Cardigan's name again appears in unenviable print upon a charge of intrigue—but the accounts are not to be fully depended upon, and are much exaggerated.

The continuation of the papers on the Development of the Resources of India which will be pursued with interest in the Monthly Times, embraces a further portion of the "Hindoostanes Railway Report."

Spain continues in a disquiet and anarchical state—while Espartero is enjoying himself in a quiet retreat in Regent's Park.

A Revolution in Greece will scarcely surprise those who have paid any attention to the description of Government which has for so long prevailed there.

The Belgian Army has been reduced—and no regiment is to exceed 900 men—the reduction applies to both Cavalry and Infantry.

The Desert transit through Egypt is in course of gradual improvement, and was passed by the passengers (108) per Hindoostan from England in seventeen hours and a half.

Duncan McNeill, Esq., the Advocate for Scotland, has been returned Member for the Country of Argyle.

Edinburgh is to be connected with London by the continuation of a line of railway, already in a stage of active progress.

The death of Sir M. Wood occasions a vacancy in the representation of London, which it is expected Sir George de H. Larpent may be induced to fill.

The accounts brought by the Tay state, that a conflagration at Kingston, Jamaica, has consumed 10,000 houses—the loss estimated at £350,000—the origin unknown.

The Blundell had arrived with a detachment of the 59th.

In the East India House Debates the injustice of the Compulsory prosecution of Appeals from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlat, to the Privy Council, imposed on the East India Company by orders in Council was discussed, and the motion withdrawn, upon the assurance that the subject would receive the early attention of the Board of Control.

An angry correspondence has taken place between Lieut. Col. Outram, and Major General Napier, in consequence of a letter which appeared in the papers disparaging the services of Col. Outram during the Afghan war.

Capt. Charles Farquharson and Capt. Gordon, R. N., are the newly elected Elder brethren of the Trinity House.

The French Ambassador to China was to have sailed on the 15th October for Canton.

Permission has been granted to all ranks who received the Afghan Medals, to wear them throughout the British dominions.

We regret among the deaths which have occurred to notice those of Major W. Richards, of J. R. Dunlop, Esq. of Lieut. Col. W. L. Wood, K H, formerly of the 4th, and of Lieut. Col. A. Cameron, of the 87th; Professor Bell of Edinburgh, Dr. Prior of Dublin, the Right Honorable J. A. Stewart Mackenzie Alderman, Sir M. Wood, Gen. Sir T. Brown, R. H.

An account has been received of the discovery in the wilds of America, by the celebrated Naturalist's Audubon of a quadruped hitherto unknown.

Sir Charles Metcalfe who was at Kingston when the last accounts left, and who is as highly regarded in Canada as he was in India had recovered his health; but was still suffering from a cancer in the cheek.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 23.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20.

At the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief, the Governor General has added a Corps to be styled the left wing, to the Army of Exercises, and this has rendered a new disposition of that army necessary, for which however we cannot find room. All appointments are to date from the 25th instant. It was said a day or two ago that some of the corps had been ordered to stand fast, but it is now understood that they march without delay to their stations. Yet the question of peace and war seems undecided. At any rate, the Gungajulee Treasury, is to pay the expense, all the expense of this gathering; not a farthing of it is to fall on the British Government, which is perhaps the reason why the 5 per cents, looking so ambitiously up to nine per cent. premium.

The Military Board has been recast. The Chief Magistrate's services are dispensed with,—indeed it would be difficult to tell why he ever had a seat at it. The Commissary General is to be a member, and his department is incorporated with the Board.

The Star continues to follow up the scent after the Soliman Shaw, which he says belongs to a very stoical Jew in Calcutta, who affirms she was consigned from Muscat with a cargo of salt, dates, and sundries, which renders her appearance at the treasury of the Roymungul still more suspicious. The Star states that there was long an intimate intercourse between the Imam and the Nabob of Dacca, and that so low down as 1770 the Nabob solicited aid in arms, and munitions of war from the Imam to resist the English. "The correspondence was discovered, and the proceedings instituted against the Nabob on that occasion constitute the first of the causes celebres, in which a feudatory had been arraigned for bad faith." The circumstance is quite new to us, and we should take it as a favour if the Star would note the work in which it is to be found.

The Great Gun has been mounted upon a stone base in front of Government House, but there is no Dragon. The mouth of the cannon points directly at the statue of Lord Hastings. The Star is pleased to be facetious on the occasion and makes the gun spout pans as if he were an editor; but we really wish some of our brethren in the City of Palaces would tell the benighted inhabitants of the interior, where the gun came from, what it is intended to represent and why it is put up in its present position.

H. M's 13th Light Infantry reached Loodiana on the 6th instant. A letter from that station published in the Hurkaru, states that orders had arrived from Head Quarters requiring every man in the division the 9th Foot excepted, and even including the 13th, to be in readiness for immediate active service. The sick to be left behind with a small guard from each Regiment. Is the 13th to be employed in gathering a few more laurels before it embarks for England?

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 21.

The Star has intelligence from Ferozepore to the 10th instant, which confirms in a great measure the statements which had been previously received regarding the state of affairs in the Punjab. A deadly enmity has, it is said, sprung up between Lena Sing, and Hoera Sing; the former is said to have assembled an army of 10,000 men, with which he is watching an opportunity for action. It is expected that Raja Golab Sing will march down upon Lahore to settle matters; but while his back is turned, matters will probably be unsettled at Jumboo, Doat Mahomed, it is now said, has been wounded, not killed; and Akhtar Khan is at the western mouth of the Khyber ready to march upon Peshawur. Meanwhile the Sikh reinforcements who have been ordered thither, refuse, they say, to march.

The Bombay Gentlemen's Gazette states, that the Persian Government has resolved to send troops to occupy Karrack, and have pledged themselves to support one of the Seikhs of Bahrein who has asked their assistance.

The Englishman states, that Baboo Mootee Lall Seal has, by an act of great munificence and yet with a modesty that would do credit to any one, liberated all the debtors of the Great Jail. We wish the Editor would tell us the amount; after the fact is known, there can be no harm in stating the sum. It is one of the most remarkable features of society in Calcutta, that all these acts of munificence which are done with such blushing modesty, that the man would not have them whispered for the world, always find their way into the public newspapers.

The Hurkaru gives an account of the Governor General's visit to the Company's dock yard at Kidderpore last week, with which his Lordship seemed to be much gratified; but his Lordship was of course quite shocked to find, that after so large a sum had been expended on the establishment, there was not a dock large enough for the first class of Steamers, and that Government was still dependent on the private dock yards for their accommodation and repairs. We have heard that another has been contemplated. Why not make it large enough for the largest, for an 1800 ton Steamer, if necessary?

The Hurkaru gives an account of another batch of returned Coolies, recently brought by the Water Witch. They were not so plump and flourishing a condition as those which preceded them. Nine died on the passage; four others immediately after landing in the Howrah Hospital. They were also poor, three of them having had only 27 Rupees each. Government should look into the matter and make it the subject of special reference to the Mauritius authorities. It is quite possible that the deaths may have been occasioned by neglect.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

No Mail yet—the 22d the Bombay Steamers are become insufferably dilatory, and the sooner the Court of Directors adopt the common sense plan of employing the Steam Navigation Company's vessels from Suez to Galle, Madras and Calcutta with a branch vessel from Aden to Bombay, the better.

The Maidstone is announced this morning, from the Cape in a month and twenty-one days. She is one of the best London vessels, and we hope her arrival will be the precursor of all the other vessels which are now due.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23.

A correspondent of the Englishman, rather overburthen with capital which he is anxious to employ in a profitable way, asks whether rage were ever imported at Serampore from Europe. To which we reply what they were ; but that they were found to be more expensive than the rags which were obtainable in India. In Europe the only thing which they look for in rags is their strength, as the dirtiest can be bleached white as the driven snow by Chlorine gas, but unfortunately the rags furnished by the Hundred Millions of British subjects in the East, are deficient above all things in that one quality of strength.

Mr. George Thompson has left Delhi, having as the Delhi Gazette says, settled every thing with his Majesty to his own satisfaction.

Sir Richmond Shakespear received charge of the Gwalior Residency from Col Speirs on the 30th ultimo. The latter took his departure immediately for Nagpore.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 24.

The Bentinck has made a very splendid voyage. She was only sixty-four days under steam from Southampton to the Sand Heads. She was detained on the route twenty-four days yet reached Calcutta in less than three months.

Mr. George Clerk, late Lieut. Governor of the North West Provinces, has left Simla, and embarked for Calcutta at Gurmookteshur Ghat. He returns to England by way of the Cape.

Sir Joseph Thackwell has been appointed to command the Cavalry division of the army intended to operate against Gwalior.

By the latest accounts from Moulmein we learn that the Commissioner has suspended Capt. Corbyn, the Master Attendant at Amherst, and established a land post between Mergui, Tavoy, Amherst and Moulmein.

The Rustomjee Cowasjee has brought round from China the remnant of the Company's Staff Col. Wilson, Capt. Davidson and Lieut. Ochterlony. The Settlements there are now placed upon the usual colonial allowances given by the Crown, which fall far short of those given by our Honorable Masters.

Sir Henry Pottinger has appointed Major Pottinger, an extra Aid-de-Camp, and it is said will send him home with the Supplementary Treaty. This treaty, it appears, provides that all foreign nations trading with China shall enjoy the same privileges which have been granted to the English, and that if any fresh privileges should be granted to foreigners, the British may claim to participate in them.

The Bombay papers hint that an American fleet will congregate at Canton, and that the Envoy will demand of the Chinese Government reparation for injuries committed in the seizure of some opium on American ships. We thought brother Jonathan repudiated the opium traffic, quite as much as he does the repayment of the loans made to some of the states.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25.

The Hindustan Steamer arrived at Madras at day light on the 19th, having made the voyage from Garden Reach to that Port, in four days. Capt. Engledue has been very successful in expediting the passage of this vessel. On the former trip, she did not leave the Pilot, till the third day after leaving town.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 27.

Lord Ellenborough left Barrackpore in the State Boat, towed by the Hoogly Steamer, on Saturday a little after two in the afternoon. A bar of sand on the Barrackpore side of the river obliged the vessels to take the deeper channel on outside of the water. His Lordship was on deck, and appeared to look with some degrees of interest towards the office of the Friend of India as he passed in front of it. We stood on the bank of the river to return the complement, musing at the same time on the thrones the Governor General would probably overturn before he again returned to his country seat. At Hoogly he disembarked, and entered a non-descript kind of conveyance, in which he is to be propelled by human labour to Agra. Strange that after having held Bengal for nearly eighty years, there should not be a decent carriage road for the Governor General of India to travel on.

The Floraville, which has brought up Mr. Blundell, the Ex-Governor of Moulmein and of the Straits settlements, grounded on her way up last Saturday, on the "James and Mary" and foundered; all hands are saved but one. We believe it will now belong to the province of the Superintendent of Marine to urge on Government the immediate necessity of blowing her up, to prevent the obstruction of a channel at all times narrow and dangerous, but which will be rendered ten times more so, unless steps are taken to clear away the wreck. We are extremely sorry to find how great a loss Mr. Blundell has been by this calamity. All the property he brought round with him has perished. His English library may be re-placed; But not the valuable Burmese library which he had been many years in collecting.

The Delhi Gazette gives the important intelligence that Rajah Golab Singh has at length arrived at Lahore with 20,000 of his well disciplined mountain soldiers, and has assumed the Government of the Punjab. He has at once refused to accede to the pecuniary demands of the refractory troops of Heera Singh, which have been urged with such insolent importunity, and will doubtless put them down by force. All the foreign officers including General Ventura, are to quite the service.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 28.

His Excellency, the Commander-in-Chief reached Agra on the 18th where he found Col. Sleeman and Sir Richmond Shakespear. Mr. Thomason, the newly appointed Lieut. Governor, had also arrived there, but intended shortly to leave it on revenue duties in the north. The arrival at the station of Baboo Dwarckenath Tagore is also announced. The Agra Ukhbar states, that Col. Speirs had arrived at Agra, having made an unsuccessful attempt to pass through the Gwalior states to Nagpore. The policy of removing this officer who is so intimately acquainted with Gwalior affairs, and also Major Lawrence, whose knowledge of the Punjab is second only to that of Mr. Clerk, just at the time when we are about to enter upon negotiations with those states, which may end in war, is very questionable. Their successors cannot be supposed to have their local experience.

The Madras papers state, that orders had been unexpectedly and peremptorily received from Lord Ellenborough by the Resident at Hyderabad to despatch seven Regiments of Cavalry and Infantry to some place in the vicinity of Blichpore. No one seems to know any thing of the object of this contemplated movement.

A correspondent of the Hurkaru states, that Government have thrown out the proposal of two out of four of the Magistrates of Calcutta to raise the House Tax from Five to Six and a half per cent. This same writer states, that the collection of the Tax, which is now performed by salaried officers, costs nearly 15 per cent.; and suggests that it might be done for half that sum by a percentage.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 29.

The Bombay Times informs us that the September periodical publications which had been left behind at Suez, have been brought on now; and that the October Periodicals have been left behind at Aden because the Commander of the Steamer considering them as Merchandize fancied he was precluded by his orders from bringing them on,—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 30.

We are happy to find from the Delhi Gazette that 'Rundlekund appears to be in a settled state.'

Golam Alee Khan has been appointed Grand Vizier of the Emperor of Delhi. He has made his own terms, they say, with his master, and has the entire management of affairs under his control. These affairs no longer embrace the external and internal relations of India, but are simply confined to the disbursement of a few lakhs of Rupees a year.

The Englishman announces that the sole right of reprinting Martin Chuzzlewitz in India has been purchased of Champman and Hall, the booksellers, by the Proprietor of that journal. Doubtless the exclusive republication of any work of Dickens will give value to any paper, but experience teaches that no paper can safely rely on these borrowed sources for the increase or even maintenance of its circulation, and that a large and accurate knowledge of Indian affairs, a sound judgement, a nervous style, and impartiality of views are of themselves quite sufficient to insure extensive popularity, and that without these qualifications no paper can long stand its ground.

There is little news from the Punjab this morning. Only, it is said that the foreign officers are more than ever anxious to quit the scene of trouble and uncertainty which the Punjab now presents, and that Heera Singh has resolved to detain General Ventura as security for the 27 lakhs of Rupees which General Avitabile is said to have taken out of the country.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 1.

The Temperance Society of Calcutta, has resolved to open a second Temperance Tavern in Grant's Lane. One has already been opened in Radha bazar, and has, we suppose met with sufficient encouragement to induce the benevolent projectors to venture on a second.

A meeting of the Chamber of Commerce was held yesterday to urge on the Home Authorities not to adopt any plan of Steam Communication that did not embrace the direct line between Suez and Calcutta.

Intelligence has been received that the two parties have come to an engagement at Gwalior, in which the adherents of the Khasgee wallah were defeated. He was loaded with irons and sent to Dholpore to Col. Speirs. Yet we were told last week that the Colonel had made over the Residency to Sir Richmond Shakespear and had in vain endeavoured to pass through the Gwalior states on his way to Nagpore, and had in consequence proceeded to Agra. The delivery of the Khasgee, it is supposed, will put an end to all hopes of earning any ribbons or crosses in the battle field, and lead to the immediate acceptance of our terms, which embrace the disbanding of all the troops of the state.

An address to the Sheriff is in circulation requesting him to call a meeting of the Inhabitants of Calcutta, to consider the present position of Steam communication, and to adopt such measures as may be necessary to secure a permanent direct communication by Steam between Calcutta, Madras, Cally and Suez.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2.

The Star states, that it is rumoured that Raja Golab Sing intends to withdraw altogether from Lahore with Heera Sing to his own dominions in Jumbou, and to leave the Seikhs to fight the matter out among themselves. For this determination the public was fully prepared. At Lahore he will always be exposed to a collision with our Government. In his Hill territories he may maintain his position free from all interruption, and even take an opportunity of carving a slice out of the Chinese empire for himself.

The following is the number of letters and papers received by the slow Cleopatra at Bombay:

	Letters.	Papers.	Boxes.
Via Falmouth,	17,594	22,240	60
Via Marseilles,	4,048	8,764	27
Foreign,	1,279	4,500	11
Total Letters,	23,221	35,504	98
Total Papers,	35,045
Total Covers,	58,725

It will thus be seen that the interest we feel in home affairs, is three times as great as the interest felt at home in Indian affairs. Ten thousand of our newspapers is the average limit of transmission while we continue to receive more than Thirty-five thousand. We wish some of our contemporaries in Calcutta would contrive to obtain from the Post Master General or the Deputy, the number of letters brought on the Hindoostan. This they can easily do, for Lord Ellenborough's Proclamation against the communication of intelligence of which an officer may become officially cognizant, was issued from the Foreign Department, and refers exclusively to papers and intelligence of a high political character. It has nothing whatever to do with the Home Department, to which the Post Office belongs.

The Agra Ukhbar just received, says: we have just heard that another fight has taken place at Gwalior, but the Khasgee is sent to Dholpore. It is somewhat singular that not one of the papers as far as we can recollect, has told the public who this most formidable Khasgee wallah is; who was his father and his grandfather; what are his resources, and his pretensions, and how he got into power.

The Madras papers state, that the new Act forbidding the embarkation of coolies from any port but that of Calcutta will be particularly hard upon the wives of a great many labourers now at the Mauritius who are most anxious to join their husbands. We think the Editor is wrong. The Act forbids only the exportation of labourers, which means men; it says nothing of women, and no Captain would take the wives and children of those who are on the island could be considered as infringing the law.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 4.

Major General Churchill—whom some of the pers murdered a few weeks ago—has joined Commander-in-Chief at Agra, so that his Excellency is now surrounded by the whole of the super Staff of the Bengal Army.

The Harbark states that a large House of business in Calcutta, sought the protection of the Royal Court on Sunday last, but that no order was passed by the Court, on which account the name is suppressed.

The Hurkaru has received intelligence that the Khasseewalla whom they were conveying to the British Resident has been rescued. But the Agra Ukhbar says that it is rumoured in the city that he made his escape and that it was effected by collusion.

On Saturday last, the members of the extinct firm of Fergusson, Brothers and Co. were respectively sworn to the truth of the schedule of the separate estate of each, and then in due form discharged without any opposition whatsoever.

The Englishman says that Heera Sing, when General Ventura applied to him for leave of absence, adopted an ingenious contrivance to make him responsible for the 27 lakhs of Rupees taken out of the country by General Avitabile, by sending to him for 100 Rupees a day; at which rate he would be nearly Eighty years paying up the whole sum.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5.

The seventh and last Criminal Sessions of the year was opened yesterday. The Chief Justice and both the Puisne Judges were on the bench. Sir Lawrence Peel charged the Grand Jury, commented on the lightness of the Calendar, and said that with one or two exceptions all the cases were of a trivial nature. His Lordship also stated that the Magistrates had been much more careful in wording the committals than they had formerly been.

A Board of Officers has been appointed to assemble to-morrow morning in Fort William, to enquire whether the uncommon sickness which prevails in the 10th Foot, arises from their location.

The Mussorie Bank has just declared a dividend of 12 per cent., and determined to increase its capital stock to the sum of Five Lakhs of Rupees. The existence and flourishing condition of a Bank in such a nook as Mussorie, where there is no commerce requiring assistance, is a remarkable circumstance. It has been determined by the shareholders to adopt the rules of the Agra Bank as it respects Loans, Deposits and Mortgages. The Bank is therefore the medium of accommodating the officers of the public service with loans on good security, from the stores of others officers who have accumulated a little capital.

The Hurkaru states it as the opinion of those who are entitled to form an opinion in the North West Provinces that the present movement of the Governor General to Agra, is occasioned chiefly by the unsettled state of things in the Punjab. We learn from the same source that terms have been proposed to the Authorities at Lahore, and that they consist only of a demand for the reception of a Resident at Lahore, and the right of marching troops through the Punjab to Peshawur, if necessary. As to the former, it is not many months since Mr. Clerk was appointed Envoy to the Court at Lahore, and the subsequent withdrawal of the Envoy, and the substitution of a mere Agent in his stead was understood to have originated in objections offered by the Court in Leadenhall Street, not by the Court of Lahore. As the latter requisition, we thought Lord Ellenborough had washed his hands clean of Afghanistan, and had for ever established the Indus as the ultimate and impassable limit of our movements.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 6.

The Preliminary Steam Meeting was held yesterday morning at the Town Hall. There was a very large attendance. Mr. F. Milner was in the chair. The business of the meeting was comprized in the following Resolution that "it be referred to a Committee to prepare resolutions to be laid before a General Meeting to consider what steps should be taken with reference to the communication lately made by the E. I. and China Association on the contemplated arrangements for altering the present line of Steam Navigation between India and Great Britain." The names of the gentlemen appointed on the committee are the following:—Messrs. W. P. Grant, Elliott, C. B. Greenlaw, L. J. H. Grey, T. Leach, Remfry, Lieutenant Colonel Taylor, J. Hume, Stopford, Colonel Forbes and Newcomen.

The Delhi Gazette just received gives information from Cabul to the effect that Dost Mahomed was becoming daily more oppressive and unpopular, and less able to maintain his position. He had sent a letter to Peer Mahomed Khan at Peshawur, ostensibly condoling with him on the death of Sher Singh, but secretly instigating him to revolt. The fact of the Dost's weakness is distinctly proved by his inability to take advantage of the present favourable opening for regaining Peshawur. A report prevailed at Loodiana on the 8th of November that a large body of the Khyberes had come down and attacked Jumrood, and that 500 of the garrison had been killed. It is said that Tez Sing, the commandant at Peshawur sallied out with a large body and drove back the Khyberes.

The Candahar Sirdars have begun to read the Khootha and coin money in the name of the King of Persia. It is distinctly stated that Meer Morad Ali, our Ally, to whom we have made over nearly half Scinde, is in treasonable correspondence with these Sirdars, and has promised to kick up a dust at Khyrpoor, if they will attack Shikarpoor.

General Ventura has succeeded in obtaining leave at last from the Seikh Government, and is packing up as rapidly as possible for Loodiana. He is leaving the Punjab for ever, in which he shews his wisdom.

A meeting of the Indian Shareholders of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company is to be held at the Town Hall to-morrow at 3 P. M. when Capt. Eogledue will doubtless afford some explanation of the movements of that Association, which have created so much anxiety in Calcutta and Madras, afforded so much satisfaction to the community at Bombay.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1843.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 7.

Intelligence has been received from China to the 26th of October. The Supplementary Treaty has been ratified by the Emperor, and ordered to be carried into effect, without waiting for the signature of Queen Victoria. This token of confidence in British faith is very gratifying. It is pleasing to find that Major Pottinger, who left India under the capricious frown of the Governor General, has been nominated to convey the Treaty to Her Majesty. Thus the injustice to which he was subjected by the Head of the Government in India, has been in a great measure redressed, and the Hero of Herat and Charrekar, the individual to whose exertions at Bameean we are indebted for the liberation of prisoners, one of the objects of the expedition to Cabul, will make his first appearance at the Court of England in association with the final treaty concluded by his illustrious uncle, with the Empire of China.

Last night's Calcutta Gazette contains the draft of an Act repealing Reg. 9, of 1808, which had become obsolete, from its extreme severity. This was the Act passed when dacoity was at its height in Bengal, which inflicted such extraordinary penalties on those who refused to surrender. It was under this Act that a Native was recently subjected to long transportation for not appearing when summoned, which punishment Mr. Bird wisely remitted.

The Honourable the Court of Directors have sent out a despatch to "our Governor of the Presidency of Fort William in Bengal, informing him that Southampton had been made the port of arrival and departure of the Indian Mails sent by the Mediterranean, and directing that the "immediate and particular attention of your Post Master General be called to this alteration." It is much to be regretted that the Honourable Court did not see fit to announce with the same formalities a far more important alteration, the reduction of the French postage from 2s. 8d. to 1s. 8d. In that case our Post Master General would have been obliged to pay immediate and particular attention to it, instead of continuing to announce the old rate for months after it had been abolished. As the post Master has now done with the Governor General's journey to the Upper Provinces, perhaps he will find leisure to publish the amended rate which has not yet appeared.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8.

The accounts from Sukkur are still of the same melancholy character, and the troops are saved from annihilation only by the moderation or fears of the Beloochees. Each Regiment has still 500 in hospital.

The Honourable Caleb Cushing, the Envoy from the United States of America, to the Emperor of China, after having been most honourably and most hospitably treated at Bombay by the Government and the community, has embarked for the Celestial empire, where the Brother of the Sun and the Moon does not by any means wish to see him, and will contrive to evade a meeting by referring him to the 8th Article of the Supplementary Treaty with Great Britain, and sending him back to Washington.

The Englishman says there was a report yesterday of an outbreak in Nepal. We have heard of no other outbreak than one of regret at Mr. Hodgson's approaching departure. The Darbar was loading him with tokens of their esteem and gratitude.

The Star says, that final arrangements have been determined on for the occupation of Scinde by Bengal troops, and that the several Regiments will proceed to their destination immediately.

Mr. George Thompson has arrived in Calcutta and embarks on Friday morning in the Bentick.

The Englishman states, on the authority of a letter from the North West, that three French officers had arrived at Cabul with the intention of forming and disciplining a force for the Affghans, as their countrymen have done in the Punjab. They could not have arrived at a time when their aid will be less prized.

The Governor General, it is said, intends to proceed forthwith to the banks of the Sutledge, doubtless Ferozepore, the scene of last year's festivities; but apparently with a different object; not to receive a triumphant army on its return at the foot of the bridge, but to send an army across it to gather fresh laurels. The Post Office authorities are said to have received orders to lay bearers between Agra and Umbala. A letter from this latter place published in this day's Hurkaru seems to hint that Lord Ellenborough has demanded the session of the states belonging to the Sikhs, that it is to Runjeet Singh's successor, on the left bank of the Sutledge. These estates were acquired by the late ruler by gradual encroachments and are estimated to yield, if we remember right, a revenue of about 12 lakhs of Rupees a year. They were guaranteed to Runjeet Singh, more than thirty years ago. It is said that Heera Singh is quite willing to resign the lands, but that Golab Singh peremptorily refuses to give them up and even threatens to cross the river if we should attempt to occupy them.

The John Hepburne, which has come in from Rangoon, brings accounts of a very serious outbreak of the Chokra at Ava; to which the King's second illegitimate son, and one of his ministers well known to be very inimical to us, have fallen victims.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 11.

The last sale of Indigo at the Indigo Mart, is said to have gone off with spirit. The average price of about 100 maunds of Kishnaghur Indigo was 150. Rs. the factory maund; the average of Tirhoot, about 105.

An attempt is said to have been made to carry the young King of the Punjab, Duleep Sing, across the Sutledge into the British dominions. Two of his uncles endeavoured to corrupt the troops, but in vain; they then laid a horse dawk from Lahore to the river, but the project was discovered before they could put it into execution. They were seized and thrown into confinement, and the young lad was reinstated on the Gudgee. After this Heera Singh and Golab ordered a body of troops down to the Sutledge to watch the fords, but they mutinied and refused to go. It must however be remembered that all intelligence from the Punjab must be told throtimes by three independent witnesses before it is entitled to credit.

H. M's. 18th Foot embarked at Ferozepore for Soinde on the 24th, it is said in high spirits! It would seem as though Sir Robert Sale had proceeded with the Regiment in command of it.

The Star publishes a letter from Sukkur, which states that Sir Jasper Nicolls and family, with Col. Luard, had reached that station on his way to Bombay. He had written from Bhawalpore to request that no other mark of distinction should be shewn him but the salute due to his rank. Even that, owing to the universal sickness, could not be shewn him. In fact the army may be considered as broken up by the effects of the climate. So many officers had been obliged to leave the station, that there was likely soon to be a Brigade of sick men without officers. Of 164 Artillerymen who left Ferozepore not long ago, 60 have been consigned to the grave. Rain was expected in the next month, when the Medical men predicted the Sepoys would die like rotten sheep.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 12.

The great Steam Meeting yesterday afternoon was attended by more than 400 persons.

The Star states, that preparations are again going on for the siege train at Agra, which is to be on a larger scale than ever. The whole force was calculated to assemble there by the 4th; the Governor General would reach the station by the 10th, and it is said that the force would be in motion towards Gwalior by the 12th.

—The Hurkaru states, that the attempted flight of Duleep Singh, and the subsequent mutiny of some of the Sikh troops is confirmed. Golab Sing and Heera Sing are still at the capital, enlisting troops, in consequence of the consternation created by the large force we are gathering on the Sutlege. The same accounts state that Akbar Khan was at the Western extremity of the Khyber, ready of course to fall upon Peshawur.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 13.

The Hurkaru states that the mercantile firm, which was mentioned in its law report some ten days ago as having sought the protection of the Insolvent Court, was that of McGregor, Hunter and Co.—Friend of India.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

INITIALLY.

TO OPEN ON THE FIRST OF JANUARY, 1844.

THE VERY REV. DR. KENNEDY,
Principal.

St. John's College is designed chiefly to educate youth for the sacred ministry, for the Vicariate Apostolic of Bengal. The abundant benediction which it has pleased God to bestow on the mission of Bengal, the constantly increasing numbers of the Catholic community, and the necessity of establishing new missions in different parts of the Vicariate all demand, that provision should be made here immediately, to educate candidates for the service of the sacred ministry, in order to multiply the number of labourers in the Vineyard of the Lord, and to secure a succession of good Pastors for the Vicariate.

The Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic though for a long time, deeply solicitous to secure for the Church of Bengal an advantage of such great moment for its permanent welfare, abstained from pressing the subject on the notice of his generous flock, from a feeling, that the demands made on them, for the Orphanage and other charitable purposes, were as much as their circumstances would allow them to meet.

The same feeling would still prevent him from calling their attention to the subject, if through a singular manifestation of the Divine Goodness, a House and Demesne had not been placed at his disposal, (which cost the late Proprietor the immense sum of about 100,000 Rupees,) for the establishment of a College. The conditions annexed to this foundation are such, as the Archbishop confidently hopes, can be complied with, so as to satisfy fully the wishes of the benevolent Founder, and, at the same time, secure for the Bengal Mission, an Institution, which, with the blessing of Heaven, will in a few years, send forth a holy and a learned Priesthood, qualified by their education and knowledge of the language and usages of the country, to be the Pastors of the faithful, and the Herald of salvation to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

As the Funds under the administration of the Archbishop suffice to provide for the education and support of six students, it is intended, as soon as circumstances permit, to select candidates for these scholarships, by concursus, or according to merit to be ascertained by examination. For the present young men who have wholly or nearly completed their classical studies in some of the approved Seminaries of Great Britain and Ireland will be chosen, in order to attain more expeditiously the object, for which the Seminary is established, and to give time to the Anglo India Youth who aspire to the Priesthood, to make such a proficiency in the English, Greek and Latin languages and Mathematics, as will qualify them to complete for the above mentioned Scholarships. Due notice will be given to candidates, of the subject-matter of the examination to be undergone by them. In accordance with, Catholic discipline, testimonials of exemplary conduct and attention to the duties of religion, must be produced before any candidate is admitted to examination.

Such benefactions as the faithful may bestow on the Institution, will be employed in purchasing a suitable Library, in furnishing a Hall with the apparatus required for the Study of Natural Philosophy, in erecting such additional buildings as may be found necessary, and finally, in founding free places for candidates for the sacred ministry, of distinguished piety and attainments.

In order to promote these important objects, and to assist in defraying the expenses of Institution, arrangements have been made for educating in St. John's College twelve young gentlemen not designed for the clerical profession, at the monthly charge of thirty Rupees for each Boarder and of twenty-one for each day Boarder. The course of education will comprise the Greek and Latin Classics, French, Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, &c., English Grammar, Geography, History, the use of the Globes, Logic, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, and the native languages generally in use. No pupils will be received under six or beyond fourteen years of age.

Payment to be made quarterly in advance, and a month when once entered upon to be charged for in full. No extra charge will be made for Medicines and for the attendance of any other besides the appointed Physician of the Seminary. The monthly pension fixed for Boarders includes all charges, for washing, and for the use of books and table and bedroom furniture.

Reference for further information to be made to the Principal of the College.

NOTICE.

The Treasurer for the Society of the Propagation of the Faith, having written to the Bishop to request that the account of the receipts in the Bengal Vicariate for the last twelve months should be adjusted, the Bishop requests that all sums received for that Society may be immediately transmitted to him

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 26.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14.

Amongst the notices of Marriages appears the first celebrated in Calcutta by the Ministers of the Free Presbyterian Church, who have thus taken their place with the Dissenters in asserting their right to marry, even without an extension of the new marriage Act to India.

A handsome silver cup has been presented by the Assam Company to Captain F. W. Smith of the Sectakoond, in acknowledgment of his services in taking their Steamer twice to Allahabad, so as to establish her character.

The Star mentions a rumour as current for some time past, derived from private letters by the last mail, that it is the intention of the Court of Directors at last to grant an increase of European Officers to the Indian Army. The increase is to be made by the formation of a second grade of Captains, giving each Regiment a number of second Captains eventually to equal the present number of Captains, but to be promoted gradually as young officers are sent to occupy the inferior ranks. Opposition to the measure is, however, anticipated from the Home Government, as the premier is said to be determinedly opposed to any increase of the Indian army, either officers or men, because of certain new arrangements intended at the expiration of the present charter.

A letter in the Star from Sukkur, of the 27th November, gives a list of thirty-four Officers who had been compelled by sickness to leave the station, and two who had died, within the previous two months. The lives of a detachment of European Artillery, three Regiments and the staff were then intrusted to the care of one medical officer. Fever was gradually decreasing; but dysentery was raging as much as ever.

The Englishman reports that Sir William Nott left Lucknow on the evening of the 5th Instant with his family, to proceed to sea for the benefit of his health; and that Major General Pollock has gone to Lucknow to officiate for him during his absence—rather a singular arrangement certainly.

The Agra Post Office is to be immediately given into the charge of an Uncovenanted Officer—an arrangement which might be followed elsewhere, and no harm be done.

The Delhi Gazette of the 6th instant says, that Camp equipage was preparing at Agra for the Governor General, and that his Lordship's Aid-de-camp Captain Maclean, with the cook and native doctor reached Agra on the 4th.

In the same paper there appears a letter from Gwalior, of the 27th November, which states that a meeting of the officers of the Lushkur had been held, at which it was suggested that no opposition should be offered to the British Army crossing the Chambul, but that feigning a retreat they should get behind the British Force and fall on Agra, Muttra and Delhi. Nothing, however, was definitely resolved on. The last report from Gwalior to the 3d instant, was that Bapoo Seetoleeah has strongly advised the Tara Bhaee, at the earnest suggestion of the Bhaee Bhaee, to give up Dadajee; and that Ram-Rao Pholke, Sambajee, and other deputies at Agra had been instructed accordingly. The superior officers are anxious to give up the Dada, but the men are urgent against the measure.

Baboo D'varkanath Tagore arrived at Delhi on the 1st instant, and is busy sight seeing. The King left his Palace on the 5th instant, for the first time since he was deprived of the harmless homage of his Nuzzurs; and he received the proper salutes both from his own battery, and from the light field battery in garrison.

So poor is the supply of firewood in Delhi, that the extra demand for funeral piles, in consequence of unusual mortality amongst the Hindoos, has raised the price of the better sort of fuel to a Rupee for two maunds. Government has increased the allowance for planting trees from 1000 to 3000 Rupres, on the Doonab canal; and for the past eight months the planting operations have gone on rapidly.

Letters from Loodiana, to the 3d December, says the Delhi Gazette, give the intelligence that Raja Goolah Singh is likely to assume command of all the Sikh troops on the right bank of the Sutlege, to be stationed opposite Ferozepore; that Lena Singh is to command at Phuloor, and Sonchet Singh at Ro-per. It is also reported that all the European Officers are to be dismissed from the Seikh service; and that steps are to be taken for putting to death Juwahir Sing, the uncle of the King, who attempted to run off with him.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15.

The Star reports, that the Siege Train now forming at Agra, consists of 50 pieces of ordnance, (6 of them being Iron 24 Pounders, and 10 of them Iron 18 Pounders,) together with several Field pieces.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16.

An advertisement appears to day of the appointment of Mr. James Calder Stewart as successor to Mr. Gordon in the Secretaryship of the Union Bank, subject to the approval of the Proprietors at their next general meeting. Mr. Stewart undertakes his office in circumstances that will afford opportunity for exhibiting every qualification he can possess for the discharge of its duties: and we trust he will shew himself equal to the occasion. As it is, he is recommended both by the excellence of his personal character, and his relationship to one of the kindest hearted men ever connected with the commerce of Calcutta, James Calder; and Calcutta has not been poor in such characters.

At Hickey and Co.'s sale of the 14th, the highest price obtained for Indigo—that of R. C. Bell and Co Nuddea,—was Rs. 152-8

We are happy to see a notice of the near completion of that splendid ornament to the City of Palaces, the Metcalfe Hall.

The Hurkaru reports the prevalence of cholera and small pox at Akyab, with great mortality amongst the Native population; Lieut. Staples, of the 68th N. I. had also been cut off by cholera.

The Bombay Government have been under the necessity of advertizing for uncovenanted Surgeons, to proceed to Scinde on temporary employment. We are happy to see it stated in the Gentleman's Gazette, that the sickness in Scinde is not fatal in proportion to its extent.

The Bombay Geographical Society have received their portrait of Sir A. Burnes, from the easel of Brockedon.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 18.

The Calcutta Trade Association have made a valuable contribution to the advocacy of our Steam Cause, in Memorials to the Board of Control, and the Court of Directors, which will be found amongst our selections.

The Governor General reached Allahabad on the 3d instant, and was expected at Agra on the 11th.

The Delhi Gazette of the 9th contains long communications from Cabul, the most important items of which are the visit of the Meer Wullee of Khooloom to the Dost with little welcome—the dismissal of Sufter Jung with four Rupees for his travelling expenses, and every mark of contumely, on his way—the rapacity of the Dost in confiscating the property of a merchant at Attock on pretence that he is dead—and the reception of a studiously brief reply from the Governor General, to the communication formerly reported to have been sent him by the Dost. Every thing asked has been refused yet the Dost has another letter to his Lordship in preparation.

The late appearance of the Nepaulse in the territories of Oude had occasioned orders to the troops at Cawnpore to hold themselves ready for service on the shortest notice. The orders, however were soon withdrawn.

THE NOVEMBER MAIL.

The November Mail, which we were led by the Bombay Times, not to expect for several days, has come in unexpectedly this morning, (Wednesday) and we have received by express, a copy of the London Atlas of the 4th of November. The only intelligence of particular interest is the prohibition of farther meetings in Ireland and the arrest and prosecution of Daniel O'Connell, for conspiracy and other misdemeanors. We present our reader with the Summary of the Atlas and subjoin to it some farther items of intelligence gleaned from the Journal.

SUMMARY OF THE MONTH.

The absence of all subjects of public excitement during the month of September has been fully counterbalanced by the political occurrences of the month that has just closed. The mail which bore to India the tidings of our gracious Sovereign's reception in France and Belgium, and was rife with complaints of the inaction of our Government in respect to Ireland and Wales, had scarcely left these shores when the authorities shook off their lethargy and commenced operations in both quarters. The first measure adopted was to prohibit a great repeal meeting at Clontarf by proclamation—the second, to arrest O'Connell and some of his repeal associates on a charge of sedition founded upon the deposition of a reporter named Hughes.

We hear that preparations are making for the trial of the great Agitator and that counter proceedings had been attempted against the reporter upon a charge of perjury. By a very large class the Government is censured for its present interference, seeing that it has permitted monster meetings to be held, and inflammatory harangues to be delivered, for months past without let or hindrance, therefore in a manner connived at the operations of the repealers. On the other hand it is argued that effectually to arrest the demonstrations making in Ireland, a large amount of physical force, well organized and judiciously placed, was essential; and as this coercive power could not be mustered at an earlier period, there is no sufficient reason for an imputation of indifference to O'Connell's proceedings. It is confidently asserted that Government will fail to obtain a verdict against O'Connell simply upon the statement of a man who has erred in part of his representations. Meanwhile, Ireland is covered with troops, and her coasts watched by vessels of war.

Great activity prevails in the law courts of Dublin, and O'Connell divides his time between preparations for his defence and exhortations to his millions of followers not to violate the public peace.

In South Wales an inquiry, by commission, has been commenced, and some of the "daughters of Rebecca" whose violence was attended with crime, have already come under the cognizance of the law. But here, as in Ireland, commotion has temporarily ceased, pending, as it were, the result of the investigations. The solemn inquiry ordered by Government demonstrates that the grievances of the rustic population have awakened Ministers from their apathy, and riveted attention upon the necessity for soothing measures—and that is something gained.

Alderman Magnay has been elected Lord Mayor of London by a majority of 700, over his closest competitor.

The Reverend Dr. Wolff has taken his departure for Bokhara, for the rescue of Col. Stoodart and Capt. Conolly, if they yet survive, and to gather particulars of their death, if they have been murdered. The subscription to defray his expenses has not reached more than 300*l*.

Sir, Archibald Campbell, so well known in India by his campaigns in Burmah, has paid the debt of nature at a very advanced age.

The Duke of Bordeaux, the Pretender to the throne of France has taken his flight with a considerable suite. A regular system of espionage has been organized by the French Government, to watch all his movements.

The election of the free trade candidate for the city of London, Mr. Pattison, was carried by a majority of 165; the numbers being for Mr. Pattison 6532, and for his opponent Mr. Baring, the advocate of commercial restrictions, 6367.

Sir James Shaw, Bart. of the county of Ayr, who had by his industry and honesty, raised himself from the humblest situation in a mercantile counting house to the office of Lord Mayor, and Chamberlain of the City, has died at the age of 80.

Lord Ellenborough's proposal to discontinue the system of advances on goods in India, with the view of effecting remittances to England, has created a considerable sensation in the commercial circles in London; but it appears to be generally approved.—Friend of India.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

From the 1st of January, 1844, the arrangements with regard to the Pews at St. Thomas' Church will be as follows:—

Persons who wish to secure particular seats in St. Thomas' Church will have to apply to Mr. P. S. D'Rozario, who will sell Tickets for 1 month, 3 months, or 6 months, for cash only, at prices fixed by authority of His Grace the Archbishop. Considerable reduction in the former prices has been made in favor of persons taking more than one Chair, or Chairs for 3 or 6 months. Persons desirous of securing particular seats had better apply as early as possible, as the sale of Tickets will commence as soon as they are prepared.

Persons who are indebted for Seats are requested to pay up their arrears before the 1st of January.

will forgive our presumption, we would say that his remarks on "brandy pany" are not expressed with sufficient brevity. "It was believed twenty years ago that no sailor could be a sailor except he were supported by the stimulus, not of grog, but of raw spirits. The allaying of these with a proportion of water was long looked upon as a dangerous effeminacy, not unlikely to sap the vigor of our seamen." We think the pithy remark of the old Engineer who sat up the first Steam Engine in Serampore twenty-four years ago, rather more to the point; "Sir, nothing spoils Brandy so much as water."

The Star states, that Lord Ellenborough was to march with the Army on the 16th, and that his Lordship retains only one member of his personal staff about him, Capt. Maclean; all the others being distributed among the several divisions and brigades as extra aides-de-camps to the several commanding officers. Of the public officer, there will march with his Lordship Colonels Stuart and Sanders, and Messrs. Mansel and Currie.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 26.

The Ceylon papers mention that the Hindustan arrived at Galle on the 23d of November, a day or two earlier than was expected. She left Calcutta on the morning of the 15th, and has therefore made the voyage to Galle, stopping at Madras, in the very brief space of eight days.

The Star gives the number of Cooly emigrants, who have been sent to the Mauritius during the month of October and November. It is not less than 4014. The Agents have certainly made the most of the time allowed for their operations. On Monday next all farther exportation of labourers, through the instrumentality of private individuals, will cease.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 27.

The Madras papers state that a spirit of disaffection had been exhibited by the force which lately proceeded from Kamptee to Jubbulpore, consequent on the stoppage of field batta from the date of their arrival at that station. Just as the excitement was becoming troublesome, it was allayed by the following wise resolution which had been received from Madras, "The most noble the Governor in Council observes that the relief of the subsidiary forces contemplated by the Government, was a return within the territories of this Presidency, until which time full batta will be continued to the troops."

On the 16th of December, the very day on which the Governor General and the Commander-in-Chief left Agra for Gwalior, Gungadhar Bullalee, the treasurer of the Mahratta Raj, commonly called the Dada Khasjee walla, was delivered up to Sir Richmond Shakespear, and was sent on to Agra under an escort. This event however has not arrested the progress of our troops. The Gwalior army may yet have one fight for its bread.—Friend of India.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

INITIALLY.

To OPEN THE FIRST OF JANUARY, 1844.

THE VERY REV. DR. KENNEDY,
Principal.

St. John's College is designed chiefly to educate youth for the sacred ministry, for the Vicariate Apostolic of Bengal. The abundant benediction which it has pleased God to bestow on the mission of Bengal, the constantly increasing numbers of the Catholic community, and the necessity of establishing new missions in different parts of the Vicariate all demand, that provision should be made here immediately, to educate candidates for the service of the sacred ministry, in order to multiply the number of labourers in the Vineyard of the Lord, and to secure a succession of good Pastors for the Vicariate.

The Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, although for a long time deeply solicitous to secure for the Church of Bengal an advantage of such great moment for its permanent welfare, abstained from pressing the subject on the notice of his generous flock, from a feeling, that the demands made on them, for the Orphanage and other charitable purposes, were as much as their circumstances would allow them to meet.

The same feeling would still prevent him from calling their attention to the subject, if through a singular manifestation of the Divine Goodness, a House and Demeane had not been placed at his disposal, (which cost the late Proprietor the immense sum of about 100,000 Rupees,) for the establishment of a College. The conditions annexed to this foundation are such, as the Archbishop confidently hopes can be complied with, so as to satisfy fully the wishes of the benevolent Founder, and, at the same time, secure for the Bengal Mission, an Institution, which, with the blessing of Heaven, will in a few years, send forth a holy and a learned Priesthood, qualified by their education and knowledge of the language and usages of the country, to be the Pastors of the faithful, and the Heralds of salvation to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

As the Funds under the administration of the Archbishop suffice to provide for the education and support of six students, it is intended, as soon as circumstances permit, to select candidates for these scholarships, by concursus, or according to merit to be ascertained by examination. For the present young men who have wholly or nearly completed their classical studies in some of the approved Seminaries of Great Britain and Ireland will be chosen, in order to attain more expeditiously the object, for which the Seminary is established, and to give time to the Anglo India Youth who aspire to the Priesthood, to make such a proficiency in the English, Greek and Latin languages and Mathematics, as will qualify them to complete for the above mentioned Scholarships. Due notice will be given to candidates, of the subject-matter of the examination to be undergone by them. In accordance with Catholic discipline, testimonials of exemplary conduct and attention to the duties of religion, must be produced before any candidate is admitted to examination.

Such benefactions as the faithful may bestow on the Institution, will be employed in purchasing a suitable Library, in furnishing a Hall with the apparatus required for the Study of Natural Philosophy, in erecting such additional buildings as may be found necessary, and finally, in founding free places for candidates for the sacred ministry, of distinguished piety and attainments.

In order to promote these important objects, and to assist in defraying the expenses of Institution, arrangements have been made for educating in St. John's College twelve young gentlemen not designed for the clerical profession, at the monthly charge of thirty Rupees for each Boarder and of twenty-one for each day Boarder. The course of education will comprise the Greek and Latin Classics, French, Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, &c. English Grammar, Geography, History, the use of the Globes, Logic, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, and the native languages generally in use. No pupils will be received under six or beyond fourteen years of age.

Payment to be made quarterly in advance, and a month when once entered upon to be charged for in full. No extra charge will be made for Medicines and for the attendance of any other besides the appointed Physician of the Seminary. The monthly pension fixed for Boarders includes all charges, for washing, and for the use of books and table and bedroom furniture.

Reference for further information to be made to the Principal of the College.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 27.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21.

The last accounts received from Lahore which appear in the Delhi Gazette, state that the danger of a collision between Heera Singh and Suchet Singh, his uncle, was very imminent; that Golab Singh had done every thing to prevent it, and that he had at length prevailed on his brother to accompany him to Jumboo, and it seems that the result of Golab Singh's advent is simply this, that he marched down the hill with twenty thousand men, and then marched up the hill again with them.

Lord Ellenborough reached Agra on Monday morning the 11th instant, without either Chaplain or Council. He is therefore destitute alike of spiritual or temporal advice, and is left to walk after the counsel of his own will, and he has resolved, like his two predecessors Lord W. Bentinck and Lord Auckland, to see Gwalior; only they went thither with the most pacific views, and were cordially greeted. Our present ruler takes an Army of Exercise, and an enormous battering train with him, and is likely to be any thing but welcome.

An order has been issued by the Durbar of Lahore to confiscate all the jaygeers of Jowaher Singh, the uncle of Duleep Singh.

The general Orders by the President in Council published in last evening's Calcutta Gazette, contain instructions from the Court of Directors that Chaplains who have served seven years in India are entitled to a pension of £63 17s 6d, and their widows to one-half that sum. The widows of Chaplains who have actually served seven years in India will receive pensions as widows of Captains; of those who have completed fifteen years actual service, as widows of Majors.

Mr. R. N. C. Hamilton, the Secretary to Government for the North West Provinces, has been deputed on a special mission from the Governor General to Sirsa, and Bhawalpore.

The Englishman states, that the Assam Steamer now on her way down to Calcutta brings 400 chests of indigo. We believe this is the first instance in which Indigo has had a ride in a Steamer, and we have some curiosity to know the fare.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 22.

We were most agreeably surprized by the arrival yesterday of the first instalment of the regular Mail from Bombay, in nine days. Such despatch is altogether novel. The express arrived in eight days.

The City Article in the Star of this morning states, that at the date of the despatch of the November Mail, only the letters sent by the Hindoostan had been received in London, and the highest estimate of the present crop did not exceed 140,000 maunds. We question whether even this intelligence was in London, during the October sale, which terminated on the 19th of that month, and at which the finer qualities gave way from 4d. to 6d. a pound, while the middling qualities supported their rate. Of course, when the exuberance of the crop, which will scarcely fall short of 170,000 maunds—the largest ever obtained—is announced in England, the price of all qualities must recede.

The Englishman of this morning publishes that portion of the Essay on the developement of the resources of British India,—which he has been giving in successive portions—in which the cost of the proposed railways from Bombay to Calcutta, and from Bombay to Madras is given. It is estimated at 15 Millions Sterling, fifteen crores of Rupees. The interest of this sum at four per cent. would be 600,000l a year, six times as much as would give us Steam Communication monthly direct from Suez to each of the ports in India.

The chief news from Agra given this day, is, that the Gwalior Vakeel had waited on the Governor General, who told him that the terms of peace would be made known under the walls of Gwalior; a reply which would have had a more chivalrous air, if there had been any thing to oppose our march to that fortress.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23.

The Star of this morning states, that Sir George Pollock was to leave Dinapore on Tuesday the 19th to assume temporary charge of the Residency at Lucknow. His acceptance of this post, and only in an officiating capacity, is an enigma. The Office is little better than a sinecure, and has been held by Senior Merchants and officers of the rank of Field officers, but never has it been deemed equal in dignity to the command of a Division of the Army. The Governor General has recently loaded it with the tinsel trappings of a high sounding name, and the Resident has become his Excellency the Envoy, but this has not removed comparative insignificance of the post, any more than the Empress of Russia's promoting her gun brings into frigates, and her frigates into ships of the line, altered their intrinsic value.

The Englishman does not think that the credit of having originated the masterly movement up the Yang-tse-keang which brought the Emperor of China to terms, is due to the present Ministry, or to Lord Stanley. He seems still to give the paternity of it to Lord Auckland, by whom Capt. Bethune was deputed to survey that river.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 25.

The sword subscribed for by the Gentlemen of the Civil Service in testimony of their admiration of Sir Robert Sale's conduct at Jellalabad, is now, as we learn from the Star, at Messrs. Hamilton and Co's. The cost was 300l.

The Delhi Gazette, states, that his Honour the Lieut. Governor arrived at Meerut on the morning of the 12th, so unwell that even the salute due to him was not given. This paragraph refers of course to the late Lieut. Governor, Mr. Clerk, who is now on his way to Calcutta, to embark for England. We hope the next accounts will be more favourable; and that he may live, not only to reach England, but to return to India, where his profound acquaintance with the politics of Upper India, united with the activity and vigor of his character, will at all times render his services invaluable.

There is an admirable article in this day's Star on the subject of Temperance in general, and the Calcutta Temperance Sailors' home in particular, which we would recommend to the perusal of all who can lay their hands on the paper. It is pleasing to see a journal, which is usually so much opposed to whatever the Editor deems cant, so powerfully advocating the cause of Temperance.—If the writer

[VOL. VI.]

PASTORAL ADDRESS.

TO THE CATHOLICS OF BENGAL.

PATRICK JOSEPH, by the grace of God, and the favor of the Holy Apostolic See, Archbishop of Edessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, to the Faithful under his care, wishes Health and Benediction.

BELOVED BRETHREN IN JESUS CHRIST,

Our gratitude to God, for the abundant blessings, which, during the past year, He has poured upon the Church of Bengal, and our zeal for your future welfare, prompt us to address you on the present occasion. We do so, in order that, by reminding you of the mercies conferred upon you, we may excite you to unite with us in rendering due thanks to the Almighty goodness, and, also, that we may manifest our pastoral solicitude, by calling your attention to those counsels and instructions, which we deem it proper to suggest, for the further advancement of our holy religion.

For, Beloved Brethren, we must ever hold in mind, that the solemn admonition of the Saviour, "No man putting his hand to the plough and looking backwards is fit for the kingdom of Heaven;" we must remember, we repeat it, that this warning is applicable, not only to each individual Christian, but also to the Faithful collectively, who compose or constitute each portion of the Catholic Church.

In compliance, then, with this divine maxim, it is our duty constantly to labour with vigilance, zeal and charity to complete the good work, which God has begun amongst us, and to give to it all the perfection, comprehensiveness, and permanency, which fidelity, on our part, in co-operating with the divine grace, will enable us to bestow upon it.

To impress this truth on our minds and hearts, the Spirit of God, in the Holy Scriptures, represents the Church, as a garden and as a vineyard, in order thus to instruct us, that unceasing care and exertion are necessary, both to prevent noxious weeds from growing up in it, and at the same time, to render it productive of good fruit, worthy to be presented to the Lord, by whose right arm it hath been planted.

Having thus prepared you, Beloved Brethren, for the fulfilment of what religion expects from you, it is consoling to us to inform you, that in every part of Bengal in which, during the past year, any of our Priests resided, many of those who were to be saved were added to the Church of God, and rescued from the dangers of superstition, or heresy. Upwards of one hundred of the poor children of our community are sheltered, supported and educated in the Orphanage, whilst for the education of children of the middling and the wealthier classes, due provision is made in our Institutions at Serampore and Calcutta. Neither have the wants of the destitute orphan been forgotten in the remoter parts of the Vicariate. At Chittagong, through the pious exertions of the excellent Pastor of that district, several of these beloved little ones of Jesus Christ are also provided for. With the view to enable our Orphan Boys to procure an honest and respectable livelihood, when they shall attain manhood, we have already made arrangements, to have the more mature among them instructed in some useful trade or occupation, and we trust, that we shall soon accomplish a similar arrangement in favor of the destitute female children under our care.

It has long been an object much desired by us to introduce into this portion of the Church of Christ, a community of Religious persons, who, like the Sisters of Charity, would devote themselves to visit the sick, to minister to their spiritual and temporal necessities, and assist in preparing them to receive the last sacraments, in an edifying manner. We have reason to hope, that the day is not distant, when, you, Beloved Brethren, will enjoy this blessing, a blessing, which in Europe, America, and, now, even in Africa, is appreciated as inestimable, not only by Catholics, but even by those who differ from us in religion.

To perpetuate the work of the Ministry in Bengal, and to be enabled to introduce into the Sanctuary a succession of Holy and Learned Pastors, qualified to preside over the Faithful in this Vicariate, we, aided by the munificence of a respected Member of your body, have established a Seminary, from which, through God's mercy, we hope that many important blessings will, in due time, be derived by you. It will be gratifying to your zeal to be informed, that six young Ecclesiastics of approved piety and talents are, by this time, on their way, to enter St. John's College and prepare for the Sacred Ministry.

We invite you, Beloved Brethren, to join in prayer for the speedy and safe arrival of these pious young men, who are leaving all that is dear to human nature, in order to devote themselves here to the service of God and of his Holy Church. Still more earnestly do we ask your prayers, to obtain the same favor for the excellent and estimable Coadjutor, whom the Holy See has chosen to assist us in our labors for your welfare, and for the Priests, the holy Virgins and Monks, who, for the sake of Christ, accompany your future Prelate to this distant and dangerous climate.

Remember, Beloved Brethren, that whilst the treasures of religion and education are copiously distributed, more especially to such of you and your children as reside in Calcutta and its vicinity, there are thousands of your fellow-Catholics dispersed in the several parts of Bengal, who are utterly destitute of any of the blessings which you enjoy. Their little ones ask for bread, and there is no one to break it to them. In the language of holy Job, they cry aloud to you "Have pity on me, have pity on me, at least, you, my friends, have pity on me, for the hand of the Lord hath afflicted me." Oh! yes, their affliction is heavy indeed, for not only has their vineyard been neglected, but its fences have been destroyed, its beauty disfigured and defiled, for "a singular wild beast has been devastating and despoiling it." The savage and many-headed monster of error has roamed undismayed by the faithful watchmen of Israel, for these had perished, and there were none to succeed them through those places, where once the name of the Lord was honored by a pure and holy worship, where the unspotted oblation of the new and eternal Testament had sent up once a sweet odor to Heaven, and propitiated the mercies of the Most High. Be it ours, beloved brethren, to collect together the stones of the sanctuary, which have been dispersed, to rekindle the sacred fire, which, during the spiritual captivity of our brethren, has been turned into thick water, and to restore the blessings of a lawful and holy Priesthood, untainted with the plague spots of heresy, schism, or immorality.

With regard to those of our beloved flock who reside in Calcutta and its vicinity, we earnestly exhort them, to form themselves in each of the parochial districts which have been recently erected, into religious associations, under the immediate superintendence of their respective officiating Pastors, in order to co-operate with the parochial clergy in their labors, to ascertain the number of Catholics resident in each district, the number of Catholic children who frequent Catholic or Protestant Schools of a proselytizing description, the number of the really destitute and deserving objects of our communion, and also the best means to obtain from those who can afford it, regular contributions for the Orphanage, the Free Schools, the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, and the establishment of new Missions throughout the province of Bengal. We particularly exhort and implore the educated and religious portion of the people of Calcutta in particular, to encourage their poorer and less instructed brethren, to send the children of the latter to the Catholic Male and Female Free Schools, established in the principal parts of the city, and not to barter the salvation of the little ones of Christ, who were baptized in the Catholic Church, for any paltry mercenary retribution, which, in their regard, must be deemed the wages of iniquity.

We also conjure those of our brethren, whose station and example give them deserved influence, to encourage, as far as in them lies, the regular attendance of the adult and young of the poorer classes at Divine Service on Sunday mornings and evenings in their respective public Churches. It is only by the regular ordinary attention of the humbler members of our community to pub-lie worship and instruction, that their character can be improved, and those habits of virtue formed in them, which will render their profession of the true faith profitable to themselves and honorable to Catholicity.

It is the peculiar glory of our holy religion, that, recognising as it does between all its children a sacred bond of communion which belongs to itself alone, it thus causes them to sympathize and rejoice in the sorrows or success of each other, in every part of the universe, as becomes Members of the same family and the offspring of the same parent. Profiting of this sacred and endearing connection, we now, beloved brethren, lay before you, in the documents annexed to this Pastoral letter, the accounts we have received from the Venerable Bishop of Drusipare, of the cruel sufferings and glorious triumph of our fellow Catholics in Corea, more than one hundred of whom have attested with their blood, their inflexible fidelity to the sublime faith and morality of the Church, to which we have the happiness to belong. From the narrative of this event, so revolting to humanity, but yet so glorious to the cause of truth, you will perceive with delight and holy gratitude to God, that, emulating the heroic fervor of the first Christians, the Bishop, as became his sacred dignity, led on his Priests to martyrdom, and that the precious example of these good Shepherds was courageously followed, not only by several of the ordinary class of the faithful, but also by many tender virgins and young children. We are confident, beloved brethren, that we only anticipate your pious desires, when we ordain that on the Octave of the Epiphany, the feast sacred to the Conversion of the Gentiles, the Holy Sacrifice of the Altar shall be offered up in all the Churches of Calcutta and its vicinity, both to return worthy thanks to the God of Martyrs for the supernatural strength, fortitude and constancy, bestowed by his mercy on these recent witnesses to the Gospel, and to supplicate the Almighty, to render the blood that has been shed, the fertile seed of Christianity, in the country where it was poured forth. We leave it to the piety of our Reverend Brethren, who reside at a distance from Calcutta, to fix a convenient day for their respective congregations for the discharge of the same religious exercise which we have just recommended to your notice.

Now to Him, Beloved Brethren, who is able to preserve you without sin, and to present you spotless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy in the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, to the only God, our Saviour, through Jesus Christ our Lord, be glory and magnificence, empire and power, before all ages, and now, and for all ages of ages. Amen.

Given at the Cathedral House, Calcutta, on the Octave-day of St. John the Evangelist, 1844.

Archbishop of Edessa,
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

J. X. MASCARENHAS,
Secretary to the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic.

This Pastoral to be read at the public Mass in each of the Churches of the Bengal Vicariate, on Sunday, the 7th instant, in Calcutta and its vicinity, and on the following Sunday in the more remote Churches of Bengal.

By order of the Archbishop,
J. X. MASCARENHAS,
Secretary.

Pondicherry, December 12, 1843.

MY LORD,

Yesterday I received letters from Montchourie. I hasten to make your Lordship acquainted with the important intelligence they contain. They convey to me the official information of the Martyrdom of our humble brethren Mgr. Jenbert, and of Messrs. Chastan and Manbant; they had their heads cut off the 21st September, 1839. I have not received an account of the persecution, it was sent to the Members of the two Councils of "the Work of the Propagation of the Faith" I send to your Grace the documents which I have received, consisting of a letter of Mgr. Ferreol elected Bishop of Belline, and Vicar Apostolic of Corea, which contains the copy of a letter from Mr. Chastan, written before he was placed under the power of the fury of the persecutors, and a P. S. of a letter from Mgr. Berrolles. I enclose in this an authentic copy of each. These two documents speak for themselves, and demand not the slightest commentary. If from one side, we are profoundly afflicted by hearing of the cruel ravages of the persecution in Corea, and the great loss we have sustained in the only three Apostolic labourers that we had, on the other hand we are consoled in our Saviour by hearing of the holy and intrepid faith of these admirable athletes of Jesus Christ, which has rendered them worthy to be placed amongst the Martyrs of the fairest times of the Church, and that Heaven had worked prodigies in favor of these young virgins, who had the happiness of gaining the double palm of virginity, and of Martyrdom. Is it not worthy of the Priesthood of Jesus Christ to see Priests at the same time Martyrs of obedience, of charity, and of faith? Can one see even in the Martyrs of Europe more of intrepidity, and more of virtue than in the virgin Martyrs of Corea? Do the annals of the Church furnish us in a more striking degree with all the vigour of faith exhibited by young people of 12 years of age? Your Lordship will easily understand that the circumstances attending these glorious martyrdoms cannot be too well made known to the Christians of your vicariate and even to the public. Permit, I pray, the sentiments of affection and of respect of him who is, very sincerely,

My Lord,

Your very humble and devoted servant,
CL. BONNAND.

Bishop of Drusipare, V. A.

P. S. The Christians of Corea have sent couriers to demand new missionaries. Monsieur Ferreol and Mr. Maistre are waiting at Srastang for a favorable opportunity for going.

Mongolie dans le Conaté de Karlans Bout, 15 Fevrier, 1843.

MY LORD,—I have the pain of communicating that in 1839 there was a cruel persecution in Corea of which Mgr. de Capsee and his two dear associates, Messrs. Manbant and Chastan, were the victims. As in all probability you have already received or will soon receive, a detailed account which Mr. Imbert left, I content myself by transcribing for your Lordship the letter of Mr. Chastan, addressed to our Vicars Apostolic and to our Brethren:—"My Lord, your Highnesses, and Gentlemen, our dear Brethren,—Divine Providence, which had conducted us across so many obstacles in this mission, permits that the peace which we enjoyed should be disturbed by a cruel persecution. The representation left by his Lordship before his entrance into prison, which shall be sent by these letters (if we can find means), will make you acquainted with the cause, the train of events, and their effects. 25 Confessors were beheaded, one died from torments, or from the effects of them; more than 150 are in irons. The number of apostates were not few. His Lordship thought of saving his flock by delivering himself; notwithstanding, as there was no question regarding us in these torments, but only apostatize, and save your life, one feared to irritate them to evil, in lieu of soothing it by presenting one's-self. Towards the end of July, having had the happiness of being reunited, his Lordship was desirous of sending us to China, and to go alone to receive the crown of martyrdom."

"This proposition afflicted us exceedingly; the evident danger of death which the Boatmen and their families would run, caused it to be rejected."

"This day, the 7th September, a second order has arrived from his Lordship to present ourselves to martyrdom. We have the sweet pleasure of departing, after having celebrated the last sacrifice. How consoling it is to be able to say with St. Gregory 'Unum ad palmam iter, pro Christo mortem appeto.'

"If we have the happiness of obtaining this glorious crown, 'quæ dicitur sua vis ad gustum, umbrosa ad requiem non arabiles ad triumphum,' perform for us a thousand actions of thankfulness for the divine goodness, and do not fail to send succours to these poor neophytes who will again find themselves orphans. To encourage our dear Brethren who will be destined to replace us, I have the happiness to announce to them that the minister Y., actually a great persecutor, has caused three large sabres to be made for cutting off heads. If anything could diminish the joy which we feel at the moment of departure it would be to quit these fervent Neophytes, to whom we have had the happiness of administering for three years, and who love us as the Galatians loved St. Paul, but we are going to too great a feast that it should be permitted that feelings of sorrow should enter our hearts. We have the honor to recommend these dear neophytes to your ardent charity; accept our humble adieus, our prayers, in union with good works, sufferings, and sacrifice. We have the honor to remain, with the most profound respect, my dear brethren, your very humble and obedient servants and brethren."

(Signed) "J. H. CHASTAN M. A.
"Corea, the 6th December, 1839."

P. S.—A few days after our dear brethren were in possession of the crown of double martyrdom of charity and of faith. If the triumph of the pastor was glorious and ravishing, the state of the flock is very sad, very deplorable!

(Signed) J. FERREOL,
Bishop Elect of Belline, and Vic. Ap. of Corea,

P. S. of a letter from Mgr. Berrolles, Bishop of Columbia and Vicar Apostolic of Seasbourg, written to Mgr. Bonnand, Bishop of Drusipare, Vicar Apostolic of Pondicherry, dated 20th May, 1843.

ONE WORD ON THE SUBJECT OF COREA.
The Coreans, after a silence of three years, have at length given us information regarding them. In 1839, the Saturday, 21st September, the feast of St. Matthew, Mgr. de Capse, M. M. Manbant and Chastan together gathered the crown of the Martyrs. They had their heads cut off,—Inelyti Israel amabilis et decori in vitâ sua, in morte quoque non sunt divisi!!! Mgr. delivered himself up on the 11th of August, and his associates by his commands, delivered themselves on the 7th September!!! It seems certain that they desponded too soon. Mr. Chastan says they might have concealed themselves, and the Christians consented to receive them.

But they are Martyrs——Mgr. had received, says Mr. Manbant, severe bastinading. They exposed numbers of Virgins of Corea, after having broken their bones and pierced their backs with spears made red hot, entirely naked, in the middle of the great prison, during more than two days, for the purpose of delivering them to the brutality of these swine.

Our Divine Saviour, the spouse of our souls, came to their aid, clothed in superhuman strength; together they defeated ten of these unclean animals, and they were preserved from all evil, from all outrage, and dishonour. These miserable creatures retired confounded and astonished. They had broken their bones, but the following day they found them cured, as well as many other Martyrs. About one hundred Martyrs! The persecution commenced in May, 1839. Now all appears tranquil. Mr. Ferréol named Vicar Apostolic, and Bishop of Belline, shall be consecrated, God assisting, the approaching winter. I cannot say where, for I myself have no habitation, on which I may depend but I dare not hope that either Mgr. Ferréol or Mr. Maistre can enter this year. They are going to attempt another route by the north, I hope it may succeed, after some years, quite close to the Sea of Japan. Amongst the one hundred Martyrs, sixty were decapitated, about forty died under an accumulation of miseries, imprisonment, and frightful tortures, which they endured. We remark, above all, 4 children, aged 12 years, who exhibited the courage and intrepidity of heroes. In general the intrepidity of these confessors may be compared to that of the Martyrs of Japan. I have sent to the two Councils a relation of the persecution; you will read it in the annals.

Bishop of Drusipare, V. A.

CONVERSIONS.—During the preceding week, a Chinese youth and a Protestant young woman were received into the Catholic Church in Calcutta.

A WORD OF THE PAST.

In commencing our sixth volume with a new year, we shall direct our readers' attention, briefly, to some of the most interesting events which we have had occasion to notice during the last twelve months. This retrospect is full of consolation for our fellow Catholics; it presents to the minds of our separated brethren abundant matter for reflection; and, while it cannot fail to wound the bigoted enemies of our holy religion, it will gladden the heart of the humane and philanthropic religionist, whatever may be his creed.

Who will not be glad to see two numerous Orphanages, depending for their monthly support on the Providence of God and the charity of men, well supported and flourishing? Who will not rejoice to see Free Schools established in every quarter of this city, and the facilities of gratuitous education extended to the very doors of our distressed brethren, under all the allurements of charity? Who is there so bad a Christian as not to wish to see peace restored, and the unbeliever who had been sitting in the darkness of the shadow of death, enlightened by the admirable light of the Gospel, and made a new creature?

The number of conversions recorded by us during the last year, to the Catholic faith from Heathenism, Mahomedanism, Protestantism, &c. may be about 100, and probably a considerable number has not come to our knowledge at all. We had the pleasure of noticing the establishment, on a respectable scale, of Male and Female Pay-Schools with a branch of the Loretto Convent at Serampore, where there was not a Catholic Institution, in the memory of any one now living, and the discovery of a new congregation of Christians by one of our Missionaries, the Rev. Mr. Barbe, in Tipperah, where, we understand, the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, is making arrangements for the permanent residence of a clergyman to minister to their spiritual wants. We had occasion to announce the arrival amongst us of several efficient labourers in the sacred ministry, who are now permanently attached to this mission, and, among others, lately, the addition of two priests, several students and lay brothers to St. Xavier's College.

We must not forget the Hindoo College founded by Mutty Lal Seal, and confided to the direction of the Rev. Gentlemen of St. Xavier's College; nor the foundation of St. John's College, Intally, for the education of youths for the sacred ministry, under the patronage of His Grace, the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal; nor the reconciliation of the splendid Church of the Sacred Heart at Durrumtollah, under circumstances so consoling; nor the enlargement of St. Thomas' Church, Chowringhee, and the arrival from Rome of a marble altar for its sanctuary; we believe, the first altar of the kind ever seen in India.

Really, when we enumerate the various literary, religious, and charitable Institutions which have been called into existence, in such rapid succession, under the auspices of our venerated Archbishop, and which continue to flourish in spite of every opposition; when we consider the actual success of the several missions of the Vicariate and their future prospects, and compare these happy results with the apparent inadequacy of the agent's powers; when we look back and reflect on the difficulties that have been surmounted, and on the shortness of the period in which the present state of things has been brought about, we are forced to say of the Archbishop of Edessa, what the scripture says of Josue—"He took and laid waste with one assault all the territory, from Gosen to Gabaon, and all the Kings and their Kingdoms, for the Lord God of Israel fought for him."

Like another David, he fights without sword, or spear, or shield; without gold or patronage to allure, or power to terrify, or the press to wound, or the arm of the state to shield him from attack, but still with confidence in the God of armies he advances fearlessly; and when we know that his antagonists have the stature, the strength and arms of Goliath, we should not hesitate to attribute the victory of defenceless weakness over armed strength, to the interposition of Him whose honor is concerned in the struggle, and whose name is invoked upon its issue.

OPENING OF NEW SCHOOL ROOMS AT ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.

On Tuesday last the Directors of St. Xavier's College entertained the subscribers to their new suite of school-rooms to a public breakfast. Cards of invitation had been issued for about 150 persons, but, from various unavoidable circumstances, the party assembled could scarcely have been the half of that number. Very shortly after 9 A. M. the company formed in groups, were engaged in inspecting the truly magnificent suite of apartments erected on the premises of the College, to the south of the main building. The new edifice was planned, we believe, by the late lamented Father Irvine, and reflects equal credit on his taste and judgment; that plan has been carried out by Messrs. Burn and Co. in their best style of workmanship. The rooms, seven in number, are all lofty, spacious and airy, and paved with Chunar stone throughout, having a beautiful colon-naded verandah running along their whole length on the north side. At half after ten the company sat to breakfast in the superb hall of the College, where a sumptuous dejeuné a la fourchette was spread out.

The REV. R. JOHNSON, Rector of the College, was at the head of the table, having Sir J. P. Grant on his right, and J. J. Mackenzie, Esq. on his left. After ample justice had been done to the viands and all the dainty delicacies and good things of the season provided by Messrs. Spence and Co., with their usual good taste and care, the Rev. Rector rose, and addressed the assembled company to the following purport:—

Our Schools being now completed, the Directors of the College have thought fit thus to assemble together the subscribers to our undertaking, in order to afford you an opportunity to see and judge for yourselves in what manner we have acted as to the trust reposed in us, and in what manner your donations have been invested. We, the Directors of this institution, having seen the noble edifices of the Society in Europe constituted for the purposes of education—the superb College of Rome, the beautiful building in Milan, the Public Schools in Fribourg, at Paris, and elsewhere, felt the disadvantages of the damp and unsuitable apartments used as School Rooms by us. The several institutions which I have just enumerated, as well as many others under the management of our Society, were erected either by the munificence of individuals, or by the contributions of the public. The great College in Rome was erected by Gregory the 13th, the College in Paris bearing the name of Louis the 14th, was built by that King, and Henry the 4th, King of France, not only constructed a College for the Society, but, in his zeal for education, and to testify his admiration and approval of the system of education adopted and followed out by the Colleges of the Society, directed that after his death his heart should be buried in the School founded by him, as we read in History. The Directors of this Institution, looking back upon those edifices, and considering the facilities therein afforded for education, felt an anxious desire to emulate their distant brethren, and a solicitude to extend to this country the blessings and advantages of the same education. For this purpose we appealed to the public, and nobly has the call been answered; on our part we venture to hope that we have satisfied the expectations of the subscribers, and that a suite of apartments has now been erected which will form part of a building that will bear comparison with the Colleges of the Society in Europe. One other point, I wish, on this occasion, to bring to your special notice. In the Colleges I have mentioned education is gratuitous, such is not the case in the English institutions, owing to the difference there in the system of education, which does not accord with our English feelings. Anxious, however, to see the benefits of a solid education widely extended in this country, it is the intention of the Directors of this institution to reduce the scale of pensions at as early a date as may be practicable, and we even venture to express a hope that the day is not very far distant when we shall be able to throw open a number of gratuitous Scholarships to merit and to necessity. In conclusion, in the name of the Directors, I thank you for your generosity, I thank you for the honor you have done us this day by your presence, and we feel grateful for the means you have given us, by your donations, of erecting the suitable range of apartments this day thrown open. I avail myself of the occasion to wish you all health, happiness, and prosperity during the ensuing year.

After the Rev. gentleman had sat down Sir J. P. GRANT rose, and spoke nearly to the following effect:—

I think I may be permitted, in the names of the subscribers, to express our entire satisfaction of the very suitable manner in which our humble donations for the advancement of education have been invested, by the erection of the beautiful building we have this day seen. In all matters and on almost all occasions where the interests of education are concerned, I have ever felt, and trust will always feel, the deepest interest. The charge, I may say the sacred charge, of imparting knowledge and of promoting education in this country cannot be intrusted to better hands than the learned and reverend gentleman who presides over this institution and its Directors. Why or how it is that the Society of which the Directors of this College are members is pre-eminently successful in advancing the interests of education and spreading the blessings of knowledge, it is not for me to discuss, but all who are conversant with History well know the fact; witness their efforts and successes in Europe, in America, in this Country, and, I believe I may add, in China. I will conclude, then, by wishing the learned and enterprising Directors of this institution the blessing and the comfort of good health to enable them to carry out their noble intentions, and by wishing them that which will be more prized, prosperity and success to their undertaking for the promotion of learning.

The Company broke up immediately afterwards in high satisfaction.

SELECTIONS.

HARLEM.—Mr. Bayley, formerly minister of the Episcopal church in Harlem, N. Y., has recently been to Oxford and Rome. The Evangelist says that he has been so smitten with the beauties of Romanism, that he will come back to this country a Popish priest; and that a certain Congregational minister has also gone to Oxford, and will probably follow Mr. Bayley's track clear round. The sooner the better.—Presbyterian.—Undoubtedly.—Catholic Herald of Philadelphia, August 10.

THE RIGHT REV. DR. OLIFFE.

BISHOP OF MILNE AND VICAR APOSTOLIC OF BENGAL.

MONDAY the Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe entertained a large and distinguished party at the Victoria Hotel, in commemoration of his consecration as Bishop of Milne in partibus and coadjutor Vicar Apostolic of Bengal. The tables were crowded with every delicacy of the season—served up in a style highly creditable to the establishment which was favored on this occasion with the patronage of his Lordship. Indeed we have never seen a dinner table so splendidly, even gorgeously laid out at this was by Mr. McCormack. Rare wines flowed in profusion; no expense, spared in providing a banquet which was independent of its tempting varieties of dishes &c., presented so many interesting features to the layman as well as to the ecclesiastic, and which was remarkable in a high degree for a delightful conviviality free from the irksome trammels of cold etiquette. At half past six o'clock the Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe took the chair. His Lordship was supported on his right by the Rt. Rev. Dr. Murphy, Bishop of Cork, the Rt. Rev. Dr. Crotty, Bishop of Cloyne, and Daniel Callaghan, Esq., M. P.—on his left by the Rt. Rev. Dr. Egan, Bishop of Kerry, Daniel Murphy, Esq., Belleville, and Nicholas Murphy, Esq., Clifton—The Rt. Rev. Dr. Haly, Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin, and the Rt. Rev. Dr. O'Connor, Bishop of Pittsburgh, the acting assisting Bishops at the consecration were seated at either end of the head table. The vice-Chair was occupied by Joseph Oliffe, Esq., M.D. Paris. Among the other guests invited were Dr. Porter, Very Rev. Mr. Cronin, O.S.A., Counsellors M'Carthy and Maguire, Rev. Messrs. Browne and Coffey, Messrs. James Sugrue, Carroll, (Carolina), Jervis Deane, Samuel M'Carthy, (Spring Mount),—Henry Barry, (Barry's Lodge), Captain Curtayne, E.I.C., Edward Collins, J. P., (Toureen Lodge), M. Lenihan, Rev. Messrs. Hay's, Michael O'Sullivan, England (Passage). Messrs. Henry Oliffe, Washington Oliffe, &c. Apologies were received from the Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman, the Right Rev. Dr. O'Connor, Bishop of Madras, the Very Rev. Theobald Mathew, and other eminent dignitaries, expressing unbounded affection and good will towards the newly consecrated Prelate, and their great concern that they were unavoidably unable to attend. The cloth having been removed and grace said;

The Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe rose and said that the first duty which devolved upon him, enrolled as he had been among the Hierarchy of the Catholic Church—was to propose the health of an illustrious Personage, who was himself the head of that church (hear). Fifteen years ago he had the high honour for the first time of becoming acquainted with his Holiness, the Pope, who was then Cardinal, and he had peculiar reasons for feeling towards His Holiness every grateful, every fond, every affectionate feeling, because he (Dr. Oliffe) had ever received kindness at his hands. (cheers). As a Pope there was no second opinion of His Holiness (cheers). The name which he bore—that of Gregory—showed what he was—he was a Gregory in reality (cheers)—for the last thirteen years he had watched with untiring zeal and ever wakeful watchfulness over the Catholic Church in every part of the world. In that course of time his Holiness appointed no less than thirteen new Bishops to sees which had not before existed, in addition to the very many Bishops whom he appointed to sees which had become vacant—he was a Gregory, he (Dr. Oliffe) repeated, in reality—and it was mentioned to him, on the very best authority, that he took the name from that Pope through whose instrumentality, and during whose life-time Austin preached the Christian faith to the people of England (hear, hear). Such was the Pope in his public capacity—the ardent friend of religion—the indefatigable champion of the church—the great benefactor of the faithful—the promoter of every good work connected with the advancement not only of religion, but of literature and the fine arts—such was the Pope in his public capacity. But he could speak of his Holiness also in his private capacity; as the courteous, the benevolent friend—as such he knew his Holiness both when Cardinal Capellari, and since he was raised to the exalted dignity which he enjoyed—and with these feelings he would give—

“His Holiness Pope Gregory XVI. the reigning Pontiff of the Catholic Church” (drunk with all the honors).

The Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe said that the next toast which devolved upon him to propose was the health of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen (cheers). He begged to propose that toast in his capacity of Bishop, and as a British subject. He could not say, as he had said respecting His Holiness the Pope, that he enjoyed the privilege of acquaintance with Her Majesty Queen Victoria; but he could, and he would say, that he was one of the most attached and devoted subjects of her Majesty—(loud cheers). He would, therefore, propose the Queen's health, as he had said, in his public as well as private capacity. He was sure that the feelings by which he was actuated towards the Queen were participated in by every one of the hierarchy, clergy, and laity present (cheers). He was sure that there was no second opinion with regard to Her Majesty—that she was what a Queen ought to be—impartial between all her subjects. He would therefore give the health of—

“The Queen” (drunk with all the honors).

The Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe said, that in consequence of the change which had taken place in his ecclesiastical position, it devolved upon him to propose a toast which he was confident would be responded to with warmth by all present. It was the health of Cardinal Franzoni, and the Sacred College of the Propaganda (cheers). This was a toast which he conceived it a duty to propose, because he not only received his episcopal appointment through them, but he had got his education through their assiduous and friendly care (hear, hear). Cardinal Franzoni was known to many then present, and to those he need not say what were the great attainments and the splendid virtues of his Eminence, who now filled the situation which his Holiness occupied before he was raised to the Papal throne. He need not tell what manner of man Cardinal Franzoni was, to those who knew him personally—but to those who did not know him, he (Dr. Oliffe) would say that he belonged to and was an ornament to that Sacred College, which numbered within its precincts some of the most brilliant lights of the present age—which embraced such men as the Columbo of literature, who discovered the work Cicero de Republica; as Mezzofanti, the great living Polyglot, who was fully acquainted with fifty languages—those were but two out of the Cardinals of the Sacred College, which was itself but part of the Sacred Congregation. He would therefore, without further preface give—“Cardinal Franzoni and the Sacred College” (cheers).

The Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe said that, after proposing the three foregoing toasts he now came nearer home (hear), he came to his native country—and to the city of his birth—(cheers). Absent as he had been, for the space of fifteen years from Ireland he returned to her shores with a heart unchanged in affection for the welfare and happiness of her people (loud cheers). But he was unable to speak, from personal knowledge, of the state of the Catholic religion in Ireland—he could, however, speak from what he had heard; and in proposing the health of the Venerated and highly-respected Diocesan of Cork and the Catholic Hierarchy of Ireland, he would observe that as they were so far better acquainted with the merits and virtues of the Right Rev. Prelate who presided over the diocese and the body to which he belonged than he (Dr. Oliffe) could possibly be, he did not consider it necessary for him to descant in that company on their merits (hear, hear.) With respect to the Catholic Church of Ireland generally, he could say that in Rome it was held in the highest possible estimation—that when any of the Bishops of Ireland visited the Eternal City they were received by the Pope with marked attention—that his Holiness ever exhibited a fund of pure affection for Ireland and the Irish, and that in his (Dr. Oliffe's) opinion he preferred them even to his countrymen the Italians (loud cheers). Such was the position in which the Irish Hierarchy stood with regard to the Holy See. It was one which should give pride to Ireland, but it was one he was sure, which the faithful perseverance of Ireland in religion pre-eminently merited [continued cheers]. As to the second order of Clergy in Ireland he would not speak of their merits in a meeting where they were so well understood and so highly appreciated as in the present. They all knew the zeal, the watchfulness, the learning and the piety of the Irish clergy (hear, and cheers). He would conclude therefore by proposing—

“The Right Rev. Dr. Murphy and the Catholic Hierarchy and Clergy of Ireland” (loud cheers).

The Right Rev. Dr. Murphy rose and said that, being the senior Prelate present, it devolved upon him to return his very cordial thanks for the kind manner in which they had received the toast which had been proposed by the Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe—the Hierarchy of Ireland. To descant on the merits of the Irish Hierarchy would not become him. They were aware of the claims which that venerable body had on the affections of the faithful. They were conscious that it was untiring in the exercise of that good which it was in its power to effect for the spiritual and temporal advantage of the flocks committed to its care (loud cheers). Thus much he would say of the members of the Irish Hierarchy whose healths had been drunk—but he would not speak of himself, or of any claims which the Right Rev. Prelate who filled the chair might suppose he possessed on their esteem and affections (loud cheers). But he would speak of a Prelate who, though a long while away, had the happiness of being born in Ireland—of being reared and educated in the City of Cork—(cheers)—of one who in Rome distinguished himself so highly as to obtain the full approbation of the masters under whom he studied—of the Sacred College in which he was located, and of His Holiness, the Pope himself (cheers). At a very early period of life the Prelate to whom he alluded was sent out to a far distant land—to an unwholesome climate—on a mission which was at the same time laborious and irksome (hear)—he resided at Bengal, of which he had been constituted Vicar-General—he was sent to Europe on important business connected with that Church, and the consequence was that he had been selected Coadjutor Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, with the right of succession, should he survive the present eminent Prelate of that See, as Archbishop of Edessa (loud cheers). He would only say, therefore, that to that Prelate, who presided over them this evening, he wished every grace and blessing, health, peace, abundant fruit in his arduous mission, and many, many years under the protecting wing of the Almighty in the bosom of his Church—doing good, abating evil, and opening for the Heathen and the sinner the way of life everlasting. He would give—

The Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe, in returning thanks for the warm and enthusiastic manner in which his health had been received, and for the great kindness bestowed upon him by the Right Rev. Dr. Murphy, said that since he was a boy in Cork he ever experienced the kind attentions of his Lordship, and that he ever appreciated his Lordship's singular goodness of disposition (loud cheers). At the period when he was departing for Rome, that Right Rev. Prelate gave him the most affectionate advice and parted with him as he would with one in whom he took a fraternal interest. He remained away for a period of sixteen years, and on his return, he found that the affection which he had formerly experienced from Dr. Murphy was increased (loud cheers). He begged then to thank his Lordship and the company for the honor that had been conferred. He would now proceed to another toast—it was one in some respect connected with politics—but he did not give it as a party or political toast in that mixed assembly (hear). It was a toast which related to popular representation, and as such he begged to propose the health of the hon. member for Cork City who was then present—Mr. Daniel Callaghan (hear)—his colleague Mr. Sergeant Murphy, and the members of the county (loud cheers). He proposed their healths because Parliamentary representation was absolutely necessary to express the wants and wishes of the people; and because he believed the honorable gentlemen to whom he alluded zealously worked in their respective avocations. Of the hon. member present he would not speak at any length. They all knew him far more intimately than he did—he would conclude by giving—“Daniel Callaghan, Esq., Mr. Sergeant Murphy, and the Parliamentary Representatives for the County” (loud cheers).

Mr. Callaghan said that a great honor had been done him and the other gentlemen included in the toast, which they had just received so warmly. With respect to what the Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe had told them that they were all better acquainted with his (Mr. Callaghan's) character than Doctor Oliffe was, it was a great reason why he should speak as little as possible with regard to himself—but this he would observe that however anxious he was to do good, he did not possess the abilities, the appliances, or the means of achieving the good which his Hon. Colleague and the members of the County were capable of performing. He was zealous, however, to promote the welfare of the people (cheers). He now begged leave to propose a toast. It was the health of the learned and respected gentleman who filled the Vice-Chair—Dr. Oliffe of Paris (loud cheers). A gentleman who in a foreign land had attained the highest distinction in the arduous profession to which he belonged, and one who was held in that strange country, in the highest respect and estimation, not only by the public but by his professional brethren (loud cheers). He would give—

“Dr. Oliffe, of Paris” (loud cheers).

Dr. Oliffe returned thanks in an impressive address. He expressed the gratitude he sincerely felt for the high compliment which had been paid him, coming as it did from the hands of the Hon. Member for Cork, and the Prelates and Clergyman, and Gentlemen whom he had the honor of seeing present upon that, to him,—a gratifying and a proud occasion (cheers) It was indeed a gratifying and a proud occasion to see himself in his native City, after a long absence, surrounded by so much of its eminence, and talent, and virtue, congregated around the table of a beloved and distinguished brother (loud cheers). He considered it a most happy circumstance that he came to Ireland at the same time that his brother came—and that he was a witness of that solemn and majestic ceremony which they looked upon yesterday—the more particularly as the Consecrating Bishop was the Bishop of Cork (loud cheers)—a Prelate who was one of the most warm-hearted friends he knew—who when going to Paris furnished him with letters of introduction to which he traced the success which had attended him in that capital (loud cheering). Having thus expressed his thanks for the high honor which had been done him he now begged to propose a toast, which he did with feelings of gratitude and affection and which he was certain would be responded to with warmth and enthusiasm by all present (hear). It was the health of two gentlemen, one of whom was prevented by indisposition, from attending—but the other, was present. Having passed the highest possible eulogium on the gentlemen in question—(Dr. Porter and Mr. Hamblin)—for the care which they bestowed upon the Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe, on him (Dr. Oliffe) and his brothers in their education—and for the kindness he had ever received at their hands and at the hands especially of his kinsman Dr. Porter. He concluded by proposing the healths of “Doctor Porter and Mr. Hamblin” (loud cheers).

Dr. Porter returned thanks in a very well received address and expressed the feelings by which he was always actuated towards the Right Rev. Prelate, whose mild and docile disposition, tractable manners, and brilliant talents facilitated any labour which he and his beloved brother-in-law Mr. Hamblin, might have had in giving him instruction. When he had heard of the kindness with which the Cardinals, Bishops and eminent men in Rome treated him (the Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe), he drank their healths—he felt obliged to them as if they had bestowed a personal compliment on himself—and he wished His Lordship every success in the arduous mission to which he was about devoting his years—the conversion of the Hindoo and the Mahomedan—and the spread of the light of Christianity on that darkened land.—(cheers).

The Vice President (Dr. Oliffe) begged permission to propose one or two toasts more (hear and laughter). The toast which he was then about to propose was one which he was sure they would cordially respond to. Even when unconnected with politics they must value the benefits of a free, a talented, and an independent press—they enjoyed such in this country in a far greater degree than in that in which he resided, where the sum of £4,000 was first paid into the treasury before a newspaper could be issued from the press, and where that sum was always liable to be curtailed by fines and damages. The advantage of a free press were manifold, where it respected the proprieties of private life, and advocated measures on public grounds, and with adherence to principle (hear, hear). When such a press was conducted by a young gentleman of energy and talent, it must command their highest respect (hear, hear). He felt pleasure and happiness in proposing the health of a young gentleman of energy and talent—of one who in his native City had raised himself to a high degree of eminence by his genius, and of one who occupied with credit to himself and advantage to the public, the station in which he was placed (cheers.) He would conclude by proposing—“Counsellor Maguire, and the Cork Examiner” (loud cheers).

Consellor Maguire, in returning thanks, said that he would not occupy the attention of the meeting one moment longer than while he expressed his gratitude and thanks for the compliment bestowed upon him in connection with the press. He would say, however, that in his life he never felt greater pleasure than in being the medium, through his friend and colleague, Mr. Lenihan, who was then present, of giving to the world the proceedings of the Consecration of the Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe, a Prelate who had shed lustre on the city of his birth (cheers). He thanked them sincerely for their kindness, and he begged to assure them that as long as he breathed he should ever continue a champion of the liberty of the Press (loud cheers).

The Vice-President begged to propose another toast—it related to a distinguished family of Cork, two of whose members were present on that occasion (hear, hear). "He had the honour of knowing them for a long period; but their worth and virtues and the good they had always done and were doing, made them as universally respected as they were universally known (hear and cheers). To dwell on the merits of that family he would not. Those merits spoke for themselves (hear and cheers). One of the members of the Murphy family was a highly distinguished member of Parliament, and was likely soon to fill a high judicial station on the English Bench—he had already gone as Judge of Assize in that country and had obtained the praise of all parties by the admirable manner in which he conducted himself in that elevated capacity (cheers). He would not dwell further on the toast than to propose the healths of—

"Daniel and Nicholas Murphy, Esqrs., and the members of the Murphy family" (loud cheers).

Mr. Dan. Murphy said that there were occasions when the tongue refused to give utterance to the feelings by which the heart was actuated, and that, he could assure their Lordships and the gentlemen present, was one of those occasions (hear, hear). For the compliment which had been paid the family to which he belonged he was sincerely thankful. If a sincere desire to ameliorate the condition of the people—to advance the prosperity of the country, and to promote peace and concord among all good men constituted a claim, he trusted that his family endeavoured to merit the esteem of their fellow-citizens by not neglecting the duties which devolved upon them in their private and public capacities (cheers). As to the member for Cork, he would permit that gentleman to speak for himself, as there could be no doubt but that he was well able to do so (hear, cheers, and laughter). All he would say of Mr. Sergeant Murphy was, that he was sincere—honest—determined—and faithful—and that with his constituents he desired on all occasions to have the most perfect identity of sentiment in their public relations (cheers). He again thanked them for the honour done—and begged in conclusion to drink all their healths (loud cheers).

The Vice-President said that there was another toast which he was most anxious to propose. He thought that there was something of neglect in not giving it before—but it arose from the circumstance he was sure that the health of the eminent Prelate had been included in that of the Hierarchy of Ireland, though he did not belong to that distinguished body, but was enrolled among the Hierarchy of the United States (hear, and cheers.) With respect to the merits and virtues of that learned and exalted Prelate he would not detain them. Those were well known by all who had the honour of acquaintance with the Right Rev. Dr. O'Connor (loud cheers). He would conclude then by proposing the health of that Right Rev. Prelate, and of wishing him all success in the mission to which he was about devoting himself (loud cheers). As further inducement to them, if such were wanted, he need not say that Dr. O'Connor was a native of their county, and one who had superior claims on the esteem and veneration of all his friends and admirers (loud cheers). He would give—

"The Right Rev. Dr. O'Connor, Bishop of Pittsburgh, and the Catholic Hierarchy of America" (loud and continued cheers).

The Right Rev. Dr. O'Connor said that for the honour conferred upon him, he was thankful. Coupled as his name was with the American Hierarchy it made the compliment doubly valuable. Young as that Hierarchy was, it had already attained a high elevation in the Church of God, and by its zeal, watchfulness and perseverance it was forwarding the glorious cause of peace and charity throughout the broad continent of the new world (cheers), founding religious houses, erecting churches, instructing the faithful, and bringing those who were in darkness to a knowledge of the blessings of the Lord (cheers).—He would not dwell upon the merits of the American Hierarchy. He knew that they appreciated the good which had been achieved by that venerable body, and he trusted that he would, with God's assistance, walk in the footsteps of those good Prelates who had preceded him in that mission and imitate the great virtues of the members of the American hierarchy now living (cheers). Leaving that subject, he could not refrain from expressing the satisfaction and delight he felt in being present on that occasion. It was a source of great joy and satisfaction to him to have an opportunity of assisting at the consecration of his friend and school-fellow—the companion of his early years, and the admiration of all who knew him—the Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe—(cheers). He had come a great distance to assist at that consecration—he intended to assist at it whenever it took place, and no matter the amount of inconvenience, he was prepared to undergo it for the proud satisfaction of witnessing the dignity of the episcopacy conferred on one who would ornament it by his humility, his virtue, his talents, his zeal and his charity (loud cheers). He would conclude by begging permission to propose a toast—it related to a lady, whose actions spoke so loudly in her favour as to require that he should say but little in her praise (hear.) At Rome it was remarked by many that the mother of Dr. Oliffe, the Prelate who presided over the festivities of that evening, must be a good woman indeed—and good there was no doubt she was in rearing and educating a family so respectable and so respected, and so distinguished by virtue and worth (cheers). Of Mrs. Oliffe, then, he would only repeat, that her virtues spoke for themselves, and he felt great pleasure therefore in proposing—

"The health of the pious, amiable, and excellent Mrs. Oliffe" (loud cheers).

Mr. Henry Oliffe returned thanks for the honor conferred upon his mother—an honor, he was sure, of which she would be justly proud (hear). The ceremony of the preceding day was well calculated to repay her for all the anxiety and toil she had undergone, to make her as it were young again, and to impart consolation and joy to her heart that she had witnessed the result of her cares in the honor conferred upon a son who had ever held the highest place in her affections (loud cheers).

The company separated at ten o'clock, highly gratified with the evening's entertainment.—Cork Examiner Oct. 11.

DISTINGUISHED IRISH ECCLESIASTICS ABROAD.

The most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop of Bengal, is an Irishman. The last missionaries who sailed per the Lady Flora from Gravesend, for Madras, were all Irish, as is the amiable and learned bishop himself, the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly; the Very Rev. Wm. Kennedy, his Lordship's Vicar-General, who is now at Visyagapatam, is a native of the country Wexford; the Rev. P. Gannon, stationed at Madras, is from the county Meath; Rev. Daniel Murphy, at Secunderabad, is from Cork; Rev. Cornelius Murphy, at St. Thomas's Mount, is from the same city; the Rev. Denis Egan, at Kamptee, from Killaloe diocese; Rev. P. Doyle, at Bellary, from the diocese of Ossory; Rev. Godfrey Mitchell, at Cuddalore, is from Galway; Rev. John Breen, now at Kamptee, is from the diocese of Killaloe; Rev. John Kenny, at St. George's Fort near Madras, is from the county Wexford; Rev. James Corry, now at St. Thomas's Mount, ditto, from Killaloe; Rev. Eugene Sheil, at Madras, is from Armagh; the Rev. S. Fennelly, brother of the bishop, and Rev. N. Walsh, now on their passage, are both from Ireland. The Rev. Mr. Wilson, lately ordained in Rome, and just arrived in Dublin, who is to accompany the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe to his important mission at Bengal, is also an Irishman. Of course, the remainder of the pious band of missionaries who have already volunteered to join this virtuous and talented bishop, are also Irishmen. The Right Rev. Dr. Barron, who is now just about to proceed on his most trying mission at Siberia, or Guinea, in Africa, is also an Irishman—from Waterford; and the Right Rev. Dr. Hynes, who is appointed by the Holy See Apostolical Administrator of the Vicariate of British Guinea, is from the south of Ireland. So far without proceeding, as yet, to the extensive and distant missions of Sydney, Australia, Van Dieman's Land, New Zealand, &c. Thus has God glorified himself and extended his church by the humble ministry of Irishmen.—Nation.

CONVERSION OF THE REV. MR. SEAGER.

A letter from Oxford, dated October the 20th, mentions that the Rev. Charles Seager, M. A., Worcester College, has joined the Church of Rome. A correspondent of an evening paper, in reference to this conversion to Popery, copies the following printed notice issued by Dr. Pusey at the beginning of last term:—"The Regius Professor of Hebrew will continue his lectures in the Prophet Isaiah during the present term on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays at nine o'clock. Any members of the University, who need private instruction, in addition to that given in the public classes, are recommended by the Regius Professor to apply to the Rev. J. B. Morris, M. A., Exeter College, or the Rev. C. Seager, M. A., Worcester College."

TENDENCIES TO ROMANISM.

The great difficulty (in a popular sense) with which those who uphold church principles have to contend, is their supposed tendency to popery. This difficulty, which existed in some degree from the commencement of the popular revival of church principles about ten years ago, has of late greatly increased, owing to the thing itself—i.e., the tendency to Romanism—having palpably exhibited itself in the earnest and vehement writings of a small number of men who belong to the Anglican Church, and who oppose themselves with peculiar ardour to the same errors and presumptions of ultra-Protestantism, from which the great body of the upholders of Church principles are anxious to escape. It seems urgently necessary, in consequence of the present state of things, that every reasonable effort should be made by sound churchmen to separate themselves, and to show their distinct separation from such as appear half willing, or more than half, to embrace the errors and conceits, and fond imaginings of Romanism. We know how unpleasant it is to suggest "separation," and how "uncatholic" it will seem to some, who have got a dream into their heads (at least we think it a dream) about the possibility of "harmonising and embracing" those things which, at first sight, we are disposed to deny and reject. But, however uncatholic it may appear to some, still we see no better way for honest mortal men to proceed, but to deny what they have good reason and high authority for believing to be wrong, and to cleave to that which, on the same reason and authority, they believe to be right. There is no doctrine which we more repudiate on account of its erroneousness, or dislike on account of its arrogance, than the doctrine of the right of private judgment in the external matters of religion; but in submitting ourselves to authority, let us consider what the authority is to which our respect and obedience is most reasonably due; and as we have been brought up in the Church of England, which claims to hold the primitive Christian doctrine and discipline as they were before the modern errors of Rome were introduced, let us adhere thereto, and resolutely and distinctly (though without bitterness or personal hatred) reject those errors of Rome, and avoid all tendency to relapse into them. This is not at all inconsistent with the adoption of whatever seems good, and pious, and considerate and kind, in the practice of Romanists. There is much of their practical piety which we ought never to have lost, and which we would do well to try to regain—their retirement from the world—their devoting of themselves to continual works of mercy, giving to God all the glory and the praise—their attention to outward things which do honour to God and to religion—their adoption of their sacred ministrations to the convenience and spiritual sustenance of the whole body of the people, without any practical recognition of the differences of rank or wealth; all these are excellent things which do not in any way clash with the Catholic verity as maintained in our Church, but are therewith strictly conformable, and they ought to be imitated by us. But while we adopt these Romanist practices because they are pious and Catholic, let us not embrace other wrong things, because they are Romanist practices. Let us remember that our duty is to revive the principles of the Church of England, not to go back into the errors of the Church of Rome.—Morning Post.

PROGRESS OF CATHOLICITY.

It has been our practice to notice in detail, and sometimes in a general way, the marvellous events that, with a rapidity scarcely to be kept pace with by a weekly journal, are ushering Catholicity into every hamlet—nay, almost into every family circle. Since the 18th of May when our first number was issued—that being the day of the disruption of the Church of Scotland, events of no common character have occurred in the religious world. Not only has the Church of Scotland been rent in twain, but in fact she has gone out of herself, and that which is left is the Residuary, as it is termed, though containing many estimable individuals, as spiritual guides, has neither the confidence of the people, nor the talent to acquire that confidence. Meanwhile, the New Secession, or Free Church, has fraternised with the Dissenters, and both are making common cause against the Establishment. We have borrowed from a contemporary some observations on the condition of the Free Church, partly true and partly overcharged. A more agitating and revolutionary body, and more dangerous to civil and religious liberty has not appeared since 1640—they being ready to join with every party—except Catholics, against the Established Churches, and every institution from the Throne downwards, that is likely to resist unbridled Calvinism. And this is not confined to Scotland alone. Throughout the great towns of England the Scotch churches are being filled with Free Churchmen; and in the Rodney Street, Liverpool, Presbyterian Church, the parties have already been landed in the Court of Chancery on the respective rights belonging to the Established, or Disestablished, Church of Scotland. In the colonies the same thing is going on, and the Presbyterianism that, in India, was more cherished by the Government than the Catholic Church was, has deserted its connection with the State, and the Calvinist ministers sent to India by the General Assembly of the Established Church have withdrawn from the Establishment, and given in their adherence to the Free or Revolution Church—so that by and by Dissent in India will, as it was in the West Indies, be found a troublesome, dangerous, and revolutionary corps, more hazardous to our Indian empire than external enemies.

The Anglican Establishment has been quickened into Catholicity; and while many of the best and most learned members of that Establishment have actually joined the Catholic Church, and many others are preparing to follow their example, these that remain without thinking of a change, are setting their house in order, and, as inculcated in an article, part of which we borrow from the Morning Post, are adopting a portion of Catholic piety from Rome, without (vain thought!) going all the lengths that Roman Catholics go. Members of the Cabinet and of the Legislature, grave Doctors in Divinity, and the learning and morality of the various classes of Anglican society have undergone a most wonderful change. Formerly those who did consult the standards of the Catholic Church were intent only on finding materials to be, or to write anti-Catholic; but now the well-spring of life is being frequented by those parties, not to disturb, but to imbibe, and the consequence is, that each revolving week brings the grateful intelligence of farther accessions to the fold of Peter. But, while we gladly turn to this cheering picture, it is impossible to shut our eyes to the disheartening fact that secular politics have tainted a portion of the Catholic body now reeling, as it were, under that debasing influence. Every thing that has been lost by Catholicity, has been lost by convulsions and by the dislocation of society; and any one, who looks at all beneath the surface of society, and observes the principles and the influences that are at work, must see that Chartism anti-Corn Law Leaguism, and Radicalism, are tending towards the up-rooting of the existing orders in this country; and that while parties composing these different sections of revolutionists, are all bitter haters of Catholicity, and anxious for its repression, it is matter of the deepest sorrow that a great portion of the Catholic body is found banded with this revolutionary force. We desire anxiously to draw the attention of our venerable clerical guides, as well as that of the moderate and intelligent lay Catholics, to this state of matters. It is very true that the great accessions of late to the Church, make this not so palpable as it otherwise would be: but it is, nevertheless, true and must be remedied. And we humbly submit that, if the example were generally followed of withdrawing the influence of clerical aid in political questions, and of imitating that portion of the clergy where conversion is most apparent, a more healthy tone would be given to Catholicity, and truth, virtue, and piety would not only keep right the Catholics that we have, but be certain of attracting multitudes to the same pure source.—Edinburgh Courier, Oct.—

MISCELLANEA.

COMMITTAL OF A DISSENTING MINISTER AND HIS SON, FOR BODY STEALING.—On Thursday last the Rev. Isaac Bridgeman, the Minister of a Dissenting Chapel at Walworth, whose case has been several times before the Court, was finally examined, with his son, a medical pupil, before Mr. Cottingham, at the Union Hall Police Office, on a charge of having removed the coffin and dead body of the late Mr. Tawney from the burial-ground of Mr. Bridgeman's chapel. Both the defendants were held to bail for their appearance to take their trials at the next Old Bailey Sessions for the misdemeanour.—Leeds Paper.

THE SNOBING BISHOP.—The Western Times tells an anecdote of Bishop Philpotts, in Exeter almost "too good to be true." We give it, however, with some curtailment.—On Sunday afternoon last, Bishop Philpotts took his seat on the Episcopal throne, drew the curtains around him, and made all snug for meditation. Dr. Coleridge, of Thorverton, was the divine appointed to preach, and his sermon was marked with that vigour of thought and terseness of expression for which the reverend doctor is somewhat celebrated. He denounced triflers, and most especially those who, having used the six days for the pursuits of this world, went, and slept away the seventh at church. The sermon concluded, as all good things will do. The reverend doctor looked over towards the bishop's throne, expecting to see our right reverend and drowsy diocesan slowly rise and dismiss the flock with a pious benediction. The doctor looked in vain; but as he directed, a stern and astonished gaze right into the bishop's snuggery, people could not really tell what to make of it: every face was turned with indescribable anxiety towards the throne. The vergers rushed over with his mace and knocked decidedly; then louder and more decidedly; but, alas! there was no response, save, in the stillness between the knocks, the response of an audible but most comfortable snore. The third rap of the mace waked the bishop, who, shaking himself, like one suddenly started from a pleasant dream into a dull reality, proceeded forthwith to deliver his professional benediction, as "wide awake as ever."

A REMARKABLE FACT.—A Baptist clergyman and his wife, who reside in the vicinity of Boston, U. S., have the pleasure of daily gathering around their fireside four daughters, who were born in four different quarters of the globe, viz., one in Europe, one in Asia, one in Africa, and one in America!

NEW ZEALAND.—A letter from the Rev. J. P. O'Reilly, of Wallington, in port Nicholson, dated 2d April, 1843, and addressed to the editor of the Australasian Chronicle, gives the following account of the state of the Church in New Zealand:—"I came here in the ship with M. Petre, on the application, of the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, to take charge of what Catholics might be here. I was delighted to find some of my poor countrymen here, from Erin's most distant shores, and it cheered me to let them see (if I could do nothing else) the solicitude of the Church in their regard. They are in truth like the Jews, scattered everywhere: but not like that historic nation, to parcel out, in fragments, broken and disconnected, the gem of truth, but to offer it whole, and without flaw, in the vast bosom of the Catholic Church. The poor people have no chapel here as yet, nor have they means of providing one. Up to the present we have been saying mass in a room adjoining a public-house; we are lately removed to an old store, on the beach. Might I ask it as favour of you to announce your willingness to receive the subscriptions of any of our good neighbours of Sydney, who might, without injury to their local charities, confer a mite on us?" The editor of the Australasian observes:—"The writer belongs to the same religious orders with the good and great Father Mathew, and was one of his first and most active fellow labourers in the cause of Temperance, in Kilkenny, Dublin, &c. He left a most comfortable mission in Ireland, to come and break the bread of life to his fellow Catholics, who were entirely destitute of that blessing till his arrival at Port Nicholson." He then offers to receive subscriptions, and warmly urges on the Australians the duty of assisting the New Zealand mission.

THE NEW PEEL OF JOY BELLS FOR THE CHURCH OF ST. PAUL'S.—A splendid peel of joy bells, the first complete set that has been cast in Ireland since the time of the Reformation, has just been manufactured in Mr. Sheridan's Engine Foundry, Church-street, for the use of the new Catholic Church of St. Paul, on Arran quay. Five of the bells were manufactured in the course of the last fortnight, and the sixth, which completes that set, was cast at eight o'clock on Saturday evening last. The vicar-general of the diocese, with several other clergymen, and many of the resident Catholic gentry of the parish were present to witness the process of manufacture, and appeared to derive much gratification from the sight. The following words will be inscribed upon the globe of the bell:—"This Bell was presented by the Ladies to the Church of St. Paul, Arran-quay, Dublin. The Very Rev. Dr. Yore, V. G. P. P. James Sheridan, maker, 1843." The process of manufacture being concluded, the five Bells which are already completed, chimed a merry peal to the iron mallets of the smiths, and the company of visitors retired evidently highly gratified.—Freeman.

The Superioress of the House of Mercy in Baggot-street, Dublin, with seven other religious ladies of that convent, sailed from Kingstown, on Monday evening last, in order to take possession of the new establishment in Liverpool. The Superioress, it is expected, will return to the parent house after having laid the foundation of all things connected with the new and interesting branch, which it is expected will be fruitful of lasting benefits to religion and charity.—Correspondent.

Died, on the 26th instant, in 54th year of his age, the Rev. John Carter, who for upwards of eighteen years, was parish priest of Donoughmore near this town. The chapel of Bar was built through his exertions, and in that churchyard he was buried on Monday last. Requiescat in Pace—Ibid.

It is proposed to raise a monument in Cork, his native city, to the memory of the illustrious John England, the late beloved Bishop of Charleston.

MISSION TO THE INDIANS.—The Rev. Messrs. Olscamp and Payment have returned from their mission to the Indians of St. Maurice, having baptized twenty adults and six infants, admitted twenty-six adults to their first communion and celebrated three marriages. They advanced to Kekenduche of the Bullet-headed Indians, all the natives were delighted with the advent of their apostles, and grieved at their departure; the missionaries were gratified with the progress in religion of their aboriginal eleves.

TORONTO.—Some Jesuits had arrived in New York to establish themselves at Sandwich, in this diocese. The Brothers of the Christian Doctrine who accompanied them are still at Montreal.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THE OCTAVE OF THE EPIPHANY.

"And he shall rule from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. Before him the Ethiopians shall fall down; and his enemies shall lick the ground. The Kings of Tharsis and the Islands shall offer presents, the Kings of the Arabians and of Saba shall bring gifts. And all Kings of the earth shall adore him; all nations shall serve him."

Thus prophesied the Psalmist of the coming of Christ and of his Kingdom; and, in order to commemorate with becoming gratitude the glorious fulfilment of this prophecy, the Church has instituted the Festival of the Epiphany, whose octave terminates to-day.

This festival is called the Epiphany or the Manifestation, because it is the anniversary of the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles by a luminous star which indicated his birth, and conducted the wise men of the East to the humble dwelling of their infant Saviour.

"Who, having heard the King, went their way, and behold the star which they had seen in the East went before them, until it came and stood over where the child was. And, seeing the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. And entering into the house they found the child with Mary his mother, and falling down they adored him, and opening their treasures they offered him gifts, gold, frankincense and myrrh." (Mathew, c. 2.)

The prophecy, therefore, began to be fulfilled at the birth of Christ; it had a fuller accomplishment in the conversions effected by the preaching of the apostles and their successors, and it will have a still more extensive fulfilment, before the consummation of the world.

"But you shall receive," said Christ to his apostles, "the power of the Holy Ghost coming upon you, and you shall be witnesses unto me in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and Samaria, and even to the uttermost part of the earth."—(Acts, I. 8.)

"Going, therefore, teach ye all nations: baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world."—(Matthew, 28. c.)

"And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in the whole world, for a testimony to all nations; and then shall the consummation come."—(Matthew, 24. c.)

It is true that in the days of the Apostles the sound of their preaching went forth to the ends of the earth, and that from that period to the present, God has not failed to raise up to himself, from time to time, witnesses of an extraordinary character, whose preaching, like that of St. Paul, was not merely in words but in power and the operation of the Holy Ghost; and yet, after the lapse of so many ages, how many nations are still in the darkness of idolatry, and how many others have apostatized from the faith once delivered to them by the Saints? How many individuals and nations have neglected the admonition of the angel to shun Herod, and return home by another road, after they had found the residence of their Saviour and adored him? Is it not true, that, although many have been called, few have been chosen; and that of those who appeared to have been chosen, many have not walked worthy of their vocation; making profession indeed to know God, but in their acts denying him?

We, therefore, who have been not only called to the true Faith, but preserved from the dangers to which Faith is exposed, can never return sufficient thanks to our good God for the special graces with which he has been pleased to favour us; and knowing the almost innumerable difficulties that prevent the conversion of many sincere inquirers after truth, we should never cease to supplicate the abundant mercies of our common Saviour, that he would vouchsafe to liberate them from the pit-falls of error. He that believeth not, says St. Mark, shall be condemned; and St. Paul assures us that the just man lives by faith, that without faith it is impossible to please God, and that as there is but one God and one baptism, so there is but one faith. We who have the happiness to profess this faith in its integrity, as it was once delivered to the Saints, are often surprised that all men are not attracted by the brightness of the evidence which indicates its residence on earth, but still more at the hostility of some few, who, like Herod, are diligent inquirers about it for the purpose of eradicating it, if possible, from amongst the sons of men. But, as it was in the beginning, so is it now, and will be for ever.—“Come and see the works of God terrible in his councils over the sons of men.” The Jews could tell where the Saviour was to be born, and yet could not find him, the wise men of the East sought him where the Jews declared he was to be born and found him. He was born among the Jews, and they sought his destruction, and at last crucified him, the wise men came a great distance to see him, and finding him they adored him, and offered him precious gifts. “What else,” says St. Augustine, “does this providence of God signify unless that the letter alone of scripture was to remain with the Jews by which they were to be blinded; while the nations were to be instructed in its meaning.”

Thus do Protestants read the letter of scripture without learning its meaning; and if they are asked, where the true faith is to be found, they will answer, according to the words of the Apostles’ creed—“in the holy Catholic Church,”—and yet they not only refuse to profess the faith which the Catholic Church teaches, but protest against it. But the sincere and humble inquirer after truth, who, like the wise men of the East, is prepared to honor it, when he finds it, by sacrifice and gifts, is sure to succeed by the guidance of a star from heaven, though he may not possess the fruitless knowledge of the Jews. In what Church did the Saints of all ages live, those holy men who instructed many unto justice, and who are now shining like stars in heaven? What Faith did they profess?—what authority did they acknowledge and obey?—what laws and discipline did they enforce?—and what errors did they condemn? The writings of the sacred penmen, as interpreted in the writings of their disciples and successors, the Holy Fathers of the Church, are the bright beams of this glorious and heavenly star which shines from the West even unto the East, and conducts those who are wise, to the one fold of the one Shepherd, to the Church, which, from the time of the apostles, has been governed by the successors of St. Peter; to the Church founded by Christ on Peter, as upon a rock; to the Church which converted all the nations of the earth to the belief of Christianity; to the Church of all ages and nations which has withstood the shocks of persecution and heresy; to the pillar and ground of truth, which has condemned every heresy and schism that ever troubled the peace of Christians and rent the seamless garment of Christ; to the house of the living God, where all the saints, the martyrs, confessors, and holy virgins who glorified God in their lives, and edified us by their example, lived and died.

CONVERSION FROM ANA-BAPTISM.

An English Gentleman, residing in the Madras Presidency, lately converted from Anabaptism to the Catholic Church, has written the following letter to the Rev. N. Missionary Apostolic:—

October 5th, 1843.

REV. AND DEAR SIR,—It affords me much pleasure to sit down and write you a few lines, as well as to give a short account of myself when I conceive, ere this, you have been anxious to learn about me. I purposed writing to you a little more than a month ago, and put it off to the present on account of a journey which I made to in company with the Rev. N. We remained under the roof of Mr. who, of course, is a Catholic, where we passed a very pleasant time. He has built a very nice little Gothic Church at his own expense, and is a most zealous and devoted Christian. I have not seen a Protestant pass more time in prayer and meditation than both of them....

I read a public profession of the Catholic Faith in St. Mary’s Church; and, after the ceremony, was received into the Church by the Rev. I must say I felt it a great ordeal, and felt much afraid of myself at the time; all eyes were fixed upon me.....

I have not once regretted having taken the step in joining the Holy Catholic Church; nay, much the reverse: I rejoice in my privilege daily more and more, and thank Almighty God that he has so mercifully preserved me, and shown me the true Church of Christ. I now turn a deaf ear to all that ignorant Protestants say against our most Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church. All we can do is to pity and pray for our separated brethren. I rejoice in the state of the times at home, believing as I do, not very long it may be and we shall see Mass celebrated in Westminster Abbey, as in days gone by. When at N—— we read Dodd's Church History of England by Tierney, the life of dear Sir Thomas Moore, and some parts of Lingard's History of England. This alone is enough to make any Christian fall on his knees and thank God that he has so mercifully preserved his Church in the midst of wolves, murderers, and political intriguers. Dear Catholics, how they were cut and sawn assunder, hung and drawn at Tyburn. But enough for the present, this subject is heart-stirring.

If you should meet any of the Baptist Missionaries, please to say all that is kind to them, and say that I do not forget them in my prayers. Of course we are now separated, and they must feel rather cool towards me, which is not to be wondered at, seeing how wide is the difference.

Of all Protestant Missionaries those in N—— are, I think, the most laborious and self-denying, but the Missionaries on this side are literally nothing more or less than trading Missionaries, and this I am not afraid of saying. They have good houses provided for them, with handsome salaries, circulate Bibles by wholesale, and then write letters home to send out more Missionaries. Then these Missionaries make places for printers, &c. &c. &c. It is a regular jobbing. Ask them to shew you their Church after labouring for 10 or 15 years or so, 80 or 100; whereas Catholics swarm, with nothing like the means, and no temporal inducements held out. On this I could say much, but enough. How very much I should like to see you once more. Little did I believe your prophetic words would come true, "that some day I should become a Catholic." My dear mother says that in Scotland they are turning Catholics by hundreds, so in England and Wales. What would you say to England becoming Catholic once again, during the Pontificate of His Holiness Gregory XVI? I suppose you use a Litany or some Prayer with that intention daily at your Church. We shall all be delighted to hear about you. Write a long letter. I am not aware of having more for the present to say. N. N., and some others, desire to be very affectionately remembered to you, my dear father, as also myself. Remember me in your prayers.

Yours very sincerely and obediently,
N. N.

GWALIOR.

We have much pleasure in publishing the following extracts from a letter written by an Officer in the East India Company's service, a recent Convert to Catholicity, to a Lady at this Presidency, also a convert:

Camp, Dec. 31, 1843.

I have just received your delightful letter of the 21st ultimo: many many thanks for it, and for his Grace's introductory letter to Major —. I anticipate much pleasure and edification in becoming acquainted with him. The first Sunday I was at Agra I saw him and his lady in the Catholic Chapel * * * * I must now tell you what has occurred since I last wrote, on the 28th December. We received our orders to march the following morning at day-break, as the Gwaliorites had assembled in force a few miles ahead. I happened to command the outlying picket of my regiment, and, consequently, got but a few minutes sleep that night. Well, we marched at half past 4 o'clock H. M. 39th; H. E. I. C. 56th and some Horse Artillery; about eight we came within large shot range of the enemy. The first round shot that I could see knocked over a poor ammunition camel; next came a shell which killed 3 Sepoys of the 56th a very few yards behind me; we then had the order to charge a village at least 1,200 yards in our front, and strongly defended by, I think, 12 pieces of cannon; the 39th went straight at it, and behaved most admirably; we had to make a slight detour to the right to capture 6 guns that were doing great mischief, and then we came upon the rear of the village. The slaughter amongst the refugees must have been terrific, our regiments kept up an incessant fire for a quarter of an hour at least, until the houses had thoroughly caught fire, we then moved on in one continual charge, and ended the fight at about half past 2, by totally routing the enemy. I had the good fortune to distinguish myself by, capturing a large brass gun that was galling our right flank with a continual fire of grape shot; after the engagement my commanding officer publicly thanked me for the zeal, &c. &c. &c. that I displayed throughout the day. Pray don't think that I am becoming vain; I know well that I cannot too much, or even nearly enough, feel thankful to that merciful Providence for sparing my life and those of our officers, however you will see a much better description of the whole affair in the newspapers, so I will finish the subject for the present; I shall write again very soon, if my life be spared. I don't know whether we shall have to fight our way into Gwalior city or not. Pray thank His Grace for all his kindness to me, you will do it so much better than I can at present, so pray do it; don't let me be forgotten by my friends in Calcutta, both in and out of the College. I have not had much time lately for kneeling in prayer, but whilst I am marching, and whereon I am ever, I continually pray, and repeat some beautiful prayers I have by heart. * *

I believe upwards of 40 guns were captured on the 29th * * * * * We are about four or five Coss from the City of Gwalior, our faces are so scorched by the sun that we look such funny objects!!!

PROGRESS OF TEETOTALISM IN BENGAL.

During the past week a Catholic Gentleman, well known in this city, in company with his wife*, and eldest son, a lad of about eighteen, and another young gentleman, took the pledge of total abstinence at the hands of the Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy, the Principal of St. John's College, in Intally. These parties had been remarkable for their abstemiousness in regard to all wines and liquors; the motive with them for taking the pledge could not, therefore, be to get rid of a bad habit which they never had. Their views were of a more extensive character; they can now serve the cause of temperance by example no less than by words; and may, by inducing others to follow them, be the means of saving many a one from temporal as well as eternal misery; for the pledge is not simply a promise to abstain from all intoxicating drinks, but also to endeavour, to the best of one's power to discourage drunkenness. The existence of a society formed upon such principles cannot but be a great blessing to the world. Father Mathew, the great Apostle of Temperance, was but a single individual when he entered on his arduous mission, and his disciples are already spreading even in this far distant land. Through the agency of that great and good man how many families have been saved from misery, how many have been secured from an untimely grave, how many snatched away from the brink of eternal ruin! It is thus that God blesses and prospers every undertaking which tends to the sanctification of his creatures, and the advancement of his glory.

We understand that there are several others here who intend to join Father Mathew's Society, and may soon follow the example which has been already set.

CONVERSIONS.

During the last week a Native youth, and a Soldier of the Presbyterian persuasion were received into the Catholic Church in the Bengal Vicariate.

In the same Vicariate two young men, natives of Ireland, who during their boyhood had been compelled to attend Protestant worship, were reconciled to the Church and restored to her communion.

CHINSURAH.

We insert, with pleasure, the following letter, and we trust that the perusal of it will prove useful to Religion, not only in Chinsurah, where Mr. Barber resides, but also throughout Bengal.

TO THE ARCHBISHOP, VICAR APOSTOLIC, OF BENGAL.

MY LORD ARCHBISHOP,—I have the honor to address your Grace, in order to inform you that hitherto, through ignorance or neglect on my part, I unfortunately adhered to those Clergymen who refuse to obey the Holy See and acknowledge you as their lawful superior; I now sincerely lament my conduct, and beg your Lordship to receive me again into the communion of the Catholic Church. It shall be my study henceforward to repair the dis-edification I may have caused the Faithful by my strict attention to the duties of Religion, and the precepts of the Catholic Church.

I remain,
My Lord Archbishop,
Your humble and Penitent Child in Christ,
P. BARBER.

Chinsurah, January, 7th, 1844.

CONFIRMATION AT CHINSURAH.

On Tuesday the 9th instant the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic administered the Holy sacrament of confirmation to thirty-two persons at Chinsurah, principally Soldiers of the depôt of H. M. Regt. which is established there. On the same occasion about forty persons approached in a very edifying manner the Holy Communion.

These blessed fruits are the happy result of the unremitting zeal of the Rev. F. Boulogne.

HONG-KONG MISSION.

The following letter, just received from the Very Rev. the Prefect of Hong-Kong Victoria, dated 25th August last, to the address of His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop of Edessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, will be perused with interest.

MY LORD,

We received the 12th number of the Catholic Herald some weeks since in answer to our letter of December directed to your Grace, in which we humbly and earnestly solicited your approbation to raise funds in aid of our mission. We are at a loss how to express our esteem and admiration of your Grace, not only for your approbation, but also for your generous co-operation, together with the many other favours conferred on us by your Grace. That we may not be wanting in gratitude, we beg leave to offer our humble but fervent prayers to God for your welfare, and the other Benefactors, both Clergy and Laity, who so kindly co-operated with you and are entrusted to your paternal solicitude, that he may pour down his choicest blessings on them; and, amongst other things, we shall recommend your Orphanage to our Catholic soldiers, if it may so please your Grace. We shall take it as a favour if your Grace would notice, in the Bengal Catholic Herald, any intelligence we may be able to communicate to you regarding our mission. At present we are only able to give a short outline of its progress since it was first established. In 1840, the Rev. Theodoret Jozet, being informed that there were many English Catholics here destitute of all spiritual aid, and seeing that such could not be remedied by the Ordinary of Macao, in consequence of the scarcity of priests, despatched letters to the Secretary De Propaganda Fidé, representing the state of things there; they answered him by appointing him Prefect Apostolic of Hong Kong and the adjacent country. In March, all the members of the Mission were transferred here, for reasons which it is unnecessary to mention: it is incredible the toil and labour which the Prefect Apostolic underwent in establishing this Mission, not to say any thing of the many difficulties he met with, nor of the miseries the whole of the members underwent in houses made of reeds and straw—he nearly completed a small house, laid the foundation of a Church, made preparations to establish schools, for which he every where sought and obtained assistance, until at length, worn out with labour and fatigue, he departed this life, universally lamented, at a time when the other members suffered much from sickness.

His remains were deposited in the Catholic Cemetery, but on the 10th of May were secretly removed to the Presbytery and placed beneath a monument bearing his inscription. On his demise, Father Michael Navarro took the pastoral charge until March, when he received letters from the Secretary De Propaganda Fidé confirming him in the appointment, and investing him with all the authority of his predecessor, in addition to some other privileges conferred on him by His Holiness. Amongst other things in contemplation or commenced by the praise worthy Jozet, and which were most dear to us, we wished for nothing more than to finish the Church and establish schools, all of which in a short time were done, notwithstanding almost innumerable difficulties, and the low state of the funds. We dedicated the Church to the B. V. Mary of Immaculate Conception on the 11th of June; the ceremony was grand and imposing, we began the solemn Benediction at 9 o'clock, assisted by Rev. Michael Navarro and Rev. Francis Buffa, followed by a solemn High Mass. The number of Clergy in attendance were eight, two of whom on that morning arrived from Europe, and some of the others came from Macao to be present on the occasion; the morning ceremonies concluded by the baptism of an adult from Madras, the evening with a solemn benediction of the Blessed Sacrament.

"The whole scene," says the Hong Kong Gazette, "was one of the most interesting we have seen for a long time, and as the mind wandered back to the days of Sts. Francis Xavier and Loyola it was with feelings of no ordinary kind that the hardships of these extraordinary men passed in review before us. No organ, but a good band of musical instruments joined in the chaunting, whilst the devotional propriety of the worshippers was as great as any one ever saw in any Cathedral or Chapel in Europe, it was the same Church, the same music, the same symbols as we have seen in England, in Italy, and Malta."

The Church is pleasantly situated on the declivity of a hill; the front, which looks to the East, is supported by twenty pillars with their pedestals and capitals; above the large window which illumines the orchestra is a monogram of the Blessed Virgin, the steeple supports three crosses, one of which is of exquisite workmanship. We are sorry that it is not in our power to give an accurate description of the edifice, but it is sufficient to say that, when completed, it will confer a great honor on religion, more particularly here, where the Gospel has so lately found its way. It is very spacious, capable of containing a thousand persons. The amount of expenses already incurred is about nine thousand dollars—some are of opinion that for its completion twelve more would be required. The sums raised by contributions amount to about six thousand dollars, so that leaves us very much involved, besides we require a Bell, Organ, Candlesticks, Vestments and many other things which are necessary for the completion of a new Church. Though perhaps inconvenient to embark in such an undertaking, now that it is once begun it would be unworthy of us to suffer it to remain unfinished. I would be anxious, but at present I cannot describe to your Grace, the state of our Mission; the conversion of Protestants, five of whom were seriously ill, the restoration of Apostates, to the peace of the Church, the formal abjuration of schism by a youth from Calcutta, the baptism of Infants of Protestant parents, the well-founded hope of additional converts, and the many other things which conduce to Christian edification, all of which, if it be necessary, we will give authentic testimony of. For brevity sake we must be silent about the efforts of Protestants to seduce female orphans and poor Catholics to their conventicles; to oppose us they have written in the Hong Kong Journals, of things which have been done in America and England by Missionaries, things which we have known to be done here by Protestant Missionaries, and which, we trust, cannot be applied to Catholic Missionaries anywhere. In like manner I am unable to enumerate the obstacles which are thrown out to prevent Catholic Soldiers not only from entering their Churches but also from hearing Mass on Sundays and holidays. Notwithstanding our humble entreaties to the authorities placed over them we were uncourteously denied by some, the privilege of visiting the sick on board of vessels, and granted by others with severe restrictions. Amongst so many causes of grief, we are much consoled to hear, through the Catholic Herald, of so many conversions, particularly those which have taken place in your Grace's Vicariate. We pray that God may assist and strengthen you in your Apostolic labours who so generously and liberally have contributed to support other missions. Though more prolix than I intended, and was convenient, I now conclude by renewing our most sincere feelings of gratitude and desire of heavenly benediction, on your Grace.

Your Grace's Most Humble & Obedt. Servt.

Procurator Sac. Congreg.,

CHANDERNAGORE.

On Tuesday, the 9th instant, the Archbishop, accompanied by Mr. D. John, visited both the Orphanages at Chandernagore, and was, we learn, much pleased with the happy and healthful appearance of the Children. Of the entire number (about 110) only one child was confined by sickness, and of the remaining part there were only two or three who seemed to be in a delicate state of health.

THREE GLORIOUS MONTHS IN MOULMEIN.

During the last September, October and November, twenty-one converts have been received into the Catholic Church, of which number there are seven of H. M. 84th Regt., two of the Artillery, three of the 17th Native Regt. the rest Malabar heathens. Is this the effect of the late persecution, in which the Rev. Mr. Stork and, of course, his successor, the Rev. Dr. Delprino, have been interdicted all admittance to the barracks, congee house, guard house, or huts of married soldiers?

We understand that several Protestants of the Established Church had joined the Baptists and received baptism by immersion.

VESTRY AFFAIRS.—On Monday next, the 15th instant, at 8 o'clock A. M., a meeting of Catholics will be held at the Cathedral House, to elect two Wardens, in the room of Count John Lackersteen and Mr. David John, who go out of the board of Wardens by rotation.

MADRAS.

A Case for the consideration of the Most Noble the Governor and Commander-in-Chief—We avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity of giving publicity to the communication of "A Catholic," and of soliciting the attention of the Most Noble the Marquis at the head of the Government, and who has the character of being the soldier's friend, to the case of oppression and injustice it unfolds; and we do so under a conviction that his Lordship will interpose his authority between that self-constituted power and the claims of a deceased soldier's orphan child, which are but too apparent in this instance, and make such an order on the subject as shall secure respect in future being paid to the dying request and injunction of a child's parent, and give those invested with a little brief authority to understand, that such interference with the dying request of a soldier respecting his child as the communication under notice makes known, is an exercise of power which nothing can justify or palliate, and which calls for the severest reprehension.—Examiner, December 28.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—I will feel obliged to you to insert in your independent Journal the following extract from the Tablet, dated 7th October, 1843.

"LONDON.

"Catholic Institute—The Committee held their meeting for October on Wednesday last. Mr. Faielli in the Chair, —The Secretary stated that he had lately had an interview, at the Horse Guards, with Lord Fitzroy Somerset, Military Secretary, on the subject of the detention of the Catholic Orphan McCann, in the Protestant Asylum at Madras, by the Military authorities, and that he was referred by his Lordship to the Military department of the East India House—that he had accordingly visited that department, and, by advice of an official Gentleman, had drawn up and transmitted a statement of the case, accompanied by certain documents received from India, to be laid before the Honourable the Court of Directors."

The child McCANN is the daughter of a Gunner who died at St. Thomas' Mount in 1838. He was a Catholic, and on his death bed left his child in the care of Gunner Robert KENNEDY, to whom he bequeathed his property for her support, and strictly enjoined him to rear her up in the Catholic Religion. This charge Gunner KENNEDY faithfully fulfilled till the death of his wife. He was then obliged to apply to the Battalion fund of his Company, then stationed at Bellary, for an allowance for her support, but was recommended to send her to the Orphan Asylum at Madras. Thinking she would be reared up a Catholic, he gave his consent, and the child was given in charge to Bugle Major FRANCE, 2nd Battalion Artillery, who was then going to St. Thomas' Mount. Understanding soon after that the child was to be placed in the Protestant Asylum, and that all the children in that institution were educated in the Protestant religion, he immediately applied to have the child sent to the Catholic Asylum, but adjutant ROWLANDSON at the Mount would not allow Bugle Major FRANCE to comply with his wishes. He then stated the case to the Right Rev. Dr. CAREW Catholic Bishop at Madras, by whom it was referred to Government. KENNEDY was told in reply, that he should send his statement through his Commanding Officer. He did so, accordingly, but up to this he has obtained no redress. A person acquainted with the circumstances, sent an account of it to the Catholic Institute of Great Britain, which has prepared a statement of the case to be laid before the Honorable, the Court of Directors. I suppose the Hon. Court has already referred it to the authorities at Madras. In the representation sent from this country to the Catholic Institute it was stated, through mistake, that the child was detained in the Protestant Asylum at Madras. It appears the child is still in charge of Bugle Major FRANCE. The authorities at Madras may inquire in the Protestant Asylum, and, not finding her there, may, without further inquiry, write home to that effect to the Honorable Court. I wish to know how they could be set right with regard to the matter. Perhaps this letter, and a few additional remarks, might attract the attention of the Noble Marquis at the head of the Government, to the injustice of the case. A few months ago the Protestant missionaries at Bombay were obliged by the Supreme Court, to give up to his Pagan father one of their converts, a boy about 12 years of age, against his consent. Whereas Adjutant ROWLANDSON and his successors at the Mount, Officers in the employment of the Government, refuse to allow the child of a Catholic Soldier to be delivered up to her lawful guardian, and against his consent insist on having her educated a Protestant, and the Madras Government being applied to refuse to give redress. Are the Catholic Soldiers in this country the only persons that cannot obtain impartial justice?

I have the honor to be,

A CATHOLIC.

BOMBAY.

Preparations on as extensive a scale, as their means will allow, have been made by the Native Christians for the fit reception of the Archbishop of Goa, who was consecrated at Lisbon on the 8th Oct., and was to leave that city for India on the 8th of Nov. As the Prelate may arrive in the "Acbar," Steamer, there is great curiosity prevailing amongst the Roman Catholics of this Island, as to the probabilities of their Ecclesiastical Superior being in Bombay on Christmas day.

On last Sunday morning four Canons of the Cathedral of Goa, with other Ecclesiastical attendants, arrived in Bombay from that Port, bringing here the various vestments and dresses, Mitre and Crozier, and other Insignia of the Dignity of this Prelate. His official signature as it came by the last mail, is "Archbishop Metropolitan and Primate of the Orient." This title, which was obtained after a long diplomatic struggle with the Papal See, has, together with the Pallium, invested this Prelate with all the rank and privileges of his most distinguished Predecessors.

The Pallium is described as resembling the ribband of one grand Order of Knighthood in Europe; it confers on this Archbishop an extensive range of powers according to the ritual of the Roman Catholic Church. The only difference between the "Pallium" and the "secu-

There is a house prepared for the residence of the Archbishop close to the large Catholic Church at Mazagon, in which sacred edifice it is expected that he will perform several of the grand pontifical ceremonies, prior to his departure for Goa, as that will be the first church belonging to his jurisdiction, of which he will have taken official possession.

Shortly before sunset yesterday, a signal was made of a Portuguese Brig. It is said to be one despatched by the Government of Goa, with two Officers especially deputed to compliment the Archbishop on his arrival in Bombay.—Bombay Gazette, December 9, CONSECRATION OF THE RIGHT REV. THOMAS OLIFFE, D.D., AS BISHOP OF MILENE, AND COADJUTOR VICAR APOSTOLIC OF BENGAL.

This most solemn and impressive ceremonial took place at the Catholic Cathedral of this City (North Parish Chapel), on Sunday, the 8th inst., being the anniversary of the Dedication of the Churches of Ireland. At any time, the celebration of so solemn and imposing a rite would have been an object of great and general interest; but many circumstances combined to render the present occasion one of surpassing interest among our local community, as well as an event of much importance in the ecclesiastical world. The respected individual on whom this high dignity has been conferred was a native of Cork, and a member of a family who are very generally and deservedly esteemed. He received his education in this city, and soon after his ordination left Ireland, and with a zeal and energy to which his vigorous powers of mind and body, and great literary acquirements, gave the fullest effect, spent several years in the East Indian Presidencies, in the untiring discharge of his sacred calling, and in spreading the light of truth and the doctrines of salvation among the Heathen tribes of those distant lands, and affording spiritual consolation to the members of his Church who were scattered through the regions over which his labours extended. Within a few months, Dr. OLIFFE returned from Calcutta, and was presented to the Sacred Congregation at Rome, by whom the merits of his Apostolic mission were so highly appreciated that his elevation to the Bishoprick of Milene was recommended and graciously approved by His Holiness Pope Gregory XVI. The anxiety of the Holy Father to diffuse the Faith through every clime and country, by extending and promoting the foreign missions, has led to the establishment of several Bishoprics in the remote empire of the East, in connection with the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, and though perhaps Dr. OLIFFE was the youngest Clergyman on whom the Episcopal dig-

The Bulls having arrived from Rome, directed to the Rt. Rev. Dr. MURPHY, Bishop of the Diocese of Cork, it was publicly notified that the consecration would take place on Sunday, the 8th inst. being one of those Festivals of the Church usually selected for the solemnization of similar rites. The admission to the cathedral was by tickets, which were judiciously issued at a low price, in order that the public anxiety to witness the magnificent scene might be gratified as much as possible, without the inconvenience which would be certain to result from the overpowering throng that would otherwise have been consequent on an indiscriminate admission. The splendid and spacious edifice was prepared with all the grandeur and elegance befitting the august ceremony, and long before the hour at which it was to have commenced every available place was occupied. Indeed, such was the earnest anxiety of many of the citizens who did not arrive at an early hour to obtain admission to any part of the building, that it was found necessary to have all the doors locked before the ceremonies commenced, in order that they might not be interrupted by the continued ingress of persons. The sanctuary, side aisles, and galleries were filled in every part with a most respectable congregation, among whom we noticed most of the families of distinction in and around the city, and many respectable persons of different religious persuasions.

At a quarter past ten o'clock the solemn pealing of the grand organ, with the full burst of sacred harmony from the choir, announced the commencement of the service, and the procession of clergy from the sacristy with acolytes robed, and bearing lighted tapers, gave all the effect to the scene which elevates the soul in silent adoration at the solemn worship of the Deity, amid all the imposing magnificence of the gorgeous ceremonials which the church observes in the celebration of the sacred rites, and inspires her children with the sentiments which led the prophet to exclaim—"Lord I have loved the beauty of thy house and the place of the habitation of thy glory." If external impressions can convey to the heart a sense of holy reverence at the solemnization of the Divine mysteries, the occasion at this moment was one that could not fail to strike all who beheld the scene with every feeling of sublime devotion that could be associated with it. The procession was headed by the Right Rev. Dr. CROTTY, Bishop of Cloyne, attended by his Chaplain the Rev. Mr. Hogan, of Broad Lane. The assistant Bishops who entered next were the Right Rev. Doctor EGAN, Bishop of Kerry, with his Chaplain the Rev. Mr. Cunningham, and the Right Rev. O'CONNOR, Bishop of Down, with his Chaplain the Rev. Mr. HAYES. The Right Rev. Dr. HALL, Bishop of Kildare and Leigattended by his Chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Murphy, and the last of the Prelates who entered was the Right Rev. Dr. MURPHY, Bishop of Cork, attended by the Rev. Messrs. Browne and McLeod as Deacon and Sub-Deacon, and the Rev. Mr. Foley, master of the ceremonies. Among the other Clergymen present we observed the Very Rev. Theobald Mathew, Rev. John Falvey, Very Rev. M. B. O'Shea, Rev. James O'Regan, Rev. Dominick Murphy, Rev. J. B. Clancy, Rev. P. W. Coffey, Rev. G. Sheehan, Rev. Mr. Holland, Rev. Mr. Haines, &c. &c.

The Right Rev. Dr. MURPHY, as consecrating Bishop, took his seat on the right of the Altar, and the Bishop elect was presented before him by the Assistant Bishops, who were robed in rochets, amies, stoles and copes, and white mitres, after which the Consecrator and the Elect retired to their Chapels and put on their robes. The Consecrator having then taken his place in the middle of the Altar, the Elect was placed before him, and the Bulls authorising the consecration having been read at length by the Deacon, all the Bishops took their seats, the Elect sitting before the Consecrator, and the Assistant Bishops on his right and left. The Examination prescribed by the ritual was then proceeded with, the Bishop Elect making the proper responses, standing uncovered at each, and with a reverential bow to the consecrator. The examination being ended, the Elect was conducted by the Assistant Bishop before the Consecrator, and having reverentially kissed his hand proceeded in the same order to his Chapel, where he was vested with sandals, pectoral cross, flowing stole, tunic, dalmatic, chasuble, and maniple. The service of the Mass was then proceeded with to the end of the Epistle and tract, which being finished, the Elect was again led before the Consecrator, who, standing mitred before the Altar, informed him of the duties of a Bishop, after which a prayer was offered, and the Elect was laid prostrate on the altar at the left side of the Consecrator while the Litany of the Saints was sung. This part of the ceremony was particularly impressive and affecting, the Litany was recited by the Consecrator, and the responses were sung by all the attendant Clergy with remarkable power and harmonious concord, the effect of which was absolutely thrilling. At the end of the Litany the Elect was raised from the ground by the Assistant Bishops and knelt before the Consecrator, who took the Book of the Gospels in his hands, and, with the assistance of the other Bishops, placed it over the neck and shoulders of the Elect, after which the Consecration Preface was proceeded with in the following form:—

"It is truly meet and just, right and wholesome that we always, and in all places, should give thanks to thee, O Holy Lord, Almighty Father, everlasting God, who, when instructing in secret and familiar converse, thy servant Moses, wast pleased amongst other lessons of divine worship, to prescribe to him also the forms of priestly attire and that some, and that Aaron, thy Elect, should be robed during the performance of sacrifice, in mysterious garments, to the end that posterity might derive sacred knowledge from the example of their predecessors, and no age be destitute of thy instructions, since with them of old the beauty of symbols commanded reverence; and with us, the experience of realities supersedes the darkness of figures. For the attire of that former priesthood notifies to us the ornaments of the mind; sacerdotal glory is not now recommended by the grandeur of robes, but by the beauty of souls. For even those things which then gratified the carnal sight, claimed the attention rather to the things they signified. Wherefore, O Lord, we beseech thee to bestow upon this thy servant, who has been chosen to minister to thee in the dignity of High Priest, that whatsoever in those mystical garments was implied by the glitter of gold, the sparkling of diamonds, and the varied richness of embroidery, may shine in his morals and deeds. Achieve, in thy Priest, the completion of thy Ministry; and, after clothing him with the brightness of all glory, sanctify him with the dew of celestial ointment."

The head of the Elect, preparatory to his being anointed, was then wrapt round with linen, and the Consecrating Bishop having knelt before the Altar and commenced the hymn Veni Creator Spiritus, it was taken up by the Choir, and sung in the most admirable and correct style that we have ever heard in Cork, the able and masterly performance of Mr. Moran, who presided at the Organ rendering the accompaniment singularly beautiful and effective. While it was being sung the Consecrator rose, and an apron having been placed on his knees, he proceeded to anoint the head of the Elect, who knelt before him, and the Preface was then continued as follows;—

"May this, O Lord, flow abundantly on his head; may it reach his lips; may it descend to the extreme parts of his body; so that the power of thy spirit may replenish him interiorly; and cover him all around exteriorly. May the constancy of faith, the purity of divine love, and the sincerity of peace abound in him. May his feet, by thy gift, be beautiful, to preach peace, and to carry glad tidings of good things. Give to him, O Lord, the ministry of reconciliation, in words, and in deeds, in the power of signs and prodigies. Let his speech and preaching be, not in the persuasive words of human wisdom, but in the showing of the spirit and power. Give to him, O Lord, the keys of the kingdom of Heaven, that he may employ, without ostentation, the power which thou dost impart, for edification, and not for destruction. Whatsoever he shall bind on earth, be it bound also in Heaven; and whatsoever he shall loosen on earth, be it loosened also in heaven: whose sins he shall retain, be they retained, and whose sins he shall remit, may they be by Thee remitted. Whosoever shall curse him, be himself accursed: and whosoever shall bless him, be himself replenished with benedictions. May he be the faithful and wise servant, whom thou, O Lord, appointest over thy family, to give them meat in season, and to render every man perfect. May he be in watchfulness diligent, in spirit fervent; may he detest pride, may he love humility and truth, and be never led, by praises or fear, to abandon them. May he never put light for darkness, nor darkness for light; may he never call evil good, nor good evil; may he be to the wise and to the unwise, a laborer that from the profit of all he may gather fruit. Promote him, O Lord, to the Episcopal Office of our Province, the Lord Jesus Christ, who redeemed us from death, and obtained for us the kingdom of Heaven. Hear us, O Pious Almighty Father, Eternal God, and grant that what we ask in prayer, we may obtain: Through the same Christ our Lord. Amen."

The Anthem was then sung, from the 132nd Psalm "Behold how good and how pleasant," with the full strength of the choir, and the ceremony of anointing the hands of the Elect was proceeded with. The pastoral staff having been consecrated was then placed in the hands of the Elect, the Consecrating Bishop addressing him in these words:—"Receive this staff of the pastoral office, that in the correction of vice thou mayest temper severity with kindness, and exercise judgment without anger; and that in cherishing virtue, thou mayest soothe the minds of thy hearers, without neglecting, in thy forbearance, the severity of reproof. Amen."

The ring having been next consecrated was placed on the finger of the Elect, the Consecrator saying:—"Receive this ring, in token of pledged faith, that, with spotless fidelity adorned, thou mayest guard from corruption the spouse of God, His holy Church. Amen."

The Consecrator having then received the Book of the Gospel, hitherto held open over the shoulders of the Elect, closed it, and presented it to the newly consecrated Bishop saying:—"Receive the Gospel, and go forth, and preach it to the people committed to thee; for God is able to give unto thee increase of grace; who liveth and reigneth, world without end. Amen."

The newly consecrated Bishop having received the kiss of peace from the Consecrator, and all the other Bishops, retired in the same order as before to his Chapel, and the Consecrating Bishop resumed his seat at the Gospel side of the Altar, the Deacon and Sub-Deacon being seated at either side of him.

THE SERMON.

The Rev. MICHAEL O'SULLIVAN then ascended the pulpit, having first received the Episcopal blessing with the proper solemnity, and delivered a most impressive, able, and eloquent discourse on the ceremony which had assembled the vast congregation he was addressing. He took his text from the 21st Chapter of Revelations—verse 3rd.

"And I heard a great voice from the Throne saying—Behold the Tabernacle of God with man, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself with them shall be their God."

The reverend Preacher commenced his sermon by addressing the newly Consecrated Bishop, to whom he remarked that the text which he had read could not fail to suggest to him the great end and object of the august ceremony at which he had been invested with the dignity of his high and holy office, which was to promote the union of the Eternal God with his elect in the kingdom of his glory. It was for that purpose that God's tabernacle with men was established, to show them that he was their God, and they his people, and it was to carry out that purpose of the Divine will that he had been that day associated with the Prelates of his Church, and invested with the same powers, and enlarged faculties as they were called upon to exercise. It was for that the sacred chrism had been poured upon his head and the Book of the Gospels placed upon his shoulders. For that had his feet been shod with the emblems of his calling, as the minister of salvation and glad tidings to those who were sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death; and it was for that great purpose that so many affecting lessons had been that day addressed to him in the beautiful and solemn ceremonial, by which he had been devoted anew to the service of his God, and eternally wedded to his sacred spouse, the Church of Jesus Christ. An office of itself so glorious and consoling was well calculated to call forth all the powers of his mind and energies of his body; but the affections of his heart would be more warmly engaged from a higher motive, which would console him in his labours, and urge him forward to their most complete accomplishment. Were it not for the existence of those high motives, his mind might have sunk beneath the burden of the important duties that devolved upon him in the arduous office to which he was called. The responsibility which now rested on him had increased in proportion to the elevated dignity which he has

The ring which he received, in token of union with the immaculate spouse of Christ, was a pledge which he should present pure and spotless at the close of his ministry; and by that union he had contracted with his Redeemer a pledge of which he might say with the Apostle, "I live now; not I, but Christ liveth in me." It was a pledge which would teach him to take for his model in all things the life and acts of his Divine Master; like him to seek out that which was lost, and to bring back again that which had gone astray; to unite that which was broken and to preserve the strong in its strength; so that when we should appear before Him he might be able to declare that which he himself said to his heavenly father—"Of those whom thou hast given me not one has been lost." That cross, which he was henceforth to bear on his breast, was an emphatic emblem of the trials, taunts, and indignities which were the inevitable portion of all who would follow in the footsteps of that victim, and who, like him, would devote themselves to the works of grace and mercy and redeeming charity; but as he knew that his Lordship was deeply and perfectly impressed with a due sense of the sacred duties to which he had devoted himself, he felt he could not better occupy the few minutes that remained to him than by directing the attention of the congregation before him to the ulterior object of that day's ceremony, and that which he knew to be the dearest to his Lordship's heart—the propagation of the faith of JESUS CHRIST. On that day the faithful commemorated the greatest of all blessings bestowed by the Creator on man; the saving knowledge of Divine truth by the light of his Gospel. Not only amid the hostile persecutions of human malignity, but against the persecuting efforts of human laws directed towards its destruction, the faith of Christ in this country had been well and faithfully preserved; and the exertions to crush it had strengthened it in its strength and advanced it mightily in its onward progress. What then should be their return to the Lord for all that he had done for them, so highly favoured by his gifts and graces? No tribute of thanks, no offering of gratitude could be so acceptable, as their exertions to communicate and spread abroad and around them the blessings of religion which they themselves enjoyed. If any additional incitement were required to urge them on in this acceptable work, it would be found in the interesting and edifying ceremony which they had that day witnessed. They saw before them, elevated to the Episcopal dignity, one born, brought up, and educated among themselves—one who, like Samuel, having devoted his childhood to the services of the altar, gave the first efforts of his manhood to proclaiming the Gospel, and to the diffusion of its sacred truths in foreign lands; and who had now come back, not to repose from his labours, but to return, with increased powers, to diffuse the light of truth over the remote districts where he might with most advantage pursue his honoured calling; to go forth once more, with renewed energy, to combat against the errors of darkness, and infidelity in the name of Jesus Christ. The duty of propagating the faith was not, however, one peculiar alone to him and those who were associated with him in the Ministerial functions; it was equally incumbent on every one who professed it. At the moment the waters of baptism were poured on their heads, they solemnly avowed their readiness to stand forth as soldiers of the faith, and it therefore now became their duty to aid the spread of the Gospel, and promote the knowledge of its holy doctrines. It was their duty to extend the knowledge, and enforce the practice of that great leading precept of Christianity, which taught men that they should love the Lord God with their whole soul, and their neighbours as themselves for the love of God. To communicate the faith to the heathen and unbeliever was to fulfil the precept which the Scripture enjoined of saying to those in the dark—come forth; and to those who were lost, walk in the right path. In the regions to which the blessings of Christianity were now about to be extended, more than a hundred millions of their fellow creatures were sunk in the abomination of idolatry; in that region the revolting atrocities from which men's minds shuddered in the contemplation, were indulged in under the fearful name of religious ceremonials. There the cannibal gloated over his unnatural repast; there the unholy altars may still said to be smoking with the abominations of idolatry. But when the miserable victims, who before would rush with impetuous zeal under the wheels of the idol's car, were taught the divine truths which Christianity unfolded, and heard the consoling lessons of piety and peace which the Church placed before its children in every clime and country, its effects would be to bring them within the fold, and teach them that instead of finding in the grey hairs of the parent a motive, horrible even in its contemplation, for the immolation as propitiatory offerings to their fancied deities, a proper and worthy source for love and affection. The beauties and blessings of Christianity would be more developed, and those who were instrumental in their extension would find hope and happiness in the consoling reflections which would habitually arise to them. Animated by the exciting scene which was presented in that day's ceremony, he felt it would be more than useless to occupy their time at any greater length, except to ask of them to join in their tribute of praise and thanksgiving, most humbly and reverentially associated with that of the divine victim who would be offered on the altar; and to implore their earnest and most fervent supplications in behalf of the newly consecrated Prelate, that the Almighty Dispenser of events might, in his mercy, be graciously pleased to pour upon him all the graces that would enable him to shed a lustre on the holy office which he was that day ordained to fill, and that he might, at the termination of his ecclesiastical labours, show forth that light which in the presence of God would be acceptable for ever and ever, as the fruits of a well spent life, by one of his chosen good and faithful servants.

It would be a great injustice to the excellent Preacher if we did not candidly avow that the very crowded state of the Cathedral did not permit our taking a complete report of his most lucid and truly impressive discourse; we have been only able to present our readers with a brief compendium of the leading points which the Rev. Gentleman embraced in the sermon; but referring to it, we are obliged to state—and, in doing so, we only discharge a duty which is most pleasing to us—that the sermon which he delivered was one which will be well and long borne in mind by all who had the happiness of hearing it. To the Rev. Mr. Holland, and (we believe) the Rev. Mr. Cronin, our Reporter is much indebted for the attention and courtesy which they evinced towards him; but the distance at which the pulpit was from his seat, and the difficulty of hearing distinctly the words of the Preacher rendered it impossible to give a literal report. The Preacher having descended from the pulpit, the ordinary of the Mass was proceeded with, and having been concluded to the Post Communion, the Consecrator having blessed the mitre, placed it on the head of the Elect saying—"We place, O Lord, on the head of this thy Prelate and Combatant, the helmet of defence and salvation, that, having his forehead adorned, and his head guarded, by the power of both Testaments, he may appear terrible to the adversaries of the truth, and stand forward as a valiant champion against them, through the abundant grace bestowed on him, by Thee; who didst adorn the countenance of thy servant Moses, made beauteous in a colloquy with thee, with the most brilliant rays of thy brightness and truth; and who didst command a diadem to be placed on the head of Aaron thy High Priest;—Through Christ, our Lord.—Amen." The Consecrator having next blessed the Gloves said:—"O Almighty Creator, who didst give unto man, made to thine own image, hands, endowed with joints, as organs of intelligence, that he might work aright; and didst command them to be kept clean, that the soul might be by them aptly represented, and that thy mysteries might be by them worthily performed; vouchsafe to bless + and to consecrate + these coverings of the hands, that whosoever of thy sacred Ministers, the Bishops, shall with humility clothe his hands in them, may, through thy mercy be signalized, by cleanliness, both of heart and work:—Through Christ our Lord. Amen."

And putting them on the hands of the newly consecrated Bishop the following prayer was added:—"Encompass, O Lord, the hands of this thy Minister, with the cleanness of the New Man who came down from heaven; that, in like manner as Jacob, having his hands covered with the signs of kids, received his father's blessing, for presenting to him the food and drink he most desired, so this thy servant may be found worthy, by offering, in his hands, the Holy Sacrifice, to obtain the blessing of thy grace; Through our Lord Jesus Christ, thy Son, who, in the likeness of the sinful flesh, for our sakes, offered himself to thee. Amen."

After this part of the ceremonial was gone through the "TE DEUM" was sung by the choir, during which the newly Consecrated Bishop, attended by the Assistant Bishops, and preceded by acolytes bearing lighted tapers, proceeded through the aisle and nave of the Church, giving his Episcopal benediction as he passed to the congregation, by whom it was received with the most solemn reverence and humble devotion. Any attempt to describe or illustrate the scene which was at this time presented would be many degrees short of the reality. It only remains for us to say that it was sublime, solemn and exciting in the most remarkable degree; and that at its conclusion the fervent and earnest prayers of the humble flock, as well as of that portion of them who in a worldly sense were more exalted, were sent before the throne of mercy and grace for the prosperity and happiness of the meek and mild ecclesiastic who offered his aspirations for their sakes to the source of Divine love, and who was looked upon by those who received his benediction as one specially favoured of the Lord for the realization of His own wise ends.

This very impressive part of the ceremony having been concluded, the new Bishop returned to his seat, and the Consecrator said—"O God, the Pastor and Ruler of all the faithful, mercifully regard this thy servant, whom thou hast chosen to preside over thy Church: grant that he may, both by word and example, benefit those over whom he presides; that, together with the flock committed to his care, he may come to everlasting life; Through Christ our Lord. Amen."

The ceremony then concluded with the Benediction, which was pronounced by the newly consecrated Bishop, in this form;—"Blessed be the name of the Lord; Henceforth now and for ever." "Our help is in the name of the Lord; Who made Heaven and Earth." "May the Almighty God, the Father +, and the Son +, and the Holy Ghost +, bless you. Amen."

The Consecrating and Assistant Bishops remained as before, standing on the Gospel side, in their mitres, looking towards the new Bishop who proceeded from the Epistle side towards them, making in the way three reverences, and at each reverence saying to them:—Many years of Health. He was then received to the Kiss of Peace by the other Bishops, who conducted him away, after saying the last Gospel of the Mass. And thus concluded the solemn and impressive scene of which we have given a brief and imperfect sketch in the foregoing notice.—The Cork Southern Reporter; Oct. 10.

STATE OF CATHOLICISM THROUGH- OUT THE WORLD.

"Discourse pronounced at Rome at the opening of the Academy of the Catholic Religion in the year 1843, by the Cardinal Pacca, Dean of the Sacred College, Bishop and Legate of Velletri, &c.

I cannot contemplate without grief the situation of the Catholic Church in these two kingdoms in which it was heretofore so flourishing; it is with a very different feeling that I consider what passes in another country, in which for many ages religion groaned under a most bitter and relentless persecution. There they refused to the unfortunate Catholics even the consolation of freely exercising their worship; and not only was not that worship tolerated but it was proscribed, under penalties the most severe and the most cruel. At present, by a wonderful mutation, we see in those same regions new temples and magnificent cathedrals rising up; we see the building of convents and monasteries for the religious of the two sexes—and a well-wishing and generous hospitality is offered to the priests of those foreign nations who have been struck down by the persecutions of their country. It is easy to perceive that I speak of England. These facts are not a little consoling; but there is no reason to flatter ourselves with the idea, which some persons do, that the Anglican sect is on the point of expiring. It is very true that it is every day losing ground, abandoned as it already is by numberless sectarians who have fallen into a complete incredulity, and by many others who, enlightened by Divine grace, are returning to the bosom of their mother—the Catholic Church, which has never ceased to feel for them the utmost tenderness. Nevertheless, this Anglican Church, all tottering and shaken though it appears to be, is supported by two firm stays—the power of the aristocracy and the opulence of the clergy.

As long as it shall be permitted to the great ones of this country to distribute to their brothers, to their children, to their nephews, the opulent revenue of episcopal endowments and the rich benefices which annually raise six million pounds sterling, it is in vain to hope for the disappearance of this sect. But if the Lord continues to bless the zeal and the labours of our clergy in England, we shall soon witness the abandonment of Protestant pastors by the greater portion of their flocks. It is seldom in Ireland that the Protestant minister of a parish has a larger congregation than his wife and children and clerk. As to the rest, that which the Anglicans call defection, but which we call conversion, will force the Government to make serious reflections. In other times it might be feared that it would make the persecution more violent; but in the actual state of Europe we must look for favourable results from it to the cause of the Catholics.

England, then, offers us consolation in the midst of the sufferings of the Church; but our consolation and our joy increase still more when we consider the state of the Church in Belgium. I have seen, in the course of my life, four different dynasties reign successively in this industrious and interesting country. The three first, rivals and oftentimes opposed by political and commercial interests, agreed and perfectly resembled each other in one thing—in their application to trample upon and torment this good people, so truly Catholic, by religious innovations. These three first dynasties having been driven off, either by foreign arms or by the insurrection and resistance of the people, Divine Providence has at length accorded peace to those good Catholics, and it has executed its design by a wonderful stroke of its omnipotence, by one of those means which the straightened ways of human wisdom might find contrary to the proposed end, means well expressed by this ingenious proverb of the Portuguese language—“Deos escreve di-rieto sobre uma regra estorta.” God writes on a curved line. In effect, God, to procure peace for the Catholics, called the fourth dynasty. He raised upon the throne a new prince, strange by country, born and educated in Protestantism, and attached to the sect of Luther. Who would not have thought but that the enemies of religion would have found a support in him? Well! this prince, worthy to be proposed as a model to those who have had the good fortune to be born in the bosom of the true Church, has perfectly learnt the truth and justice of the celebrated words of the great Osius, Bishop of Cordova, to the Emperor Constance—“Tibi Deus imperium commisit, nobis quæ sunt ecclesie credidit”—It is to you, prince, that God has committed the empire; but it is to us that he has confided the interests of his Church.

When the new King of Belgium took possession of the throne the words he addressed to the clergy expressed the same thought, and he has faithfully kept his promise, for to give to his people a guarantee and complete assurance of the attachment of the new dynasty to the Catholic religion, he desired that his children should be baptised and brought up in our holy and august religion.

But why should I forget our dear Italy, which doubtless, ought to present itself first to my thoughts? This beautiful and rich country of Europe, one of the most privileged, one of the most favoured with the gifts of nature, which has received a sweet and wholesome climate, a sky almost ever serene, a soil so fertile as generally to recompense the sweat of the toiling agriculturist. She has produced an intelligent people, capable of great enterprises, as the celebrated Romans sufficiently proved in ancient times, and the Sovereign Pontiffs in modern days, who have chiefly belonged to our nation. And the Popes have indeed done great things, not only in the government of the Church, but also in favour of the temporal interests of the world and of civil society, by their wholesome influence and their wise authority. This is what you have proved, illustrious academicians, in a wise way, in the course of preceding years. But what are these favours of Heaven in comparison of a benefit far greater—that of having received from the East into the bosom of Italy, in our most happy city of Rome, the chair of truth, the supreme tribunal of the Church, this good and tender mother, who has always nourished, and who has never ceased to nourish with the purest milk of heavenly doctrines all the churches of Italy. It is she who has combated and who yet combats every day, to alienate far from her bosom the infernal poison of heresy and schism. Since those ancient days when first the Emperors of Constantinople, and afterwards the Kings of the Goths protected and sustained Arianism, the Roman Catholic Church has always stood in the way of heretic sects establishing themselves in this country; and in the sixteenth century in particular, when from the pit of hell so many heresies spread over the north, and endeavoured to penetrate into Italy and to take root here, it was Rome that drove from us the terrible plague of those religious wars, which inundated Germany with blood during thirty years, and France at first during forty years, and afterwards England, Bohemia, and Hungary. Nevertheless, we had also the unhappiness of seeing, in the seventeenth century, penetrate into Italy, a hypocritical sect from Flanders, and which, in order to hide the more securely its intentions and dark projects, disavowed its real existence. Though proscribed and struck with the anathemas of the Holy See, it found an easy access, a well-wishing reception in certain cloisters, whose destruction it had already perfidiously meditated, and in the universities, where unnatural children of Italy, unworthy to bear its name, and ungrateful towards Heaven and its numerous blessings, embraced the errors of the sect, and dared to defend them. From this double source of public instruction spread and rapidly propagated among politicians, magistrates, and men in the bosom of civil tribunals, those principles of defiance, of jealousy, and of hatred towards the Holy See, which, even under the reign of princes, whose private and public conduct was Christian, and whose intentions were pure and religious, reduced the Church to the sad bondage of Agar, she, who in sacred things should be free and independent queen.

One of the most illustrious bishops of the seventeenth century, in a discourse pronounced before one of the most powerful monarchs, the immortal Bossuet, speaking to Louis XIV., said—“Holy authority of the Church—necessary bridle of licentiousness, and only support of discipline—what hast thou become?—abandoned by some, usurped by others; either it is entirely abolished, or it is in the hands of strangers.” But it would require a long discourse to expose all these wounds, Sire, the times will enlighten your Majesty of it.”—(3d sermon for Palm Sunday, 2d part.)

Thus spoke Bossuet; but since his time to our own the wounds inflicted on the Church in our dear country, as well as in every other, have not been healed; they bleed yet, they bleed abundantly. But let us hope I shall say with the illustrious Bossuet, that the times will enlighten good princes and disabuse them of their errors. Perhaps Heaven destines this era of consolation and of goodness for the glorious Pontiff who now governs the Church to recompense that sacerdotal firmness, that apostolic courage with which, from the heights of the Vatican, in presence of the great powers of Europe, he has made to be felt the solemn voice of Peter—that voice which the enemies of religion feign not to fear—that voice which even now shakes the world, and which can always, if not check, in a moment, every evil, at least console and fortify the just, and prepare, for those who have strayed, the way that will conduct them back to the compassionate bosom of their mother.

Be not astonished, my well-beloved colleague, and all you illustrious auditors, if I have spoken with liberty and frankly. I think that a man beneath the weight of eighty-seven years, and already near the tomb into which he shall soon go down, ought to be ordinarily deaf to the pusillanimous councils of human prudence!—Tablet.

PUSEYISM IN AMERICA.

Among other things, which have crept into America, and which being planted there, have sprung up rapidly, is Puseyism. Not content with forming the Episcopal Church of New York; the Episcopalians there have now taken to themselves the exclusive title of "The Church" of New York; and as some of the American Bishops have lately been visiting England and spending their time in intimacy with Dr. Pusey, these Right Rev. Gentlemen have resolved to exhibit some practical illustrations of his principles. The Bishop of New York, Dr. Onderdonk, has led the way by ordaining a Mr. Carey, notwithstanding the protest of two of his principal clergy, one of whom was the excellent Dr. Anthon, the famous classic. Before being ordained Mr. Carey was examined by the Bishop and his clergy, and the objectors were allowed to put questions. Mr. Carey's answers were exactly such as might be expected from Mr. Newman; he said, that he had "no special leaning towards the joining of the Romish communion, at present," he would "not deny the decrees of the Council of Trent," though he would "not positively affirm them," whether the English Church and the American, were in a state of schism, on account of their separation from Popery, was, he thought, "an historical question," he considered "the Romish Missal in some respects preferable to the Liturgy," he did not think himself bound to give an ex animo assent to the Thirty-nine Articles; and he did "not know how to answer" the "difficult question" whether the Church of Rome was now in error in matters of faith. This Gentleman, was, as we have said, after this examination, ordained, and then came a Meeting of Laity in which Judges and others of the principal gentry made very earnest and resolute speeches; and, after that, a proclamation from Bishop McIlvaine, one of the most distinguished of the American Bishops, that henceforth he would not admit clergy of the Diocese of New York, into his Diocese without examination; and, finally, all the signs of a great and decided schism appeared, among the whole body of Episcopalians in the United States. Thus we see that Puseyism instead of working in America, very much as it does in England, and only causing a gradual dropping off from the Church to Popery on the one hand, and to non-conformity on the other, scarcely gets well settled on the opposite side of the water, before it threatens the whole system of the Episcopalians, with disruption. So far as we can gather from the accounts that have reached us, there is reason to think, that the effects of this movement in America may be very serious; and, perhaps, have a reflex influence on the English Church. At any rate, as time advances, so Puseyism, it seems, will develop its true colors. In Scotland it has lately shaken the Episcopal Church, (the object of the Times's admiration) by the ex-communication of Sir William Dunbar, one of the best of its clergy; in Ireland it has set the Presbyterians against the Episcopalians, and the Laity against one of their Bishops, and the Clergy against one another; in some places it has sent its Missionaries to disturb others; in England it is displaying new doctrines, and greater conformity to Rome year after year; and finally, therefore, we may well ask, "What will the end be?" Perhaps, a little more decision in England, and wherever else the evil exists, might well and usefully be displayed, in imitation of Dr. Anthon, and Bishop McIlvaine, who deserve high honor for their faithfulness and courage. What business Mr. Carey had in a Protestant Church, it is not easy to discover. But certainly he stands not alone now, in an anomalous position; for he can quote good examples in England and elsewhere, to justify his entry into the ministry of one Church, when his affections are evidently in another.—Hurkaru, Jan. 10.

PUSEYISM.—ILFORD.—To make the sign of the Cross in a Protestant church is alarming—to wear a white instead of a black gown in the pulpit, terrific—to send round a bason for alms, awful—to lay them on the altar, abominable—but to bless them is worse than all—its popish. This all appears by the following requisition, signed by thirty-two respectable Christians:—"To the Churchwardens of the Parish of Great Ilford—We, the undersigned inhabitants of Great Ilford, having had our feelings outraged at the introduction of Tractarian forms into our Church, and still more so at the papistical doctrines preached there, as also by the curate making the sign of the Cross upon himself on approaching the communion table, which acts are sanctioned by the vicar, request that you will call a general meeting of the parishioners, to take such measures as may be thought best under these most painful circumstances." The meeting was held, and a deputation waited on the vicar, who denied that the crossing and bowing before the communion has his sanction; but, at the same time, he proceeded to justify it under an old ecclesiastical law of the Church; stated that it is practised in all Protestant churches on the continent; and, finally, declared that the Bishop of Exeter, although he does not himself practise it, sanctions the clergy in crossing themselves on approaching the communion; that it is a practice common among ministers of the "High Church" party, of which he avowed himself a member; he concluded, however, by expressing his willingness to obey whatever commands the bishop might think proper to make in the matter.—Tablet.

MANGNALL'S HISTORICAL QUESTIONS.

Q. "What was the gunpowder plot?—A. A scheme of the Roman Catholics, to blow up both houses of Parliament, by laying a train of gunpowder under them."

Why the Catholic Religion has been for such a length of time, and still continues to this day to be an object of calumny and persecution, must appear somewhat extraordinary to those who have not taken the trouble of examining and searching into the cause of this fact, whilst other sects are tolerated, though some of them have openly refused to join their fellow subjects in some essential duties which are necessary for the well-being of the Public at large. Yet the hatred against these different sects, should there be any, is comparatively small, when compared with those raised against Catholics, to whom they are indebted for christianity and civilization. And amongst many other instances of prejudice which could be easily deduced, the most notorious, and that which is of the longest standing, is that of the gunpowder plot in the Reign of James the First. It is just as absurd and ridiculous for Mangnall to attribute this diabolical conspiracy to the Catholic body at large, as for me to stigmatize the Protestants of England with the irregularities and blasphemies of Johanna Southcot, as we trust we shall soon prove to the satisfaction of our readers. Cecil, the Secretary of State, used all the art and sophistry which he was endowed with to stigmatize Catholics with the degrading and diabolical act, called the gunpowder plot, of which he himself was either the original author, or at least the chief conductor. That we may ascertain the truth of this assertion, we shall examine it with historical impartiality and with Christian candour, not, as has been frequently done by prejudiced or ignorant writers, whose custom it is to follow each other like a flock of sheep without reflection, or like those declamatory preachers on the 5th of November, whose sole ambition is to inflame their hearers with hatred and animosity against Catholics. It has been said this conspiracy has been attributed to Catholics, in revenge, for the King having disappointed the hopes which they had entertained of his treating them with indulgence, and, consequently, the rigorous treatment which they afterwards experienced has been justified. May I be permitted to ask first, how many individuals amongst the conspirators were implicated in the conspiracy? Only sixteen persons are so much as accused in the act of attainder that passed on the occasion of any share of its guilt; and of this number not more than seven were acquainted with the worst part of it; the rest barely knowing it as a conscientious secret, which they used every means in their power to discourage and prevent.^(a) In the second place I ask, what character did these conspirators bear amongst Catholics of their time? They were rash imprudent youths, whose character was without weight amongst Catholics; who, by their conformity with the established religion, were looked upon as apostates and outcasts from the body of Catholics.^(b) Why is it that Cecil, who could

^(b) A cotemporary and well informed writer speaks of the conspirators as follows: "They were a few wicked and desperate wretches, whom many Protestants termed Papists, although the Priests and true Catholics knew them not to be such: nor can any Protestant say have discovered the plot, or rather have made it known to all, concealed it until the night previous to the day on which so diabolical a scheme was to be put in execution? was it not that he wished to implicate other young noblemen, who had not as yet been caught in his snares, which, of all other things, was most desirable to him? The persons by whom the conspirators were detected, if I mistake not, were Catholics, viz. The Earl of Worcester, the Earl of Northampton, together with the Earl of Suffolk. Had this malicious design been put into execution who would have been the sufferers? The King, I grant, and the heads of the Protestant cause both in Church and State, but they were not the only persons; there were upwards of twenty noblemen, supporters and chiefs of the Catholic interest, who at that time sat in the House of Lords, Monteaule alone being forewarned of the pretended danger. There is still a very important question for my present purpose—did the conspirators act in conformity with the principles of their religion, even such as they conceived it to be, and did they think the horrid attempt in which they foolishly engaged, lawful and meritorious? Mangnall intimates that they did so; and Hume, in unison with others, asserts that “No one of these pious devotees,” as he calls them, ever entertained any compunction with regard to the cruel massacre which they projected. The falsehood of this will appear from their dying behaviour. For after the seizure of Fawkes, when Catesby, Percy, the two Wrights, and some of the other conspirators found themselves surrounded in Staffordshire, by Sir Richard Walsh’s party, and that they must necessarily die either at the gallows or in the field, “in the first place they fell upon their knees and asked God pardon for the villany they intended; (c) opened the gates of the house and resolved either to effect their escape or to die fighting. Catesby and Percy were killed with one shot, Winter was wounded and made prisoner.” (d) In like manner when Winter and the other conspirators came to suffer the just punishment of their crimes, “all of them, except Grant, died very penitently. Fawkes declared his repentance more remarkably than the rest, and exhorted Catholics never to engage in any such bloody enterprise, it being a method never allowed nor prospered by God.” (e) The king himself, in his speech in Parliament upon the disclosure of the plot, acquitted the Catholic body at large of the guilt of it, and declared “those Puritans worthy of fire who would admit no salvation to any Papist.” (f) The Catholics themselves felt the most lively horror of that desperate scheme, the execution of which would have been more fatal to them than to the nation at large, and they expressed it by every means in their power. The Archpriest Blackwell and the other heads of the clergy immediately circulated a pastoral letter, in which they qualified the late attempt detestable and abominable, assuring the Catholics that the R. Pontiff had always condemned such unlawful practices. (g) After having advanced some of the reasons there are for supposing that Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, was as deeply involved in this plot, as his father, Lord Burghly, is proved to have been in that of Babington. It is quite certain that these reasons have equal weight with many intelligent Protestants, as with Catholics. One of them calls it, “a neat device of the Secretary.” (h) Another says that he “engaged some Papists in this desperate plot, in order to divert the King from making any advances to Popery, to which he seemed inclinable, in this minister’s opinion.” (i) James himself was so sensible of the many advantages which his minister reaped from this plot, that he used to call the 5th of November Cecil’s Holiday. A third Protestant writer assures us that “this design was first hammered in the forge of Cecil, who intended to have produced it in the time of Elizabeth; . . . that by his secret emissaries, he enticed some hot-headed men, who, ignorant whence the design first came, heartily engaged in it.” (k) This much seems certain, that the famous letter delivered by an unknown person to Lord Monteaule was not written by a real conspirator, whose life was concerned in the issue of the plot; such a character would not unnecessarily, and with infinite risk to his own cause and life, have sent a written notice to his friend to be absent from parliament at a time when it was not known whether parliament would not be further prorogued, and many other accidents might have prevented Monteaule from being present, more particularly as a few hours, or even a few minutes, would have answered his supposed purpose equally as well as that of 10 days. It is pretty certain that a space of time was necessary for Cecil to effect his wicked purpose, in order to draw the young lord into the punishment, that any one of them was such as the law terms Popish recusants.” He adds, p. 58. “If any one of them were Catholics, or so died, they were known Protestants not long before.” Popish Plot for Priests, p. 58. Ann. 1671.

if not into the guilt, of the conspiracy, and that in case he had not made it known, other Catholic peers would have received similar letters, and still more so for devising the means of breaking the matter to the king, so as to give him the credit of first discovering the mystery. • Why did Cecil remain for the space of five days without communicating a business of such importance to his master, and defer having the cellars under the Parliament House examined until the day previous to the session? His acting in this manner proves that the management of the whole plot was in his own hands. The character and history of Francis Tresham, Esq. one of the conspirators, induces us to suspect that he was to the Earl of Salisbury in this plot, what Maud and Polley had been to his father Lord Burghly, and Walsingham, in a former plot. Almost 20 years before Tresham had been concerned in the conspiracy of the Earl of Essex; he was of a restless intriguing disposition, and so intimately acquainted with Cecil, that he had access to him at all hours of the night as well as of the day, and to have had communications with him concerning the affairs of Catholics. (l) Being, however, seized upon and committed to the Tower he met with a sudden death, in the course of a few days before any trial or examination of him took place. On this occasion a report was circulated that he died by strangury, which disorder does not take a sudden turn, whereas the Physician who attended him pronounced that he died of poison. (m) The fraudulent art and consummate hypocrisy with which it is now evident that Cecil acted in disclosing the plot, confirms the idea that he had the management of it from the beginning. From the secretary's own papers, it is proved that he had known of a conspiracy amongst the Papists of some kind or other three months before the letter was brought to him by Monteagle, Oct. 26, (n) and also from his own confidential letter to the ambassador at the Court of Spain, written immediately after the breaking out of the plot, (o) that he was acquainted with the diabolical malice of it, viz. that it was intended to blow up the Parliament with gunpowder. He, accordingly, for his own security, communicated the whole matter to the Lord Chamberlain, whose duty it was to attend to the security of the Parliament house, when the king was to go thither, they both conversed together about the different apartments adjoining it, and particularly about the great vault under it. (p) They agreed, however, (that is to say the prime minister thought it best) that the search should not be made before the session of Parliament, which was not to take place for ten days, in order, as he confesses, that "the plot might run to full ripeness;" (q) and to see whether other "noblemen would receive similar advertisements," (r) that is to allow him time to send fresh letters to persons of rank, if he found it expedient; finally, to attack the king on his weak side by making him pass for the Solomon of Great Britain, and to work up the nation to a paroxysm of fury against Papists, by the apparent imminent danger to which all that was illustrious in it would appear to have been exposed.

GWALIOR.

We have been kindly permitted by His Grace, the Archbishop, the use of the following letter from a young English Officer, of a most respectable family, a convert to the Catholic Faith, who being at first destined by his parents for the Ministry of the English Protestant Church, commenced his studies for that Profession, but afterwards decided in favor of the Military state. In making this change he was greatly influenced by the unfavorable impression which the worldly conversation and pursuits of his fellow candidates for the Protestant Ministry made on his mind.

Camp Gwalior, January 6th, 1844.

MY DEAR LORD,—According to promise I now address a few lines to your Lordship, but at the same time hope I do not intrude. On the 29th December we had a hard battle with the Mahrattas, and thoroughly overcame them. The engagement commenced at 8 A. M. and lasted until 2½ P. M. My Brigade, consisting of H. M. 39th and 56th N. I. were at a charge nearly the whole time, so that you can well understand we were not a little fatigued. Through a merciful Providence all our Officers escaped unhurt, and, considering that we were in the thick of it, very few of our Sepoys suffered; I think not above 60 killed and wounded. I am sorry to say such was not the case with the gallant 39th, six or seven officers being wounded, one of whom has since died, and a due proportion of men. They are as gallant a set of men as ever breathed. Many thanks to your Lordship for the introductory letter to Major —, who is a fine officer and a good man, according to all accounts. His Lady is at —; the pleasure of her acquaintance will be great to me. I like my regiment much. Report says that we shall all have stars or crosses presented to us in honor of the battle of Maharajpore on the 29th ult., and that some kind of a monument will be raised in Agra, to be made of the guns taken, in honour of the dead. The number of guns captured by us is, I believe, 64, and by General Grey, who engaged the enemy on the same day, the other side of Gwalior, 42. The Maharrattas are a brave enemy, and I have heard several good traits of their character, such as their giving our wounded men water, &c. &c. I am rejoiced to see by the Catholic Herald how our most holy religion is spreading all over the world. There is, however, a wide field for further exertion. My Lord, my love of our Holy Faith increases daily, and I think before a very long period has elapsed I shall feel myself sufficiently subdued from worldly passions to prepare for the sacred ministry; and thus, by my endeavours for the future welfare of my fellow creatures, atone in some degree for the mis-spent time of my youth. With very kind regards to yourself, Mr. Weld, &c.

Believe me, my dear Lord,
Your sincerely attached,

The following excerpt from the Bengal Hurharu of the 17th instant, will be perused with peculiar interest by the friends and admirers of Mr. John Michie:

MR. J. MICHIE—(Communicated.)—People who benefit the public by their good actions, ought always to be held up to the world, in order that worth may be prized and praise bestowed where it is due. How trivial soever those actions may be, yet a public declaration of them is an encouragement which ought never to be withheld. Under this impression, we think, we are only doing our duty in bringing to notice the services rendered by the Deputy Register in the Foreign Department, to the wounded during the late battle with the Maharrattas. Mr. Michie's name is familiar to the public; we need not, therefore, eulogize his character as a public officer; more than once have his services been acknowledged by the Supreme head of Government, whose opinion is on record. Of his private virtues he has afforded an indubitable proof of that zeal and charity which shone forth so conspicuously in the late action. Fired with a laudable ambition, he left the camp which lay 5 miles from the field of battle, followed the Army, and in the hottest fight was busy in bringing away the wounded as they fell, and assisting the Surgeons in binding up their wounds. Such an action is meritorious anywhere, but in the field of battle, where he nobly risked his life for others, it is truly heroic. It is not wrong to suppose that many of our British Soldiets might have perished but for the prompt and active assistance rendered by Mr. Michie. In a large plain where men are falling on every side, how much can a few Surgeons do, however active they may be. Such conduct on the part of a private individual, who could have had no other motive but that of doing good to his fellow creatures, cannot be sufficiently praised. We are glad to observe, that the Governor-General has appreciated his good services. After the fight his Lordship ordered a public letter to be addressed to Mr. Michie, thanking him, in his name, for the valuable assistance rendered by him to the wounded British soldiers.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE, INTALLY.

*We understand that four splendid Maps (Arrowsmith's) of the four quarters of the globe, five feet by four, in beautiful Mahogany frames, have been presented to St. John's College by Count Lackersteen; and by an anonymous friend, a pair of Globes (Carey's) two feet in diameter, exhibiting the heavenly constellations according to the most approved modern system of classification, and the tracks of the famous navigators, Cook, Vancouver, M. De Laperouse, &c., in their tours of discovery round the earth. We have been requested to acknowledge also the receipt of 100 Rs. in support of that Institution from Aga Kurbolai Mahomed, a gentleman whose benevolence extends to the praiseworthy institutions of every creed; also from Mrs. Crow, Senior, 5 Rs.

CATHOLIC MISSION, BELLARY.

We have much pleasure in announcing the following items of intelligence from Bellary, where the apostolic labours of the Rev. Mr. Doyle continue to have a most peculiar blessing from the Lord of the vineyard. "Almost all the Catholics of the gallant 63rd have been at the Holy Communion. we had about 93 communicants the Sunday before Christmas, about one hundred on Christmas-day, and the same number on the following Sunday and New Year's Day.

"Four Protestants joined us during the months of November and December last. Two of them have been received into the Church, and two are under instruction." If the lives of Catholics were thus everywhere edifying, the arguments which prove the truth of our holy Faith would be more persuasive, if not more convincing. By their fruits the true disciples of Christ shall be known, in spite of calumny and prejudice, and when our heavenly Father is glorified by our good works, our light, or rather the light of truth, shall inevitably shine before men, so that he who runs may read it in characters not to be mistaken.

LORETTO HOUSE AND ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

A short time since Rustomjee Cowasjee, accompanied by his Son and the Ladies of their respective families, visited the Loretto House, and, in order as well to express his acknowledgments for the polite attention with which he and his family were received as to show his desire to contribute to that Institution and the Church attached to it, kindly sent 700 Marble flags and 1200 Chunar stones to be employed in flooring those parts of the Church and the House where they might be deemed useful or ornamental. On the part of the Catholic Community we beg to return our respectful thanks for this munificent contribution, and we know it will be gratifying to the generous donor to be informed, that already the floors of the commodious range of baths lately erected for the Loretto House and of the dressing rooms annexed to them, have been laid down with marble.

THE BURIAL GROUND CHAPEL.

Although most of our readers are aware that the holy sacrifice of Mass has been offered up, for several years past, every Sunday morning at the Burial Ground Chapel, yet there are many Catholics residing in the Circular Road, and its vicinity, who, either from the want of this knowledge, or for the pious purpose of attending to the sermons and instructions delivered from the pulpit, have been accustomed to trudge all the way to the Cathedral and St. Thomas' Church; whilst others (thank Heaven there are few such) from ignorance or indifference have quieted their consciences by hearing Mass at the Schismatic Chapel at Boitacannah, or by staying at home altogether. It will, no doubt, be gratifying to all well disposed Catholics residing in this neighbourhood to learn that, in addition to the holy sacrifice of the Mass offered every Sunday morning at the Burial Ground Chapel, a discourse in English is delivered. Last Sunday, the Rev. Dr. Kennedy preached there. He took for his text the Gospel of the day, (John 2d Ch. 1, v. 11.) which he explained in a very lucid manner; he expatiated largely on the sacrament of matrimony. "Were not," said he, "marriage a holy state, the mother of Jesus would not have sanctioned with her presence the 'Marriage in Cana of Galilee,' nor would Jesus with his disciples have accepted the invitation to the feast; but, on the contrary, because it was a good and a holy state, our Lord Jesus not only honoured the feast with his presence, but marked his approbation of it in a particular manner by working his first miracle on the occasion." The Rev. Doctor then dwelt upon the duties of husbands and wives relative to each other, and showed in a forcible manner the obligation of parents to rear up their children in the fear of the Lord, not only by precept but by example also. The zealous preacher concluded his very edifying discourse by exhorting his hearers to enrol themselves as members of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. The conditions are very simple, and within the means of the most straitened circumstances: all that is required of a member is the payment of one anna and a half monthly to a collector of ten subscribers. In addition to this small subscription it is requisite for each member to say one Pater and Ave with "St. Francis Xavier pray for us" daily, and to receive holy communion on the feast of this saint. "This Society," continued the Rev. Doctor, "has met with the approbation of the Sovereign Pontiff, who has been graciously pleased to grant Plenary Indulgences to those members who fulfil the conditions required of them." It will doubtless be apparent that this Society does a great deal of good, not only by paying for the passage of Missionaries to all parts of the world, which in itself must be important to all Christians, but by making the members good Catholics; for by the conditions of the Society it is incumbent on them to say daily the prayers stated above, and to approach the Holy Communion once a year.

VESTRY AFFAIRS.—At a Meeting of Catholics held at the Cathedral House, on Monday last, His Grace the Archbishop presiding, CHEVALIER W. R. LACKERSTEEN and Mr. L. COOPER, were elected Wardens of the Cathedral for the ensuing two years. His Grace warmly and deservedly commended the services of the out-going Wardens, when the following Resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved,—That a vote of thanks be proposed by the Catholic Community to the out-going wardens, Count Lackersteeen and Mr. David John, for the zeal and perseverance with which they labored for the cause of Religion, and for the interests of the Vestry.

BENGAL VICARIATE.—During the last week, a young man, a Native of England, and a Protestant of the Established Church, applied to be received into the Catholic Communion.

THE MADRAS EXAMINER.

Our last issue will have informed our readers of a contemplated change in the form of the Examiner—a change we incline to the opinion they will approve—it is a change which has, we are free to say, for some time past been urged upon our notice by those who we have reason to know are our friends and well wishers; and, acting upon such opinion and advice, we appear before the public in a new dress at the commencement of the new year, and indulge a hope our new appearance will not only be pronounced an improvement, but will give satisfaction to our readers.—Whilst, therefore, we return thanks for the support which the Examiner has received from the liberal portion of the Community, we beg to assure them that no attention or pains will be spared to render the paper every way worthy of the continuation of that support.

We have always considered the press as the organ of the public voice, through which all men had a right to be heard, and through which oppression was to be resisted. In every country where the press is free, the people are generally free, but where the press is enslaved, there shall be found every kind of injustice, fraud and oppression.

Nearly nine years have elapsed since the press of India was freed by Sir Charles Metcalfe from an iniquitous censorship; and since that time it has not been altogether idle in correcting many abuses; the community have, it must be admitted, been benefitted considerably by the advocacy of the press; many jobs which would have been otherwise perpetrated have been abandoned, and many, very many acts of extortion and oppression have been brought to light; in all these the Examiner had no inconsiderable share. We assert also with confidence, that we have always used the power intrusted to us for the public good, and in doing that which we considered to be our duty, we never bowed down before the arm of power or hesitated to expose, as it deserved, a grievance because the perpetrator was in high station; our motto always was and always will be Civil and Religious Liberty; and in advocating our principles, although we may suffer for a time from the prejudice and bigotry of narrow minds, we feel assured we must eventually triumph. Our columns have been open alike to all classes, Native, European and East Indian, Protestant, Catholic and Heathen,—we have never enquired what was the creed or color of the party applying to us, it was sufficient for us to know that he was aggrieved to secure our co-operation in seeking redress.

In carrying out our principles we are sorry to be obliged to declare, that we have not met with that co-operation which we felt entitled to expect from a liberal and enlightened public. Bigotry opposed us, and we must say that those who should have stood by us in defence of a persecuted and calumniated class, comprising a large portion of our fellow subjects, deserted us and refused to support us at the suggestion of a few men, who could see nothing good but what they themselves did.

When the entire press of Madras, without a single exception, published calumnies the most absurd and odious against the Catholic Clergy and their religion, when every kind of misrepresentation was resorted to, to render them contemptible in the eyes of the community, and when none of those Journals which inserted the calumnies would insert a refutation, the Examiner had the AUDACITY to open its columns; need we say, that that creeping reptile, bigotry, went about and succeeded in poisoning the minds of many against us. From that day to this, although the Madras press has become much more liberal, and although some of our Contemporaries have gone so far as to recommend that the Ecclesiastical titles of the Catholic Clergy should be acknowledged by the State, yet the ultra sanctified portion of the community could never forgive us our trespasses against calumny and slander.

Let this be the case still if they wish, we will not express contrition for our offence; we have assisted the oppressed and calumniated, and if the same state of things should exist again tomorrow, we would act in the very same manner; let bigotry do her worst. We advocate liberty both civil and religious, and altho' bigotry and slavery may have had the ascendancy heretofore, their reign is nearly at an end, and must soon disappear before the spirit of freedom which is now conquering the nations of the earth.

With these few observations, and an assurance that we will spare no pains or expense to render the Madras Examiner in its new form deserving of public patronage, we will bring this article to a close, availing ourselves of the opportunity of wishing our readers the compliments of the season, and that the Year just entered upon may be to them throughout free from those evils and vicissitudes of life which cause pain and sorrow.

ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

The fifth anniversary of the establishment in Ireland of the Association for the Propagation of the Faith was celebrated on Wednesday, Sept. 20, at the Metropolitan Cathedral, Marlborough-street, with all the magnificence and pomp that so glorious and important an event demanded. The ceremonies commenced at eleven o'clock with a grand pontifical High Mass, at which his Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, our revered and venerable archbishop, presided. The Rev. Dr. Laphen officiated as high priest, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Pope as deacon, and the Rev. Mr. Fay as sub-deacon. His Grace the Archbishop was attended by the Venerable Archdeacon Hamilton, and was provided with a splendid throne placed on the gospel side of the altar, and covered with a rich canopy of crimson velvet. After the first gospel the distinguished preacher and divine, the Rev. Dr. Miley, whose powerful advocacy has been so often employed for the same glorious cause on former anniversaries, ascended the pulpit and delivered a most impressive and eloquent discourse, at the conclusion of which his grace pronounced the usual indulgence of forty days in favour of the supporters of the association. The remainder of the high mass was then proceeded with, after which the archbishop gave the solemn benediction of the most holy sacrament.

The congregation was most numerous and fashionable, and the attendance of clergymen was unusually large, comprising nearly all the clergy of the Archdiocese, besides many rev. Gentlemen from other parts of Ireland. Among them we perceived the Right Rev. Dr. M'Nally, the new coadjutor bishop of Clogher, Very Rev. Dean Meyer, V. G., Very Rev. Dr. Yore, Very Rev. Dr. O'Connell, St. Michael and John's; Very Rev. Charles Stewart, O. S. A.; Very Rev. J. Spratt, S.T.M.; Very Rev. J. Bracker, S. J., Rev. Dr. O'Reilly, late of Paris; Rev. Dr. Doyle, Archdeacon of Glendalough; Rev. Mr. Keogh, Saint Michael and John's; Rev. P. Farrell, Saint Michael and John's; Rev. Mr. Farrington, Francis-street; Rev. Mr. Farrell, Francis-street; Rev. Richard Henry, Convent Chapel, P. P., North William-street; Rev. Mr. Maher, Church of the Conception; Rev. Mr. Hand, Irish College, Drumcondra; Rev. Mr. Woodlock, Irish College, Drumcondra; Rev. J. Murphy, St. Mary's Adelaide road; Rev. Mr. Young, Gardiner-street; Rev. Mr. Curtis, Gardiner-street; Rev. Mr. Sweeney, Church street; Rev. Mr. Surley; Rev. Mr. Rooney, Westland-row; Rev. Mr. Powell, Dalkey; Rev. Mr. Carroll, Phibsborough; Rev. Mr. Bannan; Rev. Mr. M'Cann, Castleknock; Rev. Wm. Stafford, P.P.; Rev. P. Smyth, P.P.; Rev. Dr. Quinn, Rev. Mr. Farrelly, C. C.; Rev. Denis Murphy; Rev. Mathew Keogh; Rev. John Ferrall; Rev. C. M. M'Cann; Rev. James M'Mahon; Rev. C. O'Connell, C.C.; Rev. C. Aylmer; Rev. J. M'Hugh, C.C.; Rev. John White, P. P.; Rev. M. B. Kelly, C. C.; Rev. Thos. Cassidy, C. C.; Rev. J. P. Hanley, O. S. F.; Rev. R. A. White, O. S. D.; Rev. J. Curtis, S. J.; Rev. Mr. M'Kennan, P. P., Maynooth.

The Mass performed was Haydn's Mass, No.

4; and the choir, which was under the direction of Mr. Haydn Corri, was most efficient.

THE SERMON.

"Viri Galilæi quare statis hic aspicientes in cælum?—Hic Jesus qui assumptus est a vobis sic venit quemadmodum vidistis eum euntem in cælum."—Acts of the Apostles, ch. i., v. 11.

"Viri Galilæi quare statis hic aspicientes in cælum?"—"Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye here, looking up to heaven?" What, beloved brethren, can the meaning of this language be? It sounds, at least, like the language of reproof—"Why stand ye here looking up to heaven?"—"Why!"—How was it possible for an instant to mistake the motive of the Apostles, and surely it was not of such a nature as that the celestial messengers should reprehend it? Their eyes had followed the divine form of their Saviour in ascending from Mount Olivet—what wonder if they remained rivetted with unutterable sorrow and ecstasy upon that region of the firmament where they had lost sight of him; or, rather, ought not the wonder to have been, that ever again they should bend their vision downwards upon that dark and sin-stained earth from which their divine Lord and Saviour had departed? Surely it cannot be to inculcate black ingratitude, or to counsel oblivion or indifference towards such a benefactor, that these celestial messengers in snowy garments have descended?

Heaven guard us from a thought so impious! No, brethren, no; but these "viri Galilæi"—these poor, unlettered, timorous Galileans, mostly fishermen of the villages and towns around the lake Genesareth—had been just then invested with the apostleship, that is to say—great Heaven! what a charge for instruments so miserable!—they had just a moment previously been commissioned to carry out and perfect the grand scheme of redemption, which required as its initiative principle nothing less than the humiliation and death of an incarnate God! The responsibility of applying to a fallen world the merits and the atonement of Jesus Christ had now devolved upon this poor, ignorant, imbecile, lowly-born group of Galilean fishermen; and is it to be wondered at that angels should have been despatched from Heaven to rouse and startle them into some conception of their responsibilities, by warning them, as if in the language of reprehension, that for them there was thenceforth to be no repose even though it were in the most rapturous flights of contemplation—upon whom had now devolved the charge of redeeming the whole human race to Christ by their activity. "This same Jesus, who has been even now assumed before your eyes into Heaven," say the angels, "know ye not that he shall come, return again in great power and majesty to demand at your hands the kingdom and the people he has purchased with his blood? Why, why then, stand ye here?" "Hic Jesus qui assumptus est a vobis sic venient quemadmodum vidistis eum euntem in cælum."—As yet the whole world is usurped and trampled on by Satan: Why stand ye here? The light of Heaven is to be poured in upon the foul mysteries of Egypt; the intellectual arrogance of Greece is to be humbled; the sophistry of the porch and the academy given to the winds; the colossal empire of the Caesars ground and concentered by political idolatry as if into one iron mass, is to be shattered to fragments, and the empire of the ex-sister to be erected upon its ruins;—while by your labours the face of the earth is to be thus changed.—Why stand ye here, looking up to Heaven? While the ransomed of Calvary are still in fetters, languishing in darkness and the shade of death, why stand ye here? By your voice they are to be aroused from the stupor of perdition in which they have been sunk for ages; they are to be sterged from the ordure of their crimes, the cicatrices and the sores of their iniquities are not only to be cured, but to be effaced; from the likeness of the old Adam they are to be transformed into the likeness of the new—“created according to the justice and sanctity of truth.” Under your auspices the most degraded serfs of Lucifer and of the passions are to be put on Jesus Christ, to walk in the newness of life; their conversation is to be in heaven, in despite of the world, the flesh, and the devil—and by all these banded together, you shall be resisted and warred against with unrelenting vehemence; you are to beat down every altitude that lifts itself against the folly and the opprobrium of the cross, to bring every understanding into obedience to Him, who is to the Jew a scandal, and to the Greek a laughing-stock. Out of its offal, and the most fetid dregs of humanity, you have to prepare, for the Lord of Glory and Sanctity an “acceptable people,” emulous of good works, knit together and made one, by faith, hope, and charity, even as the human frame is one; to free them from every blemish, array them in every perfection, so that they may be fit to meet the inspection and call forth the encomiums of the eternal King of Glory, when he shall come, as he shall speedily, to judge justices, to scrutinize Jerusalem with lighted torches, and to demand an account of the treasures of redemption now confided in their plenitude to your hands. With a task like this before you—invested with such responsibilities, ye men of Galilee, why stand ye looking up to heaven?

That this, my brethren, is the import of the text cannot be questioned. It is of faith, that no creature, no matter how pre-eminently excellent—not the brightest seraph before the eternal throne—that no being, in short but God made man, could pay the ransom of sin, or provide the means of sanctifying our fallen race; but it is equally of faith that the immediate application of these means were left totally depending upon “the weak things of this world and the contemptible things, as it were, that are not”—to the end, as St. Paul assures us, that the wisdom and the power of God may shine forth as brilliantly in the application of these means, as his mercy did in the acquiring of them. These efforts, of whatever is most despised of men, it is, that constitute the action of the church militant—that is, of the society that has sprung from the labours of the Apostles, and became the inheritors of their privileges and responsibilities. The accomplishment of the Apostolical commission—“thy kingdom come”—is the never-ceasing cry of desire that ascends from the chaste spouse of the Redeemer; and it is in grateful acknowledgment to the Most High, for having admitted us to participate in one—and that not the least illustrious—of those efforts in which the zeal of Christendom has not failed, under the auspices of the successors of Peter, to manifest itself from age to age, that we, my brethren, have been called together round these hallowed altars. Your grace has appointed this day for the celebration of the fifth anniversary of the introduction into Ireland of the Association for the Propagation of the Faith. At its solemnization we are now assembled to assist. The occasion irresistibly impels us to consider how it fares with the cross and its feeble champions all over the world. And oh, ye mighty spirits—ye confessors, martyrs, and apostles, who, though like us, surrounded with infirmity, did yet achieve such wonders for the faith, how is it possible for us to contemplate the state of abandonment in which the cause of Jesus, as contrasted with the cause of sin and error, finds itself in this our day, without being at once overwhelmed with shame, grief, and consternation—without being incited, henceforth and for ever, to strive that such an awful majority of the millions for whom the Saviour died be no longer, through the sloth and recreancy of his servants, estranged from the only path—narrow and difficult—that leadeth to eternal life?”

In that land, once the darling object of the zeal that inflamed St. Gregory the Great—the field where Austin and his apostolical companions laboured—where the venerable Bede devoted himself to study, for sanctification not only of his own age, but of posterity—where Anselm suffered and A Becket shed his blood—in England, once the garden of the church—how millions are now arrayed in virulent and indefatigable hostility against her? In Scotland, in the Low Countries, in Germany, in Prussia, in the cantons of Switzerland, and the countries of the north, what myriads are in revolt against that church, to which their ancestors were indebted for the first rudiments of civilization, as well as for their Christianity? And if as a set off against the fifty-two millions thus torn away, and held obstinately in schism from Christian unity, there be pointed to the vast regions of the new world, discovered and evangelized as if to compensate religion for her losses in the 16th century, where let me ask, will be the compensation for the million and half of Jews, the forty-two millions of Greek schismatics, the eight million Mahomedans who occupy the entire east of Europe? making in all, even upon the soil of ancient Christendom itself, not less than one hundred and four millions and a half to be still converted!

But a state of things more exhilarating will no doubt present itself, when crossing the Hellespont, we enter those regions of all others the most favoured—there was the cradle of the human family, the home of the chosen people, and the theatre of those wonders that signalized their history. Upon their surface are still visible the foot prints of the “Word made flesh.” There He sojourned in obscurity, entered into the most intimate and sympathetic intercourse with our fallen kind—there He preached the gospel to the poor, and in the character of a heavenly physician went round the land curing every infirmity, pouring consolation into the wounded heart, and shedding heavenly light and benediction around him on every side. His cradle is there—there the tomb of His resurrection—there, too, the hill of Calvary upon which He purchased the seed of Adam by the shedding of his blood. In falling too for the first time upon that land, the fire of the Holy Ghost spread itself like an irresistible conflagration, devouring sin and ignorance, and changing every thing it touched into light and sanctity. It was there the apostles had their earliest and most decisive triumphs, and were followed by disciples the most gifted in the career of preaching. Rising in those countries the eternal sun of justice shed the rays of redemption from thence over all the rest of the benighted earth. Even in the days of St. Jerome the west of Asia is described as a very Eden of Christianity—the centre of attraction for whatever was most eminent for fervour and perfection in the rest of Christendom. He describes the faithful as crowding thither in multitudes—not only from Gaul but from Britain, considered at that time to be separated from the whole world; from Pontus, Armenia, Persia, Ethiopia, and even the distant India. He describes them as flocking in swarms to the holy places from Cappadocia, Mesopotamia, as well as from Cœle-Syria, Egypt, and the entire East. “Quecumque in Gallia fuerit primus, huc properat. Divisus ab orbe nostro Britannus, si in religione, processerit, occiduo sole dimisso, quærit locum fama sibi tantum et Scripturarum relatione cognitum. Quid referamus Armenios, quid Persas, quid Indiæ et Ethiopiæ populos: ipsamque juxta Agyptum fertilem monachorum Pontum et Cappadociam, Syriam Cœlen et Mesopotamiam cunctaque orientis examina.” He celebrates the concord with which so many nations, differing in customs and in dialects, were united in hymning the Divine praises. He says, that if you walked forth into the fields you were startled to find that Halleluiah was the burden of the ploughman’s song—that the reaper and the dresser of the vine beguiled their labours, or the intervals of relaxation with hymns and psalmody. Even the most inhospitable deserts seem to bloom with the piety of countless hermits. But, alas! how many emphatic evidences impress the pilgrim in our days with the conviction that the curse of Islamism has passed over this favoured portion of the vineyard of the Lord and spared scarcely a vestige of its ancient beauty. Even Mount Calvary and the Holy Sepulchre are insulted by Turkish infidels—the Grotto of the Nativity is in their hands. Nor is it without bitter scoffs and sacrifices that religion can win a license to pour out the anguish of her heart in silence beside these and the other holy places. But in proportion as truth and sanctity have been blasted, the remnants of idolatry seem to flourish amongst the Druse population, and all that was most impure in the Gnostic heresies—in the errors planted by Nestorius and Eutiches, seem to grow more rank amongst the ruins of Christian civilization; and to flourish as if in congenial soil. Such is the condition of Western Asia at the present day. On the other side of the Uralian mountains and the Indus, Paganism reigns with all the fatal variety of its doctrines and observances. The wretched tribes that wander on the shores of the frozen ocean prostrate themselves before their gross fetishes. The Mongul hordes carry the symbolical idols of Buddha in procession, and are involved in a profound complicated system of superstition. How innumerable are the populations held by the Brahmin under the twofold delusion of a learned mythology and an infatuating worship. In the wilds of Tartary, and throughout the cities of India, the Alcoran counts its disciples by myriads. In fine, if in the north and south of those regions two European powers have extended their dominions, it is still error that is propagated by the military and commercial enterprises of Russia and England. But still the moral darkness becomes more profound as we penetrate into the mysterious East, from which light seems to emanate. In the missions of the Levant religion may be somewhat cheered by meeting even with her erring sisters in the Christian sects, which overspread the country, or with Mussulman infidelity, which notwithstanding its errors, is still connected with Christianity by some reminiscence. In Russian Asia and Hindoostan, idolatry finds itself opposed and kept in check by the presence of its foreign masters; but it domineers, without control, over the immense regions which extend from the foot of the Himalayan mountains to the shores of the Pacific. There does it find its most complete social manifestation in the morals and laws of three immense empires, Anam, China, and Japan. There is realized in all its horrors that slavery of Satan which weighed upon Pagan antiquity, and of which we, in modern times, can form no idea. For three centuries the spirit of Nero and Dioclesian seems to have been revived in those regions, for the trial of Christ’s servants. The funeral piles of Japan are no sooner extinguished, than the scaffolds of Corea and Tong King succeed them. The vast islands of the South Sea are peopled, it is conjectured, by about twenty millions, exhibiting all the intellectual shades of the human race, from the ingenious polished, and sometimes heroic Malay, to the hideous natives of Australia, and the cannibals of New Guinea. They also present all the varieties that error and superstition can exhibit. Mahomedanism, Brahmanism, and the worship of Buddha, in the Sunda Islands—idolatry reduced to a system of dogmas in Polynesia—a gross fetishism in New Guinea, and a vague adoration of evil spirits amongst the brutalised tribes of Van Dieman’s Land and the other lesser islands. In returning towards another immense continent to the south we can hardly feel but that we are approaching a land of malediction. The population of Africa is computed at 70,000,000, and of these 69,812,000 are still aliens to the Church of Christ.

God forbid that I should insinuate that the Cross is retrograding everywhere—nay, that it is not advancing, though by stint, slowly with difficulty, and at the most bitter cost of everything that is dearest to flesh and blood. Dispersed over the entire surface of the globe, 4000 priests, under the leadership of one hundred and fifty bishops, are beheld in every region and diversity of climate, enduring every extremity of hardship and danger. "In journeys often; in perils of rivers, in perils of robbers, in perils from their fellow-Christians, in perils from the Gentiles, in perils in the cities, in perils of the wilderness, in perils of the sea, in perils from false brethren, in labour, in anguish, in frequent vigils, in hunger and thirst, in many fastings, in cold and nakedness"—still emulating their sainted predecessors in the trying but blessed service of the Crucified. Thus even in this land of Africa, upon which the curse of the Patriarch seems to have weighed so heavily for 4000 years, we find one of our own countrymen, the Right Rev. Dr. Griffith with his feeble, but devoted little band sustaining the cause of Christ upon this most distant frontier. Another of our countrymen, the Right Reverend Doctor Barron, with a devoted company of twelve priests, is on his way to take possession of those pestilential regions that extend along the western coast, there to suffer privations, to encounter difficulties and annoyances to which nothing could reconcile our nature but the consolation of sharing in the sufferings of our Redeemer, and the certainty of enjoying Him in Paradise. On the opposite coasts some promise is held out by the populations of Abyssinia and Egypt of again returning to the unity of faith. Even in Tunis, Christ numbers 6000 souls, and along the coasts of the Mediterranean, the country of Cyprian and Augustine, is again visited by the blessings of which it was so long deprived. The most benign and heavenly institutions of the gospel are beginning to take root upon a soil abandoned to the fanaticism of the Koran for as many ages. Eight churches and seven chapels, a preparatory ecclesiastical college, an orphan asylum for each sex, three boy's schools, an infant asylum, a charity board, an hospital for the natives have been already established. Sisters of Charity, these heroines of religion, not only visit the houses of the Moors and Mahomedans in their illness, but even penetrate into the camps of the Bedouins, to carry with the succours of medicine the balm of the divine word. But to retrace our steps. How calculated to fill the Christian heart with joy and wonder even to overflowing are the triumphs of religion that are daily taking place in the islands of the Pacific. In the Sandwich Islands, from which the Catholic missionaries were so recently expelled by persecuting bigotry, they number already no less than 6,000 converts. The last number of the Annals gives details of the proficiency made by these Neophytes not only in the Christian doctrine but in secular education that fill us with delight and surprise. In Wallis, the most savage of the Marquesas Islands, the shores of which were desolated even by the most daring mariners, and where the only variation of life consisted in passing from the horrors of savage warfare to the devouring of the captives by the conquerors, the entire population has not only been suddenly converted, but apparently transformed by the sacrament of regeneration into other beings. They had recently murdered in the most cruel manner one of the missionaries—a Father Chaball—who had long laboured and supplicated, apparently in vain, for their conversion; and scarcely has the martyr's blood been shed when the whole island becomes horror-struck at the crime, and by an impulse, evidently descending from heaven, embrace the faith. The last number of the Annals, gives the most delightful particulars; describes them as vying with each other in fervour to approach the sacraments; and atone, by every Christian virtue, for their past crimes and atrocities. Similar wonders have long since taken place in many of the other islands which now arise amidst the desert of the ocean as so many smiling oases upon which religion delights to rest. A new diocese has been just founded in Van Dieman's Land to which one of our countrymen, the Right Rev. Dr. Murphy, has been appointed, and Sydney has been raised to the dignity of an archiepiscopal see with two suffragans, in order to meet the calls of a rapidly increasing population of 50,000 Catholics. In the Philippine islands are no less than 3,000,000 already advanced in civilization, and distributed through 509 parishes in the archdiocese of Manila and its suffragan sees: so that the entire of Oceanica, including the Portuguese islands of Timor, Flores, and Sabroa, contains little less than three millions and a half of Catholics.

We now cross the boundaries of those regions into which the missionary cannot penetrate but at the risk of life.

In the vicariate apostolic of Corea, Christ numbers 7,000 faithful to his cross in spite of persecution; in the vicariate apostolic of Su-Tehan, 52,000; in the vicariate apostolic of Fou-Kien, 40,000; in the vicariate apostolic of Chau-Si, and vicariate apostolic of How-Quang, 60,000; 9,000 in the vicariate apostolic of Tehe-Kiang and Kiang-Li; in the vicariate apostolic of Pegu and Ava, 3,000; of Siam, 5,000; of Cochinchina, 80,000; of Western Tong-King, 180,000; of Eastern Tong-King, 160,000; diocese of Macao 52,000; diocese of Nang-King, 40,000 Catholics.

Russia in Asia—140 priests; 20,000 Catholics.

Thibet—One bishop, one coadjutor, 13 priests; 8,000 Catholics.

Bengal—One archbishop, Dr. Carew; one coadjutor, Dr. Olliffe; 13 priests; * 20,000 Catholics.

Bombay—One bishop, one coadjutor, Dr. Whelan; 37 priests; 40,000 Catholics.

Madras—One bishop, 15 priests; 100,000 Catholics.

Pondicherry—One bishop, 38 priests; 230,000 Catholics.

Ceylon—One bishop, 100 priests; 200,000 Catholics.

Malabar—One bishop, 1 coadjutor, 338 priests; 182,000 Catholics.

Scattered over the vast countries from the Indies to the Mediterranean are—18 archbishops, 29 bishops, 1,667 priests; 659,200 Catholics.

In Turkey in Europe and Greece—8 archbishops, 12 bishops, 579 priests, and 387,000 Catholics.

The last accounts from the remote regions of Tartary to the north of China are very cheering. The disciples of St. Vincent de Paul have already succeeded in converting some of the most distinguished of the Llamas, or Tartar priests.

* We have seventeen not thirteen Priests in the Bengal Vicariate, and expect soon, at least three others, besides the Bishop. As far as we can judge the Catholics of Bengal amount to about forty thousand and not twenty thousand.—Ed. B. C. H.

who are now preparing to preach the gospel to their countrymen. Like our own outcast countrymen in the Savannahs and back settlements of America, the exiles of injured Poland are spreading the light of Catholicity even through the cheerless deserts of Siberia. "The communions of the East begin to understand that neither order nor happiness are possible, out of the way which the redemption has opened to man. By detaching themselves from the universal church they have drunk to the dregs of the cup of humiliations and misfortunes; but the rigour of the expiation seems to have disarmed at last the divine justice. They have received the grace of feeling their misery, and some of them seek, and already know the means of removing it. The hardness of the heretic chiefs, who have grown old in idleness and corruption, is the obstacle that still restrains the masses; but it will give way before the efforts of the pious league formed for their salvation." The graces of the divine ministry, so long and terribly abused by infatuated Spain, are now administered by the exile clergy of that country for the consolation of the tribes of South America and Mexico. Need I advert to the auspicious change that has already taken place in the religious disquisitions of almost all the Protestant countries of Europe, but more especially in Germany and Great Britain. Thus to whatever side we turn we are inspired with cheering anticipations of the future. We are consoled at the fervour that even in these degenerate days can sustain not only the priesthood in their apostolic labours through so many inhospitable climes, but has enabled the weakness and delicacy of the female sex to make the most trying sacrifices, and venture with cheerfulness across oceans, and deserts, to co-operate in the holy enterprise of extending the reign of Christ and teaching his abandoned little ones to glow with the charity of his sacred heart—to see the empire of Peter extending itself until it has become commensurate with the globe—a uniting again and by the most hallowed sympathies and convictions, the long separated tribes of mankind as if in one common family: to behold it, while unchanged in one ope or iota of its creed or its morality after the lapse of eighteen centuries, still adapting itself to every diversity of climate, character, and institution—when apparently overthrown erecting itself for new triumphs. These and the similar reflections that crowd upon us in surveying the aspect of Catholicity are eminently calculated to confirm our faith and edify our piety. But, nevertheless, the overwhelming thought will force itself upon the heart—how insignificant the ratio of those already aggregated in the "one fold," compared to those who are still lost in the "way of error?" Out of the eight hundred millions of human beings on the earth, nearly four-fifths—that is six hundred and forty-eight millions—still, in the year of Christ 1843, remain to be converted! Great heavens! have the Apostles neglected their commission? Let their life blood, poured out in testimony of their zeal, and in the service of their master, answer. If further evidence be asked for, consider the journeyings by sea and land, the suffering, the fatigues, the soul devouring solicitude of St. Paul, and be it remembered, that, in recording the wonderful labours, the burning love, and devotedness of this Apostle, the Holy Ghost wished it to be concluded that things equally astonishing were done, and suffered by all the rest; for all were actuated by the same spirit, and were incited by an equal vehemence of charity to spend themselves, and be spent for Jesus Christ. But perhaps their labours were abortive, and that their success did not correspond with their anxieties? Did not these poor feeble men of Galilee affect a revolution in ideas, in convictions, in morality, the like of which the boldest sages of Rome and Athens never dreamt of? They carried the conquests of the cross into regions not only beyond the frontiers of the Cæsars, but beyond the knowledge of antiquity. These poor fishermen have won by their successes such deathless renown that their names not only are inscribed in history, but are lisped by childhood, and invoked with veneration by the unlettered all over the wide earth. Look at the mausoleum of one of them—their prince; the fragments of column and trophy that are scattered round it bear witness that he seized the main prop of Satan's empire, and shook it to the earth; not to perish, like Sampson, amid the ruins, but upon them to erect a throne that shall perish only with the world. No, if Holy Writ were blotted out, the documents of history consigned to oblivion, the monuments of success which the apostles left after them would suffice us of the divinity of him who sent them. Nor has the divine fire that circulated in their veins ever ceased to impart its impulse to those who from age to age succeeded to their privileges and responsibilities. The conversion of the barbarians who overthrew the ancient order of civilization chiefly by the disciples of Saint Benedict, and the Irish monks of Saint Columbanus and Colum Kill; the wonders achieved by the followers of Saint Dominick and Saint Francis from the 12th century, and by those of Saint Ignatius, as well as many others from the 16th; the amazing efficiency of this very society originated in our own days by an obscure and humble female—these manifestations attest that the apostolic vigour has not departed from the church, and that under its influence "the weak things of this world" are still equal to undertakings that appear insane to human prudence. But, my brethren, if in the apathy of the apostles or the failing energies of the spirit who promised to be "all days" and for ever with the church, we seek in vain to account for the awful majority of those who are aliens over those who have been affiliated to the faith, shall we be equally unsuccessful if we seek the solution of this mystery in our own sloth and deficiency of zeal for the Divine honour—in the scandals and disedification of our lives? Can it not be accounted for by our having inverted the order established by Jesus Christ? He said:—"Seek ye, first the kingdom of God and his justice;" but the social arrangement of our times is to seek it last—to postpone the interests of Christ's kingdom to every vile and frivolous consideration—to grudge religion a few crumbs, while we delight to see every brutal appetite pampered to satiety. How can we wonder that the cross is driven in from many an outpost—that its soldiers are every where distressed and fainting, with but feeble and precarious hope of success, when the voluptuary, the profligate, or the egotist, is sure of the applause of Christians, no matter how much he squander upon his passions—and that disciple equally secure of obloquy who expends the talents confided to him in promoting the interests of his master?

But Ireland, at least, you say, must be exempted from this impeachment. Borne down as she is by unparalleled destitution—with a hostile establishment wringing opulence from her vitals and requiting her with slander and persecution—with her resources jammed up, cramped, and kept in torment by bad laws and worse administration—impoverished and afflicted Ireland, while re-building her ruined altars, and providing that education for her own people which, until lately, it was treason to impart, is still so large-hearted and enthusiastic in the cause of her Saviour that amidst all the flourishing and mighty states of Christendom she stands in the third place as a contributor to the Propagation of the Faith. Ireland contributes 7,241*l.* 8*s.* 2½*d.* more than Scotland, 5,769*l.* 14*s.* 3½*d.* more than England, 856*l.* 8*s.* 6½*d.* more than Belgium, 6,813*l.* 18*s.* 7½*d.* more than North and South America together, 4,211*l.* 11*s.* 1½*d.* more than the Two Sicilies, nearly as much as Prussia, Portugal, and the Netherlands combined, 6,365*l.* 12*s.* 6½*d.* more than Germany, and 1,616*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* more than Lucca, Modena, Parma, Switzerland, and Tuscany put together. Her quota for this year, though less than that of 1842, (on account, perhaps, of her contributions to the new missionary college) amounts to the sum of 7,249*l.* 19*s.* 8½*d.* These, you exclaim, are glorious attestations of our country's fidelity and disinterestedness, and God forbid that I should question it. I feel not inclined to extenuate the merits of my native land. From my heart's core I sympathise with her in all her sacrifices and efforts, and in none more ardently than in those she is so nobly making in the cause of Christianity. But these testimonies, I contend, are only correlative after all; and if the other countries which she so far surpasses in zeal be so grievously delinquent, they do not prove that Ireland has done her duty.

But let us not blind ourselves through self-love to the true position of our country. Is there no restitution to be made to heaven for the drunkenness by which we were so long degraded and disgraced? Are not those who, during a long career of excesses, were guilty of robbing Christ of the souls for which he died by their scandalous example, by their oaths and their impurities, now bound to labour zealously—to collect for, to contribute to, and supplicate heaven for the Propagation of the Faith? In return even for the enviable exemptions of our island from so many natural scourges and annoyance—for the large-handed munificence with which fertility and plenty has been scattered over it—are we not bound to increase in zeal and to persevere indefatigably? Above all, does not this appear to be the peculiar destiny of Ireland—to be conspicuous in this grand movement to extend the kingdom of God on earth? I speak not of her efforts for this object in ages past; but I ask if not only the preservation of Catholicity in the north of Europe, but that portentous throbbing towards a return to the unity of the church in the heart of England be not mainly attributable, under heaven, to the invincible constancy with which Ireland clung to and contended for the "faith once delivered to the saints?" It stands upon record, in the Tracts for the Times, that the suppression of the ten Irish sees gave rise to the Oxford movement.—Seeing themselves in peril of being cashiered by the Parliament, they thought it prudent to beat about for a refuge in apostolicity. But, thank heaven, what commenced in narrow and selfish apprehensions for some vile temporalities, is likely, under the master hand of Providence, which can "write straight upon a crooked line," to terminate in the recovery, for a mighty nation, of the long-lost treasure of the faith. Even the very tyranny that has exterminated her children has still helped to forward this great destiny, which has rendered Ireland in so striking a degree auxiliary to the propagation of the faith. The new empire of Catholicity so rapidly springing up in North America and the Pacific, was, we may say, founded by our exiles. And in the prosecution of a destiny so noble, so calculated to draw down upon her even those temporal blessings that shall compensate her even in this world for all the sorrows and opprobrium of the past, is Ireland to languish, become indifferent, or sit down to calculate what she has done, while for the complete triumph of the cross so much remains to be effected? No, I am persuaded that our people, generous, grateful, and devoted to their religion, will never tire or relent in their zeal for this glorious institution, which may well be named the forlorn hope of Christianity. And in urging this point with so much emphasis, I am bound to declare that the support of the new missionary college is not less meritorious; if, indeed, it be proper to draw a distinction between institutions both tending directly to the same object. Let zeal, therefore for the propagation of the faith be no longer monopolized by the poor, or by but comparatively few amongst those not only in competence but superfluous wealth. This zeal must become characteristic of every one who would not be regarded by men and angels as a recreant to the love of Christ.

To you, very reverend and venerable fathers, I shall not venture to address myself but in the language of the Sovereign Pontiff, who says, in his letter to the universal church:—

"Above all, we recommend strongly to you the Society for the Propagation of the Faith.

"This truly great and holy work, which maintains, increases, and strengthens itself by the scanty offerings and prayers of the members—this work which contributes to support the labourers of the Gospel, which exercises the works of charity towards the neophytes, and which delivers the faithful from the fury of persecution, appears to us to be in the highest degree deserving of the love and admiration of all good men.

"And we must not suppose that so great an advantage has been conferred in our days on the church, without a special counsel of divine Providence: while the infernal enemy torments, by every sort of machinations, the cherished spouse of Jesus Christ, nothing could come more seasonably than the assistance of the united efforts of all the faithful who are inflamed by the desire of propagating the Christian faith.

"Accordingly, we, notwithstanding our unworthiness, called to watch over the church, have neglected no opportunity, to testify, after the example of our predecessors, in the clearest manner our affection for this important association, and to excite in its behalf the charity of the faithful. You, then, venerable brothers, who are to share in our solicitude, do you apply yourselves assiduously to give to this work a daily increase among the flocks confided to your care. Sound the trumpet in Sion, and see that those who do not yet belong to this pious society, may, by your admonitions and paternal persuasion, speedily become members, and they who have already joined it may persevere in their resolution."

"Viri Galilei quare statis hic?"—ye men of Galilee, priests of Jesus Christ—ye who have succeeded to the ministry, and the responsibilities of those who first scattered the fire of the Holy Ghost in words that burned, and bore the treasures of Calvary through the nations, why stand we here? or do we not blush at our coldness and inactivity, while our Divine Lord and Master, through our apathy, perhaps, is suffering in protracted agony? How many hundred millions—I dread to mention them—are still as if they had never been redeemed? He is still mocked on Calvary, in Africa, and Hindostan, and throughout so many benighted regions they are scorning and mocking him, and through ignorance deriding him as a fool and spitting in his sacred face. In Japan and China they are trampling on his cross. Conculcated by the crimes and infidelity of such countless myriads, the whole earth is but as one Gethsemane, where he still bleeds in agony. At this spectacle the whole court of heaven is moved. St. Peter and St. Paul, with their glorious colleagues, as if filled with indignation at our apathy, are ready to abrogate their thrones, again to descend on earth, in order to retrieve the cause that goes to ruin, or makes but languid progress in our hands. They burn to forego the bliss of Paradise for the still more ineffable privilege of again suffering in company with their Redeemer, and for the salvation of their brethren. But it is not by spirits of power or by apostles confirmed in glory, but by the weak things and the foolish of this world, that all this is to be effected. Such is the decree of Eternal Wisdom. And shall we, brethren, be dead to gratitude, to the sentiments of heavenly ambition, not entirely to disgrace the office which we bear?—an office above that not only of earthly emperors, but of the brightest seraphs, the most divine privilege that can be conferred—to co-operate in the achievement of redemption with Jesus Christ. Let us, in season, and out of season, recommend it to our people—let us recommend it to the holy martyrs, the apostles, and to the Queen of Angels, in our prayers and sacrifices; let us labour for Christ in this great cause, and spare no pains to act at least as an efficient commissariat to those heroic colleagues who cry out with the fervent apostles—"Let us also go and die with him!" If faithful, we may have to toil and suffer, it is true (if suffering that can be called which is borne for him who so loved us, and in his society), but we shall still be cheered, under all our trials and sacrifices for his sake, by that enchanting promise; "whi ego sum illic et minister meus erit," that is, that whosoever shall abide with Christ in his sorrows, in labouring like a good and faithful servant in the propagation of the faith, shall be associated with Christ in the celestial brilliancy of his triumph, filled to the utmost of infinite capacity with bliss, and crowned, amidst the applause of heaven, with everlasting honor.

"John-street Chapel-house, Sept. 20, 1843.

"VERY REV. DEAR SIR—I have been honoured by the invitation to attend at the ceremony this day, in the Church of the Conception, Marlborough-street; but as it is left to my convenience, I reluctantly avail myself of the permission. I will, however, be there in spirit, and in the warmest feelings of my heart, wishing the holy cause every, the greatest success. It has a strong and a particular claim upon my gratitude, as having experienced some of its happy effects, produced by its liberal contribution to the mission of Madras during my time, of which I shall ever retain a grateful remembrance. Since my return to Ireland I felt that I ought to unite with the faithful in carrying forward the noble work, and that from the commencement; and I beg now respectfully to request the committee's acceptance of the accompanying five pounds, as my contribution for the five years past.

"I have the honour to be, Very Rev. dear Sir, your obedient humble servant.

MISCELLANEA.

IF TRUE.—A correspondent sends us the following statement, which we publish, more for the sake of having it contradicted if untrue, than for holding it up to indignant censure if true. These are times when every movement of our ecclesiastical guides should be narrowly watched; every gentle approximation towards indifference to Popish assumption instantly counteracted by the wholesome power of public opinion:—"Recent English travellers in Italy relate that the Hon. Thomas Plunket, Bishop of Tuam, Ardagh, Killala, &c., attended high mass, at St. Peter's, at Rome, on Easter Sunday; and it is likewise reported that his lordship had an interview with the Pope, who addressed him in words to this effect:—'I thank you, my lord, for the kindness you have at all times shown to my Irish subjects.' It were as well, perhaps, that a bishop, and especially an Irish bishop, should not absent himself from his diocesan duties and travel for his pleasure in foreign countries at a moment like this; but to attend high mass at Rome, and to desert the Protestant service of Easter Sunday as it is well performed there by an English clergyman, is a matter that has surprised the Italians, and grieved the English. If the words ascribed to the Pope be true, and he claimed Victoria's subjects as his own, surely it becomes us to ask whether the reply was such as it ought to have been. Did the bishop tell his Holiness that no 'Italian priest shall tithe or toll in our dominions?' Did he deny, as he ought to have done, the Pope's usurped authority?"—John Bull.

THE REV. FATHER LARKIN.—This distinguished Jesuit, so graphically described by the editor of the Louisville Advertiser in the extract from that journal inserted in last week's TABLET, is a native of Newcastle, and is now in his forty-first year; the earlier part of his years was spent in St. Cuthbert's College, at Ushaw, near Durham, where he gave strong indications of that eminence to which he has since attained. While in this district, his agreeable demeanour, and deep and unaffected piety, earned for him amongst the clergy, as well as the laity, very general respect and esteem. This bold and learned Jesuit, during the period of Mr. Poulett Thompson's administration in Canada, was frequently pressed by the Governor to remain at the head of the seminary at Montreal. At the same time he declined episcopal honours and dignity by refusing the bishopric of Canada. The eminent merits and the profound erudition of this noble soldier of Christ were acknowledged on repeated occasions, both by Lord Durham and the Hon. Mr. Thompson during their governorships in North America. Though alive to the wrongs of the French Canadians, Holy Father John never forgot that he was an Englishman, and honoured his own father-land. The Rev. gentleman has chosen to forego that eminence in the Church his ability would have commanded, and voluntarily joined the ranks of the poor Jesuits; preferring to preach in the forest sanctuaries of America, under the branches of the oak, to that of the magnificent cathedral of Montreal. Money to him has no allurements, nor honours of any kind save that of salvation of souls. Father Larkin, is brother to the talented Mr. Charles Larkin, of Newcastle, who took so conspicuous a part in the public meetings there during the agitation of the Reform Bill; one of whose speeches the late Mr. Cobbett humorously alluded to, by stating that "when the Marquis of Londonderry read Mr. Larkin's speech to the House of Peers, its bold and eloquent sentiments turned the noble marquis as black as the best Hetton's Walls End."—The Tablet, Oct. 7.

LAMENT FOR THE CHURCH.—The Rev. J. Campbell and the Rev. J. W. Richardson, of Tottenham Court Chapel, have been preaching a series of sermons on Puseyism and Popery, and they are desirous of making the most of it. They have therefore issued the following announcement:—"The perils of the Protestant Faith are multiplying every hour! Popery, no longer the object of aversion and terror to the Sovereign, in the guise of Puseyism, has pitched its tent besides the British throne! The first statesmen of the age, without a blush, talk, in the Imperial Parliament, of taking the Popish priesthood into the pay of the empire! Popish monasteries, colleges, and cathedrals, are being set up in our midst. The Jesuits are again our masters. Some of the chief organs of the Metropolitan press are passing into the hands of the Romish confessor. Oxford, with a portion of the bishops, and most of the clergy, are all but ready to bow down and kiss the foot of his Holiness the Pope! Englishmen! awake to the salvation of your liberties! Protestants! stand forth in defence of your MOST HOLY FAITH!"—Ibid.

PRAYERS FOR IRELAND.—(From our own Correspondent.)—From recent circumstances, no man can say what the result in Ireland may be. Every man anxious for peace, order, and religion is now offering his prayers to the Almighty for the preservation of peace and for the restoration of justice. Many persons of piety recommend at this most momentous period, the adoption of general prayers, or public supplication to the Almighty, to avert from our country the horrors of civil war and to bestow upon the distressed people of Ireland all the blessings they require. I send you the form of a society suggested by a Catholic, who is most anxious on the subject. He, of course, submits the whole to the consideration and approbation of the proper ecclesiastical authorities.

SOCIETY.—Under the patronage and invocation of the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. Patrick. Objects—To obtain the united prayers of the people of Ireland for, 1st, the blessing of God upon the exertions of those anxious to relieve the distresses of our afflicted country; 2d, to avert the horrors of war; 3d, that a spirit of peace and fraternal charity may be infused into the hearts of all the inhabitants of these realms, to be established with the sanction of the parish priest. Rules—1, That each society shall only exist in one parish, and consist of a committee and members. 2. That they shall meet at—o'clock in the evening in the parish church or society room on the Friday before the second Sunday in each month, to offer up the appointed prayer for the above-mentioned purpose. 3. That on the morning of such Friday the members shall attend at the eight o'clock mass, and it is hoped as many of them as possible shall receive holy communion offered up for the above intentions. 4. That any of the members who are so disposed will also on that day fast, give an alms or do some other good work for the same intention; that such persons who cannot attend at the mass on that Friday will attend for the same purpose at the eight o'clock mass on the ensuing Sunday. That as it is most desirable that these prayers should be offered up throughout the entire kingdom, that each member shall use his utmost efforts to establish a similar society in at least one adjoining parish, and that as speedily as possible. That the committee shall meet on one evening in the month to transact any business connected with the society, and that at such meeting all conversation on political subjects is strictly prohibited, inasmuch as the society is instituted for the pious purposes of prayer and none other. That in parishes in the country parts the second Sunday in the month shall be the day for prayer, instead of Friday.—Ibid, Oct. 14.

In the parish of Iniscarra, fourteen persons were received into the Catholic Church during September.—Cork Reporter. Epenetus Fitzgibbon, Esq., a convert, died there in his 70th year, on the 24th ult.

MANGNALL'S HISTORICAL QUESTIONS.

THE GUNPOWDER PLOT.

In our last we exposed the injustice of which Mangnall is guilty, in attributing to the Catholics of England in general, the contrivance and design of this atrocious plot, and we have pointed out, on Protestant authority, the strong grounds of suspicion which attaches to Cecil, as the contriver or main promoter of this "neat device," and we mean now to confirm still more all that we have advanced by some additional arguments and authorities. Cecil, in order to guide both the king and the plot to his intended ends, deferred giving to the king the anonymous letter until the eve of the day before the winding up of the catastrophe; then it was he addressed to him that fulsome and ridiculous compliment which he afterwards committed to writing as his genuine sentiments concerning him, viz. that "his Majesty was endued with the most admirable gifts of piercing conceit, a solid judgment, accompanied also with a kind of divine Power in judging of the motive and consequence of such advertisements." (a) Such a bait was too well seasoned for James' appetite not to be swallowed by him. Accordingly, at the opening of Parliament, the King declared himself supernaturally assisted in detecting the plot, (b) by interpreting the letter in a different manner from what any other learned man, however competent he might be, would have done. (c) His artful minister, still more to indulge his vanity, and afford him greater matter of subsequent triumph, affected to ridicule the whole business, telling him, "the letter must be written either by a fool or a madman, because of those words in it, the danger is past as soon as you have burnt this letter; for if the danger were so soon past what need of any warning." (d) The king, however, persisted in interpreting the letter, saying there was a mine stored with gunpowder under the Parliament House, and accordingly ordered it to be searched for. Late in the evening on that day, the Chamberlain inspected the Parliament House and the vault under it, and found everything just as he expected, the heap of faggots under which was concealed gunpowder, and Guy Fawkes who had been engaged to set the whole on fire. However, the moment had not yet arrived for disclosing the matter with suitable effect; hence this pretended visit was made for the purpose of looking for some furniture belonging to the king. At length, near the solemn hour of midnight, Sir Thomas Knevet is sent to secure that wretch Guy Fawkes, and uncover the barrels of powder, the news of which would reach the members just at the moment they were preparing to attend. Thus Cecil gained his second point, that of rousing the nation to a degree of consternation and horror proportionable to the supposed nearness of its approach to the brink of destruction, and of making its escape the effect of a particular providence, and absolutely miraculous. Accordingly the people were led to believe that as nothing less than inspiration had enabled the king to interpret Monteagle's letter, so nothing less than a miracle had enabled the ministry to find thirty-six barrels of gunpowder lying on the ground, covered with faggots, a few hours before they were to have been blown up, whereas we have seen they knew of gunpowder being lodged in the vault where it was found, at least for the space of ten days before, and they agreed not to look for it, till the very day of the Parliament's Meeting. This is not the only instance of Protestant villainy which could be brought forward and exposed to public view, witness the conspiracy of the Protestants in the Netherlands to blow up the prince of Parma, governor of those countries, with all the nobility and magistrates belonging to them, at a solemn procession in the city of Antwerp,^(e) and, if the reader has not heard of this, he cannot be ignorant that a Catholic King of Scotland, King Henry Darnley, was actually blown up and destroyed, with all his servants and attendants, by means of a mine stored with gunpowder, and that the Earls of Murray, Morton, Bothwell, Lethington, Sir Archibald Douglas, Sir James Balfour, &c. were the contrivers and perpetrators of this villainy, not without the privity and consent of Lord Burghley, the Earl of Salisbury's father.^(f) The principal difference between this original and too successful gunpowder plot, in Scotland, and the bungling imitation of it in England is, that the Protestants, who devised and executed the former, were the heads and founders of the reformation in that country; whereas the Catholics that were concerned in the latter, were the disgrace and outcasts of their religion.

Another heinous aggravation in the Scotch gunpowder plot, which does not occur in the English one is, that the conspirators, after murdering their king, endeavoured, by every vile artifice of forgery, and perjury, to throw the infamy of that diabolical act upon his widow, and even to get her legally convicted and executed for the guilt of it.

In fact it seems to have been a favourite experiment with Protestants before and after the reign of James the First, to contrive plots and to fasten the guilt of them, on their Catholic fellow-subjects. Witness that in the Reign of Charles 2nd, of which Horne (a most respectable Protestant authority) writes thus, in his introduction to the critical study and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures: "The incoherence and every way incredible circumstances of the whole deposition, together with the infamous characters of the witnesses, preclude assent. Yet, a circumstance to this day unaccounted for—the murder of Sir Edmund Godfrey—happened to give it an air of probability. Yet he would be thought injudicious to the last degree, who should thence be inclined to favour the evidence of Titus Oates." Having exhibited this enlarged and faithful view of the powder plot, we may be permitted to here is the justice of those acrimonious

Sermons and Services, and of those tumultuous rejoicings which have been annually made and directed against Catholics on that account, for almost two hundred years? We are bound to return God thanks for all public blessings, but there are others no less important, and yet more extraordinary, for which no festivals or rejoicings have been instituted, or, if they have been instituted, have fallen into oblivion.^(g) The Catholics, who are looked upon as so very uncharitable, had no festivals to commemorate the discovery of the conspiracies of Amboise and Maux. Those at home do not meet either at Church or elsewhere on the day, when their grand enemy Shaftsbury fell into the disgrace and punishment he had prepared for them. They have long since forgotten that it was on the 8th of June, in the year 1780, when 100,000 Protestant rioters, who were up in arms to exterminate them, were, beyond expectation, and almost beyond hope, suppressed.

CATHOLICS AT BARRACKPORE.

The annexed edifying letter has been addressed to the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic, in behalf of the Catholics at Barrackpore, by the Rev. Mr. Rabascall, the excellent Pastor of Serampore. We understand that some time since a respectful application for a small spot of ground for the erection of a Chapel at Barrackpore was made to the Assistant Quarter Master General, and that even an answer has not been vouchsafed to the Memorial. Every one acquainted with the locality of Barrackpore knows, that out of the several thousand acres over which the cantonment extends, not only one, but one hundred might be granted for any useful purpose, without interfering in the most remote way with any of the military arrangements of the Station. We may also remark, that, as usual, every provision is made there for Protestant service, on the same expensive scale on which English Protestantism is supported everywhere in India. It is true, that the officers stationed at Barrackpore are, for the most part, Protestants, of one denomination or another. But, surely, the souls of the subordinate Military are as precious in the sight of God as those of their superiors, and the ignorance and privations of the poor render attention to their spiritual wants of greater importance, than to those of persons who enjoy the benefits of education and are exempt from the hardships and temptations to which the humbler classes of the Military are constantly exposed. From the subjoined letter it appears that there are forty-eight Catholics at Barrackpore, exclusive of the Catholic Commissioned Officers, who are occasionally stationed there. At present, we believe, there is but one such Gentleman there, but very lately there were three. We trust that Government will, at length, discharge its duty towards the Barrackpore Catholic Congregation, and provide for the decent performance of public worship by the erection of a suitable Chapel there, and the appointment of a Priest to the care of it. Even in a human point of view, experience shows, that sound policy dictates the adoption of such a course, as equally conducive to the temporal and moral welfare of the Community.

(g) The 5th of August was appointed a day of thanksgiving for James's deliverance from the Gowry conspiracy, on which occasion, if we believe the king himself, he was in much greater danger of being assassinated by the Protestant earl of that name and his brother, and afterwards of being blown up with all his attendants by another Protestant gunpowder plot on the part of the burghers of Perth, than ever he was from that concerted five years afterwards by Catesby and his associates. See Collier's Ch. Hist. vol. 3rd, pp. 663, 664.

*To His Grace the Archbishop

MY LORD ARCHBISHOP,

I yesterday crossed over the river to Barrackpore, where I met a congregation of above twenty persons. I celebrated the Divine mysteries in Mr. O'Brien's house, and those present assisted at the solemnity in a very edifying manner. I also administered the Holy Communion to one person, who having been married by a Protestant Clergyman desires now to have that solemnity performed according to the rites of the Catholic Church.

I understand that there are several Catholics residing at Barrackpore who were not present on this occasion, either through sickness, or, perhaps, because they were not aware that I was to officiate there on that day. According to the return given me by an inhabitant, the total number of Catholics at Barrackpore is forty-eight. Some of these poor people are anxious to receive conditionally the Sacrament of Baptism, as they originally were baptized by some Sectarian Ministers, and have doubts as to the validity of the rite they received, on account of the ignorance, inattention, or other such defects of these Clergymen.

So numerous a congregation of Catholics truly deserves the paternal consideration of your Grace; a little Chapel there would be a great desideratum, as they cannot pass over the river every Sunday to Serampore. For my part, I would not hesitate a moment to renew our petition to Government, to provide us with a suitable place of worship there.

If your Grace thinks that the publication of this letter in the Catholic Herald, will produce any useful effect among our Brethren in Bengal, I will beg of you to send it to that Journal.

I have the honor to be, my Lord Archbishop, with profound respect,

Your Grace's

Most obedient Servant,

B. RABASCALL

ST. JOSEPH'S ORPHANAGE,

ADJOINING TO ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

The Archbishop Vicar Apostolic is, we understand, making arrangements to transfer to the above named Institution the orphans who have attained a sufficient age to enable them to apply themselves to learn some useful trade. A kind and constant benefactor to the orphans, having suggested that such of them as might not be robust enough for the ordinary trades, might with advantage be taught Music, and to assist in accomplishing this object, the same worthy individual presented for their use, when required, and on other occasions for the College Chapel, a valuable and beautifully toned Piano Forte.

CONVERSIONS.

From January 1843, to the succeeding March, Rev. Mr. Goiran baptized at Seepore three Mahomedan Adults and six Children, born of heathen parents. From March 1843, to the 31st of the following December, in the same Mission, Rev. Mr. Zubiburn baptized seven Mahomedan Adults and four Children born of heathen parents.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

The Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy begs to acknowledge, with thanks, the receipt, from an Anonymous Benefactor, for the use of the College, of a fine copy, in seven volumes, folio (Pillar Edition), of the celebrated work, "the Universal History." This valuable work is the result of the great labors and profound research of an association of learned men in England, and is justly esteemed for the rich treasures it contains not only of profane but also of sacred History.

BOW BAZAR CHAPEL.—A very handsome picture of the Madonna and Child, in a richly gilt frame, has been presented to the Archbishop, for the Bow Bazar Chapel, by Mr. L. B. O'Hara.

MORAL AND RELIGIOUS STUDIES

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—I will endeavour to furnish you with a very concise explanation of the moral and religious studies which ought to be recommended to youth previously to their entering the difficult career of life.

In the first place a knowledge of universal history should form the basis of these studies; it should, however, be prosecuted in a summary manner, by fixing the attention of the student on facts of a paramount interest only: the origin of social institutions, of intellectual acquisitions, and of the causes which have most contributed to the improvement of the human race and of society. The youthful mind should then be directed, succinctly also, to the particular study of the sacred volumes, to that of the Fathers and Doctors of the church whose lives present prodigies of virtue, of knowledge, of eloquence, which, held up to the admiration of the student, would produce the happiest results. The labours of the Councils should also be explained to the student, for thereby he will perceive how the work of European civilization was elaborately forwarded in those august assemblies, whose object was to regulate and correct morals, at the same time that they fixed the unchangeable foundations of Catholic faith: a mission they accomplished under the authority of Revelation aided by the Spirit of God.

It is by travelling over the varied departments of Ethnography, and by comparing christian with heathen society, that youth will be able to arrive at luminous conclusions on the merit and efficacy of the civilizing principle through which alone the happiness and perfection of society can be attained: of course I allude to the civilizing elements of Christianity, to which, when contemplated in this point of view, no one can refuse to do homage. The love of a Sovereign Good and of humanity; Fraternity and Equality rendered universal by religious charity could not belong to any one of the many profane philosophies, all alike incapable of such high conceptions. The spirit of God alone could throw into the world such ideas and such sentiments, and induce the heart of man to adopt them and his reason to submit to them.

To these divers studies should be joined that of law, so far, at least, as regards the elements of that science. The study of law will excite within the breasts of youth sympathies in proportion as they advance in the knowledge of the principles of metaphysics, the remote source of legal study. A most interesting prospect, of the highest interest, will be thus unfolded before them, it is the plan of society in general, it is the chain which binds all men together by connecting them with the divinity; a sentiment which, borrowing the name of duty gives rise to law from which spring the many positive enactments regulating the various component parts of civil, political and religious orders, three orders which constitute the organic state of civilized societies.

Law carried back thus to its source, is otherwise termed natural law, which is the feeling of right and wrong imprinted on the heart of man, whose reason is destined to make the distinction or application of it. The natural Law has an immediate connexion with the Jewish or Christian revelations, for, as an illustrious Doctor observes, the sentiment of right and wrong is an interior voice placed in the depths of the human heart to respond to the exterior one represented by the two Revelations from which the former receives its developement, complement, and perfection; it is through the reunion of these two great rules, the natural and the revealed law, that we perceive the procession of the laws of man; then it is that we acquire the certitude that the entire fabric of human society has no other foundation than the sublime law of mutual assistance. These moral or religious studies will be found to be conducive to the knowledge of man, which ranks next to that of the Infinite Being of whom man is the most precious and most intimate emanation. These two studies are immediately connected; they form the first link in the chain of human knowledge, they comprehend the most transcendent, the most true, the most simple, the most luminous Metaphysics when their elements are looked for in the sacred writings.

In order, however, not to burden the mind with details which are necessary for, comparatively, few only, summary and general ideas on such matters being sufficient for most men, short and easy methods or synopses should be drawn up, such as would afford the heart and mind, the main object of education, wholesome and substantial nourishment. Above all the mind should be taught to appreciate correctly the fundamental points, on which social order, or, in other words, the moral, civil and political world, rests. Without such notions, it would be useless to attempt to sow the seeds of an exalted probity in the heart of man, or to open upon his mind the rays of pure truth. It is solely by inculcating intelligent youth, in an analytical and philosophical manner the primary truths which constitute the basis of society that you will be able to form men capable of understanding their own rights and of becoming able, according to the expression of an ancient, "To speak and to do well."

As to what regards the knowledge of the events or circumstances which concurred in accelerating the establishment of the Gospel, its diffusion over the world, its civilizing influence, in fine, its adaptation to every part of civil order, this branch of universal history is of the utmost consequence, as it is, in reality, the history of the civilization, or of the rational philosophic organization of society.

But these moral and religious studies cannot be complete unless a much greater development be given to sacred literature, for it will prove to the poet or to the orator an exhaustless fountain of the sublimest inspirations.

Allow me, Sir, at the conclusion of this letter, to transcribe a passage from a modern author*, which seems to me well adapted to convey an exalted and clear notion of the studies which I have been recommending.

"There is a philosophy, at once mild and severe, lowly and sublime, rigid and consolatory, equally accessible to all men, to the learned and the unlearned, to the barbarous and to the civilized, she has modest virtues for solitude, or brilliant ones for the crowd. She inspires the devotedness of the humble virgin watching at the pallet of misery or the sacrifices of the apostle. Her doctrines are universal, and her duties of every epoch, yet she multiplies her virtues according to the different positions of society, and her consolations according to the divers wants of life, she gives strength to misfortune, modesty to prosperity, and even dignity to submission, she makes the powerful humble and the weak strong. As the binding link of humanity, she supplicates for the poor, opens the heart of the rich to the voice of the unfortunate, hallows the anguish of suffering or of distress, she restrains the excesses of liberty, or carries the piercing cry of human conscience to the ears of tyrants. She is alternately the terror of successful crime or the support of persecuted innocence; daring at the feet of power or humble under the roof of poverty, she holds up to all men the same God as the source of the virtues which she inspires, of the duties which she proclaims, of the hopes which she promises, and of the terrors which she threatens."

Such, Sir, are the moral and religious sciences that should be recommended to the study of youth.

The time is past when foolish prepossessions, excited by innovators, who obstinately persisted in confounding abuses with the things abused, men with institutions, prevented us from appreciating the moral and religious riches that cannot be found elsewhere.

NEW CATHOLIC CHURCH AND SCHOOL AT BURRISAU.

The Rev. Thomas Zubiburn, Missionary Apostolic in the Zillah of Backergunge, returns his sincere and grateful thanks to those Catholics as well as Protestants in Calcutta and Backergunge who have so cheerfully responded to his appeal, and so generously contributed their mite towards the erection of a Church and School in the town of Burrisaul. The Rev. Mr. Zubiburn's unceasing and fervent prayers shall be offered up to the Almighty for the temporal and eternal welfare of those friends whose liberality has assisted him in commencing this work of Christian piety and benevolence.

Subscribers are respectfully solicited to send their donations to Chevalier C. R. Lackersteen, Calcutta, and to R. T. Loughnan, Esq. Burrisaul.

The Revd. Mr. Zubiburn begs to return his grateful acknowledgments for the following donations already received.

Selections.

A Pamphlet, entitled "Popery, and Jesuitism, the enemies of True Knowledge, and consequently of mental, moral, and social improvement," bearing the authorship of the Rev. A. Duff, issued, towards the expiration of last year, from the Baptist Mission Press, and was freely circulated among the Native Community.

It is not our intention to invite a criticism on the literary merits of the above composition; nor should we, under the co-existence of contemporaneous events of greater political magnitude, have admitted or felt the expediency of making it the subject of editorial notice; at the present stage of our labors, if we had not viewed that eloquent disquisition in the light of one of the most characteristic monuments of "form and pressure" of our times. The prospective influence of the religion of Western Europe on the destinies of India, neutralised or impaired, as it must needs be, by schismatic discrepancies, constitutes, nevertheless, one of the most important elements of philosophical research, to those who cast an inquisitive look into the depths of futurity, and mark the progressive development of Indian civilisation.

While the Reverend controversialist wages an argumentative war against the spread of the doctrines of the Church of Rome among the population of Hindostan, we find our highest legal dignitaries, with a liberal anxiety for the diffusion of knowledge, extending their moral support to the establishment of Seal's College, a Native Seminary, under the tuition of Reverend Gentlemen of the Jesuitical Order; and, more lately, the Honorable Sir John Peter Grant, on the occasion of the opening of the New School Rooms at St. Xavier's College, extolled, in an admirable address, "the efforts and success of Jesuit Missionaries in Europe, China, and America." The learned Judge expressly declared that the "Society of Jesus had been preeminently successful in advancing the interests of education, and spreading the blessings of knowledge," while the Reverend Gentleman had, on the other hand, as stoutly maintained the existence of multitudinous facts which demonstrate Rome's unchanged and unchangeable hostility to true knowledge! He adduced, in proof of his assertion, (Vide page 7 of his pamphlet) the remarkable fact that some of the most excellent productions of modern times have been proscribed at Rome, under the penalties and rigors of the inquisition, such as, Bacon's Advancement of Learning, Locke on the Human Understanding, Milton's Paradise Lost, Gibbon's Decline and Fall, Robertson's Charles V., &c. He painted in glowing colours, the causes which have driven the followers of Loyola from Ethiopia, after spreading through that country the horrors of a civil war;—he dwelt on the historical fact of their utter extermination from Japan, their expulsion from China, from Paraguay, in America, and on the woful ignorance which still prevails in the Southern states of that Continent where, according to the testimony of Mrs. Graham, "The very names of literature and science are almost unknown," and where "no bibles or testaments have ever been introduced!" He quoted, from a Jesuitical writer, a passage in which Luther is loaded with the most contumelious epithets; "Luther! that disgrace of Germany! that Epicurean hog! that curse of Europe! that monster, destructive to the whole earth, hateful to God and man!" (page 25.)

But we shall purposely abstain from offering our editorial opinion on the merits of a controversy pending, though unpremeditatedly, between clerical authority and judicial wisdom. Our object is simply to express our fears of the ultimate failure of missionary agency in India, should its people, who live as yet in proverbial indifference to subjects destitute of a tangible or lucrative character, come to reflect on the conflicting doctrines entertained and promulgated by the respective members of different European communions. Peace, harmony, unity, and universal toleration constitute the exclusive instruments for the entire eradication of those pantheistical errors which have so deeply blended themselves with the social fabric of Indian existence.

But it seems extremely probable, or, at least, it may be surmised, without the slightest intentional derogation to the Reverend Gentleman, that, had he interpreted the political phenomena of our times with his usual sagacity, he would have at once acknowledged that, at no former period of the history of mankind, has religion been more eagerly employed, than at the present day, as an element of political power. And hence he would have likewise inferred the evangelic nature of those prospects of success which some particular forms of religious belief are calculated, even in India, to present, as being but slightly, if at all, congenial with monarchical principles; while Jesuitism has, on the contrary, always been known to flourish in those countries, where it is the professed interest of the Ruling Authority to uphold theological associations of a pliant and subservient character. Those democratical ideas which agitated Europe, at the conclusion of the last, and during the first period of the present century, and which exploded anew in 1848, have been found, by subsequent experience, naturally to arise from the bosom of Protestantism, as in the instance of the late revival of the spirit of the Covenant in Scotland; and hence the birth of Puseyism, and the concomitant ascendancy of the Church of Rome. Montesquieu, in his Spirit of Law, has expressly declared, that "The Roman Catholic religion is more adapted to the support of Monarchy, while Protestantism best agrees with a Republic." This luminous principle is now acted upon, and forms one of the main pivots on which the present system of European politics is made to revolve.

In the preceding strictures, we have, on the authority of the Reverend writer alluded to, some of the most characteristic traits of Jesuitism in ages long gone by, but have carefully and purposely abstained from insinuating any the least charge or imputation against the excellence of the aggregate members of that celebrated Society. We are happy to bear witness to the fact that, in latter days, a more catholic spirit of toleration has pervaded its ranks, than at any former period, and that the Order of Loyola can, even now, boast of many exalted natures, whose profound learning and piety, and heroic devotion to the cause of humanity, would have shone conspicuously even in the brightest eras of apostolical sanctity. The cause of Indian education must needs flourish under such spiritual guides, and we, therefore, heartily join the Learned Judge in wishing them all success and prosperity in their philanthropic enterprise. Nisi desperandum Teucro duce, et auspice Teucro!—The Weekly News.

THE ENGLISH CONVENT AT BRUGES.

Having been at Bruges at the period of our gracious Queen's visit to that ancient and pre-eminently Catholic town, it has been a subject of regret to me not to have as yet observed in any paper the particulars of her Majesty's visit to the English convent there, so long and justly celebrated; and as such an account must be particularly acceptable to many, and highly interesting to most of the readers of your extensively circulated Catholic journal, perhaps these few particulars may not prove unacceptable.

It was rumoured for some days that the English convent was among the establishments her Majesty intended to visit, but it was not until the morning of the 15th ult. that the Burgomaster, the Baron de Pellechy, sent an express to the ladies, informing them of her Majesty's intention to honour the convent with her presence.

After breakfasting at the Hotel de Ville, where the Abbé de Foere, the director of the convent, was presented to her Majesty, and visiting some among the very many interesting churches and institutions of the town, the illustrious visitors reached the convent at a little past three. The arrangements for their reception in this abode of cheerfulness and peace, were extremely neat, though simple. Orange trees and evergreens were tastefully placed upon and about the great gates opening into the court, across which carpets were laid down, and "Victoria" ingeniously inscribed in bright dahlias of various colours at the entrance of the enclosure. The favoured few invited to avail themselves of this opportunity to visit the interior of this vast and magnificent establishment were drawn up in the court to receive the royal visitors; and in passing through her Majesty, who was leaning on the arm of the King of the Belgians, recognised and addressed herself to the Hon. Lady Bedingfield, who has of a daughter a member of the community. The convent door was by this time opened, and the royal party, followed by Lord Liverpool, Lord Aberdeen, Lady Canning, the Hon. Miss Liddell, Lord Charles Wellesley, Sir Hamilton and Lady Seymour, the Bishop of Bruges, with the civil and military authorities, was received by the superioress, and a few of the religious. The scene now was particularly striking, as the worldly procession moved through the noble cloisters, and invaded the sanctuary of pious retirement. What reflections did it not suggest! Their Majesties were first ushered into a large room, around which were hung the portraits of the foundresses, superiors, and bishops of Bruges, where the members of the community were assembled. The Queen graciously acknowledged the salutations of the ladies, and after affably declining the offer of the superioress to partake of some refreshment, which was here laid out, she proceeded to view the other noble apartments occupied by the community, until she arrived at the entrance of the hall, leading to the school. Here she was received by a group of young ladies, some of whom sung, with much taste and accuracy, some very appropriate lines, written for the occasion by one of the members of the community, and adapted to the national air; whilst the others (being from among the smallest of the school) gracefully wayed garlands of flowers, and thus ushered their royal visitors into the class-room, where all the young ladies, dressed alike in the summer uniform of white with blue sashes, were ready to receive them. This interesting welcome seemed to afford her Majesty particular pleasure, and she remarked upon the richness and precision of the voices, at the same time graciously bowing and smiling to all. She now returned to the cloisters, and the King of the Belgians referred to his watch, observing that the necessity of their return to Ostend by five o'clock obliged them to hurry away. Their Majesties, however, took a hasty glance at the church and departed apparently highly gratified with their visit. This was the third visit of the King of the Belgians, whose Queen remarked to the superioress, with evident satisfaction, "That it was the second time that she had had the pleasure of visiting her noble establishment." It has, indeed, been always looked upon as among the most interesting sights in Belgium, and has been honoured by the presence of many illustrious personages; among them may be mentioned their late Royal Highnesses the Dukes of York, Sussex, and Gloucester, the Princess Elizabeth, and her Royal Consort, the King and Queen of Holland, the Prince and Princess of Orange, besides others, and many dignitaries of the Church.

As the royal party were leaving the convent, Prince Albert, who had been enquiring of the Abbé de Foere as to the prosperity of the "Société de St. Sébastien," to which the rev. gentleman had introduced his Royal Highness on a previous occasion, proposed to her Majesty to step across the street to their picturesque and ancient hotel to see the bust of Charles II., as also a silver arrow presented by him to the society, of which he was a member, together with his brother, Henry, Duke of Gloucester, who also presented it with his portrait. Her Majesty and the Prince inscribed their names in the book, which also contains the signature of the unfortunate Charles. The excellent and talented director of the convent is chaplain to the society, and is much and deservedly respected by his fellow-citizens of Bruges, for the vast benefits he has conferred upon the town, by the establishment of several most valuable and benevolent institutions, upon a sound religious basis, besides promoting its interests in many other important ways.

After the departure of the royal visitors and their suites the invited guests were allowed to extend their laudable curiosity and visit every part of the house; and I shall ever consider myself fortunate to have been at Bruges when our gracious Queen entered the English convent, for it is a most noble and spacious building, and but few of the convents in England as yet convey an adequate idea of real old monastic architecture. The cloisters, one of which is 300 feet long, are paved with black and white marble, and are decorated with paintings by some of the first masters, which were much admired by Prince Albert, who particularly noticed one representing the prophets, Nathan and David, by Gerard dell Notta.

The Church, which is justly admired for the correctness of its proportions, and elegance of its details, is of the Corinthian order. It was begun in 1736, and finished in 1739. The nave forms an octagon, which is surmounted by a dome, supported by eight columns. The high altar is esteemed one of the greatest curiosities of the country. It is composed of twenty-two pieces of antique Egyptian and Persian marble, and was made and erected at Rome, that the virtuosi might pass judgment upon it. It secured their unanimous approbation, but at the same time their regret at its leaving Rome, as too fine a work for any other place. It is said to have been presented to the convent by Charles II., during his exile and sojourn in the Low Countries. The walls of the church are ornamented with a few choice pictures—one by Rubens, representing the triumph of Christ, is particularly remarkable, and one of the Holy Family, of Raphael's school, also demands notice.

The school is a spacious, airy, and commodious building, communicating with the monastery by a beautiful hall. The school and work rooms, refectory, music, singing, and dancing rooms (each professor has a separate one), together with the lofty and particularly airy dormitories, the baths and infirmary, convey a true picture of English cleanliness and comfort. The garden extends over about four or five acres, and in it is a piazza, about 200 feet long and twenty broad, for the convenience of the pensioners in wet or hot weather. It is altogether a noble institution, and is justly renowned through Belgium and the adjoining countries (most of the Belgian, and many of the French, nobility having been brought up there), for the superior education imparted in it, as exhibited in many of the brightest ornaments in our own and past Catholic generations.

This ancient monastery, so dear to the memory of our Catholic nobility and gentry, as having been the refuge of so many of their relatives during the suppression of monastic institutions in England, is a filiation of the regular canons of the order, of the Great St. Austin, from the English convent of St. Monica, at Louvain. The third superior, and, it may be said, foundress, was Mary Austin Bedingfield, who was succeeded in the government of the community by her niece, Mary Bedingfield, from which period the house has never been without a Bedingfield or a Jerningham. The late superior, Mrs. More, was the last descendant of Sir Thomas More. This esteemed lady conducted the community to England during the "troublesome times," where they remained eight years, residing at Hengrave Hall, Suffolk, the seat of Sir Thomas Gage, Bart. Among many who have renounced the brilliant prospects of the world to lead a holy life in social solitude in this convent, may be remarked the names of the principal Catholic families of England.—Tablet, Oct. 28.

SITUATION OF IRELAND.

VIII. ARTICLE.

The Irish Parliament.

Repeal of the legislative union! Reinstitution of the Irish Parliament! such is the cry, the sole cry used in the present agitation. We are inclined to think the Repealers thus invoke the shade of the old Parliament of Dublin only because it has remained in their minds the last visible symbol of national independence; for that institution, such as it existed for several centuries, caused of itself more of harm than good to Ireland. In allowing the existence in Ireland of two houses distinct from the Imperial Parliament, England had taken good care that they should be in her hands instruments of oppression and auxiliary agents of her own tyranny.

Some few historical details will suffice to establish this point beyond the power of contestation.

Under Henry VIII., Poynings, Viceroy of Ireland, caused a law to be promulgated by which no Parliament could be convened without the motives of its convocation and the bills to be discussed having been previously examined and approved by the English Government. This law placed therefore the Irish legislature in entire dependence upon the English crown. It was summoned only when there was need of its presence for the consummation of some great iniquity, but it enjoyed no prerogative. If it pleased the Parliament sitting in London to decree some measure relating to the administration of Ireland, the Parliament sitting in Dublin was bound to ratify it. Say it refused? such refusals put neither let nor hindrance upon the application of the measure; as the concurrence of the Irish house was in that case summarily dispensed with. If on the contrary the Irish legislature voted upon any subject whatever, its vote could not take active effect, until after its sanction by the English Parliament, and if ever so little offensive to the latter, the vote was annulled. The despotic violence of the English Government had we know to seek, and did, as we see, easily find, more accomplices than adversaries in the Irish Parliaments.

Upon this subject we give a curious quotation from a work by Sir John Davies, Attorney General under James I., and much devoted to that prince.

The circumstances which elicited the passage were these. James took a fancy to confiscate six counties in the province of Ulster. A pretended plot was supposed to exist; the principle landholders in these counties were accused of being conspirators and parties in the said plot. Yet James wished to proceed with certain quasi law forms in the spoliation he had contemplated. He conceived the idea of having these proprietors banished by the Irish Parliament. Therefore in 1613, the legislature was convoked, and after a careful selection of good members had been made, the desired proscription found a majority of approvers. Upon this being obtained, Davies, conscious however that it was impossible to dissimulate the cause of the measure, undertook with a degree of innocent simplicity truly delightful to justify it. His thesis is this: "The like of what King James has done, others have done before, and for similar purposes." He then proceeds to enumerate examples, and the following arguments ad factum we now quote as a proof of the dependence characteristic of the Irish Parliament.

"Why was the Parliament assembled by Lord Leopold Gray, in the 24th year of the reign of Henry VIII. if not to banish the Geraldines, and also to abolish the authority of the Pope?"

"For what cause did Thomas, Earl of Essex, hold his first Parliament, during the 3d and 4th years of the reign of Queen Mary, if not to secure definitively Leix and Offaley to the crown?"

"For what reason did Sir Henry Sidney hold a special Parliament in the 11th year of Queen Elizabeth, if not to extinguish the name of O'Neil, and to give to the crown a right to the greatest part of Ulster?"

"And, finally, why did Sir John Perrot hold the last Parliament, if not principally to proscribe the two greatest Peers of this Kingdom Viscount Baltinglass and Earl Desmond, and to put the crown in possession of their lands, and of those of their adherents?"

This candid argumentation proves sufficiently what an Irish Parliament was in those times; yet, notwithstanding the docility of these assemblies, they were called together as rarely as possible. When James convoked the above-mentioned Parliament of 1613, no less than twenty-six years had elapsed since the preceding sitting, in 1587.

We ought however hardly to wonder that things should have been conducted in this manner. The Irish Parliaments were composed but of Protestants more or less recently established in the country, always ready to take part in the passions of the English Government against men who had the double crime of being Native Irish and Catholics.

The majority dreaded so much the intrusion of a doubtful partizan into their assembly, that, in order to shut every access to either of the houses to adherents of the Roman Catholic interest, an act was passed by which no person could be elected a member of Parliament, unless he had taken the oath of Supremacy, and received the commission from the hands of the Archbishop of Armagh.

This took place under Charles II. A little later, in 1692, after the revolution which overthrew the Stuarts, an act was passed in which the following provisions occur:

"None shall sit or vote, either in the House of Peers or in the House of Commons of Ireland unless he has first taken the oath of allegiance and Supremacy, and signed a declaration against the transubstantiation, against the sacrifice of the mass, against the idolatry of the court of Rome, against the invocation of the Virgin Mary, of the Saints, &c. &c."

Such Laws could not do other indeed but exclude from Parliament the Native Irish of itself. This fact explains acts and votes which otherwise would appear inexplicable. Irish Parliaments, as then composed, had no national element; it was not only in religious matters that they took the part of England against Ireland, but on all questions, even those of local interest. For instance, towards the end of the seventeenth century, the manufacturers of woollen cloths in Ireland had reached a high degree of prosperity, and those of England could not come to competition with them. The English Parliament declared it was desirable that this competition should cease, and, by an act of the Parliament of Ireland, dated 25th March 1699, the national manufacturers were prohibited from exporting their cloths, in order that English industry should be troubled no more.

The consequence of that Law was the ruin of manufactories that constituted the essence of the prosperity of the southern parts of the country.

This total abasement of the legislature however did not exist unredeemed at later times. In 1782, when England was engaged in a perilous struggle against her colonies of North America, then aided by several European powers, the Irish Parliament, where national spirit had at last found some way to penetrate, broke (19th July) the bonds of Poyning's gagging act and proclaimed its independence. Henry Grattan was the chief of that movement. It was on the text of his speeches that the Dublin legislature addressed the king in this energetic language: "..... That his subjects are a free people; that the crown of Ireland is a crown united to that of England, but that the kingdom of Ireland is a distinct kingdom, having its own Parliament; that none in the world is competent to prepare laws obligatory for the Irish nation, except the King, the Peers and the Commons of Ireland." This declaration was backed by an army of sixty thousand volunteers. What could England then do against such a manifestation? She yielded; she permitted the abrogation of the laws upon which rested her predominance and her parliamentary supremacy; but even as she yielded, the hope burned bright in her that, existing difficulties over, she would be in a position to reassert her iniquitous right of the strongest.

This is undoubtedly the most brilliant period of the Irish Parliament. The voices of great orators protested more than once and with energy against the disloyal policy followed by England towards several continental powers. When Mr. Pelham, secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, came to inform the Commons that negotiations for peace were broken off, and that the King had resolved to renew war against France with vigour, Henry Grattan, seconded by George Ponsonby, denounced the want of sincerity evinced on the part of England.

This troublous liberty however was not to be permitted to last much longer. Incapable of annihilating it by force, Government undermined it by corruption. The ranks of the national and liberal party thinned gradually. When, in March 1797, Ponsonby proposed to the House of Commons (Irish), to carry into execution the reform of parliamentary representation, to grant to the Catholics all the political rights which the Protestants possessed, and to abolish all the public disabilities resulting from the difference of religions, he obtained but rare sympathy in favour of his motion, which was rejected by 117 votes against 30. From this day, the friends of Irish independence refused to take a part in the deliberations: as soon as the result of the ballot was pronounced, Henry Grattan rising said: "We have no further hope, to persuade or to dissuade you; we shall in future trouble you no more, and, from to-morrow, we shall cease to appear in the House of Commons."

His word was kept, Master of the field, the English Government so carried matters that in 1799 they thought the moment was come when they could propose to the Irish Parliament its own suicide. The Parliament, degenerated by corruption, might have perhaps immediately submitted to this exaction, had not public opinion expressed its voice. Stimulated by the explosion of universal indignation, the Parliament refused to pronounce its annihilation; but it was not by one check that England was to be discouraged. Up to that time she had purchased votes; she now proposed another bargain to the unworthy assembly. Like as criminals sentenced to death sell their body before-hand to the anatomist, so did the Irish Parliament derive a sordid profit from its own remains. The rich possessors of rotten-boroughs were indemnified for the aristocratical privileges they were to lose by the abolition of the local Parliament. An arbitrary value, an average price of £150,000 stg. was set upon each rotten-borough, and that sum was paid as an indemnity to the proprietor. At the same time, appointments, promotions, pensions, dignities, peerages, sums of money, were lavished upon all the members who still held out. One may read in the very curious and interesting book entitled "The Irish black list and national mirror of corruption," the list of the members of the Irish Parliament who voted for its suppression, their names, the pecuniary or horrific compensations which were granted them for their vote. The book is most edifying: it gives the secret of the origin or rise of many of the actual grandees, the tariff of many a conscience—The sole purchase of the rotten-boroughs cost £1,245,000 stg.

It was thus that on the 26th May 1800, a majority of 118 votes was formed to decide upon the legislative union of Ireland and England. When after the vote, the Viceroy, Lord Castlereagh, made in the House of Commons the motion that the bill should be drawn up in the usual form; "and I," exclaimed a member of the Minority (Mr. O'Donnell), "I propose that the bill be burnt."—"And I," added another member (Mr. Tighe), "that it should be burnt by the hand of the hangman."!!

Impotent protestations! The act was consummated, and the consequences of this memorable vote still heavily bear upon the relations of both countries. Never will Ireland forget that England has deprived her, by and through the means we have reported, of the last vestige of nationality that remained to her after so many struggles and difficulties. Ireland calls for it now, notwithstanding the stains that so long disgraced it. For Ireland, a local Parliament is the living manifestation of her liberty and independence. In re-constructing it, should he succeed, O'Donnell intends, no doubt, giving it such basis as to render the return of old abuses impossible. The Protestants are not to be excluded, but the Catholics, from the immense majority of the country, would form the principal element of the new Parliament. But the question is not yet so much one of fact as of principle, the inherent right namely to possess a distinct legislature to which a new spirit and direction shall be applied. Such is the result aimed at openly by the Liberals and the clergy. Perhaps there is time still for England to make Ireland renounce the idea of Repeal, were sufficient and proper concessions granted, but the Tory ministry will not make these concessions. So have they declared in open Parliament, and indeed were they willing reasonably to concede, a majority of the house would be likely to oppose the policy. Public demonstrations in favor of Repeal become under these circumstances of deep importance. Before long, all Ireland may repeat one cry in unison, and what was at first probably but a scheme of party intimidation may become a real and serious object from which it may be impossible to divert the attention of the exasperated masses. It is dangerous to let nations dally too long with anti-subjective ideas and feelings: with them, the toy of yesterday may prove the sword of to-morrow.

IX. ARTICLE.

Mr. Ward, in his place in the House of Commons (1st August last,) spoke as follows:

"The miseries of Ireland arise from the English church as established in that country; but the enormous sums of money raised at the cost of the Catholic and to be given to the Protestant church are not the only cause of complaint in Ireland," &c. Mr. Ward proceeds to a re-partition of the revenues of the Irish Church on footing other than that hitherto obtained Lord Elliot, in the name of Government, opposed the measure, which he styled one of spoliation. But it should not be forgotten that the property now appropriated by the Protestant church, was seized upon and violently dispossessed from that of the Catholics who held legitimate possession of it long before England thought of claiming the funds and lands, upon the strength of a reformation in doctrine which Ireland did not acknowledge.

However, we think with Lord Elliot that in the category of political necessities is that which requires Great Britain to maintain the supremacy of the Protestants, as the national religion.

When the representative of Royalty is at the same time the head of the Church, it is difficult to admit other creeds as on a level with the one of which it is the chief. In such a situation, a diminution of the supremacy of religion lessens the dignity of the Crown. One does not therefore wonder to see Ministers resist Mr. Ward's motion, albeit founded upon incontrovertible principles of abstract justice. Hence arises the great difficulty of the question: to concede is on the one hand to shake the whole political constitution of England; not to do so, amounts to a sort of denial of justice. It is a dilemma hard to live in, and harder to escape from.

The same question was brought forward in 1835 when it upset the Peel administration. We know not how the discussion will end this time, but one may say in advance and without fear of mistake, that if not destined for the immediate overthrow of the present cabinet, it will most seriously add to its difficulties, by giving additional influence to such agitation.

The following details will give the reader an idea of the question now moved. We borrow them from a series of very remarkable letters addressed to Lord Grey, some years ago, by a man than whom few knew the state of Ireland better—Mr. James Mill.

In order to set off the enormity of charges weighing upon the Irish for the support of the Protestant establishment, Mr. Mill, after very careful research drew up a statement of all the revenues of the clergy in several countries of the world, and from the comparison of these different revenues, together with the exigencies of the Protestant church for Ireland, results the scandalous difference which we will now signalize.

There hardly exist in Ireland more than 500,000 people of the English Protestant persuasion. Let us see then, with Mr. Mill, what the clergy-costs are in other countries for 500,000 inhabitants, making no difference of sects or religions.

	Stg.
In Russia,.....for 500,000 Inh....	£ 7,500
South America....15 000
France.....17 000
Austria.....25 000
Germany.....30 000
North America...30 000
Sweden.....35 000
Denmark.....35 000
Holland.....40 000
Spain & Portugal..50 000

These computations, which were found nearly rigorously exact, give a mean revenue, or charge rather, of £27,000 Stg. for 500,000 inhabitants. Therefore it may be concluded that were not the Protestant clergy in Ireland granted extra privileges, its receipts would not exceed the ratio of this sum of 27,000 and allowing a clergyman for every 300 families he would receive at this rate a yearly salary of £80 Stg.—But Mr. Mill has taken into consideration that the clergyman of the Protestant religion are members of the official church, and in a plan of reform which he develops, he grants to the Protestant of Ireland a priest for each hundred families, and proposes to allow them a salary of £30, besides a comfortable house of residence. For Bishops and other dignitaries of the Church, his liberality goes so far as to grant them £48,000 Stg.—These sums given, the receipts of the Protestant church in Ireland may be established as follows:

	Stg.
Salary of the Lower Clergy	£ 313,400
House Rent,	2,000
Bishops, &c.....	48,000

for about 1100 clergymen, and with this sum they would be on the average salaried twelve times higher than the same number of ecclesiastics in other parts of the world.

Now, the recorded claims to stipends of the English clergy all over Ireland amount in the Stg.

whole, to no less than..	£ 8,135,537
Deducting the above sum of..	363,400

The difference is .. £ 7,772,137

Whence it results that the Protestant, being paid four times higher than the Catholic Clergy in Ireland and fifteen or twenty times higher than in several other Christian countries, the Irish nation might be relieved above six millions sterling per annum.

In order to render more forcible the justice of the complaints of the Irish people against the minority that oppresses them, it should be remembered that England, which reckons 9991 clergymen, has 24 bishops only, while in Ireland, where there are but 763 ministers of the English church, there are 39 bishops. Besides we might name several dignitaries of the church who never were seen or ever appeared in Ireland. There is one, amongst these latter, who has resided in Italy for the last 14 years, yet receiving a salary of six thousand pounds sterling per annum, and who some years ago was bold enough to address the House of Commons with a petition claiming an annual salary of £60 in favour of the only parson who served a parish in his diocese.

Incontrovertible documentary proof establishes that, contrary to all equity, 763 resident members of the English church in Ireland draw a much higher revenue than was paid, in 1787 to the whole clergy and to all the religious corporations in France; and yet there were then in France,

Monks,.....	78,015
Nuns, &c.....	79,972
Secular clergy.....	241,989
Curates,.....	60,302

460,078 Individuals.

The French revolution arose in part from the intolerable burthen as it was thought of maintaining these 460,000 religious persons, yet they cost France less than the 773 ministers of the religion of the minority of her inhabitants cost to Ireland.—Cal. Stur.

Dublin Review. No. XXIX. September, 1843.
London: Dolman,

This number of the Review exhibits more variety than usual. The subjects are well chosen and interesting, and, on the whole (though with certain exceptions, which we may perhaps touch upon on another occasion), ably handled; but we must suspend all notice of the other articles for the pleasure of introducing our readers to a most valuable paper, entitled "Minor Rites and Offices," which undeterred by former bad guesses, we venture to attribute to Dr. Wiseman. In this article two points particularly engage our attention. The first is the reviewer's beautiful remarks on the Devotion to our Blessed Lady, on the Rosary in particular. The other is the equally beautiful observations on the Adoration of the B. Sacrament. Some parts of this we must quote, and at such length as to preclude the possibility of comment:—

DEFECT OF ENGLISH FEELING.

"No one can go into a Catholic country without seeing at once this idea carried out into practice. Every church that can be considered public, is left open almost all the day; cathedral, collegiate, and parish churches, and often many others. It is considered a matter of right that they should be so. This, to our minds, forms a lamentable contrast between England and those countries; we mean not Protestant England, but what is Catholic of it. For truly, were the churches left open in the former, merely that strangers might more easily gratify their curiosity by looking through them, we might, perhaps, indeed, plead our poverty, to call it nothing worse, and say, as we have no pictures or rich marbles to show, we may as well shut up our comparatively poor places of worship. But the case is not so. There are plenty of country churches in France, or Germany, or Italy, which can boast of no attraction for the eye of flesh, which yet invite the passer-by to enter, and to pray. And many will do so: especially at the calm evening hour, so suitable to that duty. Now, that which attracts them we possess in our poorest chapels; and if we see them not similarly visited, the fault is in persons not in thing. The same Wisdom hath built a house with us, adorned with the same mystical seven columns, hath spread a table, and calleth aloud from her high citadel on all to enter, to come to her, and to partake. So far there is no difference, then: the difference lies in the obedience to the call. We may throw the blame upon the circumstances in which we live, our country, and times, but it will not do. It must ultimately fall upon ourselves. The feeling is not amongst us which inspires our brethren abroad. It is not necessary that we should trace the matter further, that we should enquire into its hidden or parent causes, that we should specify where the fault more particularly rests. Let us all at once bear it, acknowledge it, and strive to correct it. Let us in every way study to make the house of God more loved, its privileges more highly prized, and its treasures more earnestly coveted. If circumstances will not allow us to throw it open indiscriminately all day, let us, at least, make it at all times accessible to the faithful, and let us teach them what comfort they may find there.

PRACTICE ABROAD.

"For this purpose, in large towns, where there are a sufficient number of churches, the entire year is portioned out among them, in spaces of eight and forty hours, an interval which has given the name to the devotion, of the "Forty Hours' Prayer." No expense is spared, no pains neglected to make this sacred rite as solemn and as devout as possible. The church is richly adorned with tapestry and hangings, while the daylight is excluded, not so much to give effect to the brilliant illumination round the altar, as to concentrate and direct attention towards that which is upon it, and make it, like the Lamb in heaven, the lamp and sun, the centre of light and glory to the surrounding sanctuary. After a solemn mass, and a procession the blessed Sacrament is enshrined and enthroned above the altar; at the same moment that, with similar pomp, it is reverently taken down in some other church. Around it is disposed, as it were, a firmament of countless lights, radiating from it, symbolical of the ever wakeful host of heaven, the spirits of restless life and unfading brightness, that keep watch round the seat of glory above. At the foot of the altar kneel immovable, in silent adoration, the priests of the sanctuary, relieving each other day and night pouring the prayers of people, as fragrant odours, before it. But look at the body of the church! No pews, no benches, or other encumbrances are there; but the flood of radiance from the altar seems poured out upon the marble pavement, and to stream along it to the very door. But not during the day will you see it thus; the whole except during the hours of repose is covered with kneeling worshippers. To look at the scene through the eye of memory, comes nearer to the contemplation of a heavenly vision than aught else that we know. It seems to us as though, on these occasions, flesh and blood lost their material grossness, and were spiritualised as they passed the threshold. Softly and noiselessly is the curtain raised, which covers the door, and passed unlifted from hand to hand, in silent courtesy, as a succession of visitors enter in; they who in the street just now were talking so loud, and laughing so merrily, how they steal in with slow pace and gentle tread, as though afraid to break upon the solemnity of the scene! For before and around them are scattered, without order or arrangement, persons singly or in groups, as they have entered in, all lowly kneeling, all reflecting upon their prayerful countenances the splendour from the altar; and as they pass among them to find place, with what careful and quiet step they thread their way, so as least to disturb those among whom they move; and they drop down upon their knees too, in the first open space, upon the same bare stone floor, princess and peasant, priest and layman, all equal in the immeasurable distance between them and the eternal object of their adoration. In no other time or place is the sublimity of our religion so touchingly felt. No ceremony is going forward in the sanctuary, no sound of song is issuing from the choir, no voice of exhortation proceeds from the pulpit, no prayer is uttered aloud at the altar. There are hundreds there, and yet they are engaged in no congregational act of worship. Each heart and soul is alone in the midst of a multitude; each uttering its own thoughts, each feeling its own grace. Yet are you overpowered, subdued, quelled into a reverential mood, softened into a devotional spirit, forced to meditate, to feel, to pray. The little children who come in, led by a mother's hand, kneel down by her in silence, as she simply points towards the altar, overawed by the still splendour before them; the very babe seems hushed to quiet reverence on her bosom. The hurried passer by, who merely looks in, cannot resist the impulse to sink, if only in a momentary genuflection, upon his knee; nay, even the English scoffer, who will face anything else, will not venture to stalk, as elsewhere, up the nave, heedless of other's sacred feelings, but must needs remain under the shelter of the doorway, or steal behind the shadow of the first pillar, if he wishes to look on without partaking. But more forward, or in the recesses of the aisles, how many you will find, who have not merely entered in to pay their passing, evening visit, but who have spent their hours in that Heavenly presence, where they seem to breathe the pure air of Paradise. To them it is, indeed, "the house of God, and the gate of Heaven;" It does one's spirit good even to look again upon such hours, through years of distance and miles of space; it recalls to mind emotions deeper and tenderer than we may hope for here; it makes one almost envious of those whose privilege they are. Never shall we forget the first evening that we were admitted to enjoy it. It was, indeed, a sumptuous church, though its rich marbles were draped over, in one of the fairest cities in Italy. But though we have since seen many more costly and more spacious, it has retained in our memory a charm peculiar to itself, a distinctive character impressed by the solemn circumstances under which we first saw it, an affection and interest which none other has been able to supplant.

PROPOSED PRACTICE IN ENGLAND.

"Why are we precluded from this truly Heavenly devotion, this angelic service? Shall it be the old story—"we are not ready for these things—our people don't understand them—we are too poor for such functions;" or—we hesitate again to state the objection—"they are not essential, they are not necessary, and we can go on, as we have done, without them?" Yet, we may boldly say, that if any country under the sun has, more than another, a want of such a devotion, it is ours. Here, where, in three hundred years, more churches have been desecrated, more tabernacles profaned, more sacrileges committed, more perjuries pronounced, against the blessed Eucharist, than in the entire world else, since the days of Berengarius; here, where more consecrated plate, sanctified by the contact of the most precious gifts, stands on the tables and sideboards of princes and nobles, than brought a hand to write judgment in the banqueting-hall of Balthassar; here, where alone denial of this most holy institution has been made a public, a legal, a national, a royal act; here, where this holiest of holies has been chosen as the favourite object of the profanest treatment, pierced by the jeer of the scoffer, beaten about in the unholy language of itinerant declaimers, crowned with ignominy from pulpit and platform; here, surely, if anywhere, should loving hearts conspire to atone and compensate, by holding the Heavenly mystery in perpetual homage, and never allowing one moment to pass, in which adoration, and benediction, and glory, are not openly and solemnly bestowed on it. There is, indeed, in England, one community, and we believe only one, in which the perpetual adoration of the blessed Eucharist is carried on. There is abroad a religious order devoted exclusively to this holy purpose. But the house of which we speak has obtained the special privilege of uniting it to the rule of St. Benedict; and day and night, some of the sisterhood watch in prayer before the altar. But this does not meet our wants. We should have something more general, more national. It is true that no single town could carry on the devotion as it is abroad; but what is to prevent the entire country com-or chapel, or into his neighbourhood at least. We might then, indeed, feel that we were trying to do something towards wiping off the long scores of treason and insult run up by our country, and hastening the time of merciful visitation, by propitiating the measure of wrath that yet remains."

Would to God the suggestion could be realised!

MISCELLANEA.

PUSEYISM, THE ANGLICANS, &c.

SIGNS AND SINS.—The good people of Ilford, shocked by some Catholic observances of their Tractarian curate, the Rev. Mr. Bedford, rose in a body and walked out of the church in the middle of the service. The forms so offensive to the congregation were making the sign of the cross and bows before the communion table in the manner of the Catholic priests. A beneficed clergyman has accomplished the seduction of a lady under the pretence of a promise of marriage. He deserts and breaks with her in the most heartless way. Upon the trial of an action for damages his letters are read, in which a most irreverent use is made of scripture mixed up with brutal and disgusting levities. The case is thoroughly proved, and damages given against the rev. libertine, who had signed himself in one of his letters "The Scoundrel Frank;" the only solitary truth that appeared in his part of the correspondence. Now, is the appearance of this man in the pulpit as the living example of a holy life, and as a religious and moral instructor, a less scandal, a less offence to the pious, than the signs of the cross and bows before the communion table? But the reverend seducer's congregation were not moved by his presence to quit the church.—Examiner.

GERMANY.

The works at the cathedral of Cologne, without very rapid advancement, do not stand still. The choir will soon be finished, and that of itself forms a vast church. M. Steinle, a native of Vienna and pupil of Overbeck is now engaged CONVERSION.—We learn from the secular papers that the Rev. Daniel Parkins, curate of Marden, Wilts, an old Tractarian, has embraced the Catholic faith.—Philadelphia Catholic Herald.

EFFECTS OF PUSEYISM.—The progress of Tractarianism in the University has spread such alarm at the west end, that at the suggestion of Sir Peter Laurie, a strong barrier is to be erected to prevent Oxford-street from running into Newman-street.—Punch.

CHINA.

Extract of a letter from Hong Kong, July 24, 1843 :—"There is a splendid Catholic church here, with seven or eight Jesuits—Italian, French, and Spanish, and Chinese!! About seven or eight masses every day, commencing at half-past five, the last being about nine. It is a glorious sight on a morning, at a place two years ago entirely uninhabited—new streets rising and great edifices forming—to see a Catholic church completed, and the religion of the State, the Anglicans left to pray, as they best may, in a mat hut. It is not the last that I exult at, but it is odd, and it argues little life for so potent a body to be so badly off. But to see in the Catholic Church realised the very dream of Tom Moore, as related in his "Travels of an Irish Gentleman"—to see kneeling on its purless areas, a representative of every nation under Heaven—English, Spanish, French, Italian, Portuguese, Irish, Lascars, and various nations of India, in their picturesque costumes, Chinese, &c.; whites, blacks, tawny, copper, and all colours under which the form of man has ever appeared; soldiers, and civilians, excites a feeling more than I can express. To behold the altar successively occupied by men of different nations and languages, and to behold all equally interested—equally attentive—equally collected, and busied about the same thing, displays an unity which those who differ from us have no idea of. It shows the wisdom of the Church in adhering to an ancient tongue in her liturgy; for what language would you make use of here, where not two of the congregation can converse with one another."

HEROISM.—The Catholic clergyman in Detroit turned his large school into a cholera hospital, spent of his own property five thousand dollars in fitting it up, and paying for medicine, doctors, and nurses; admitted all equally, Protestant and Papist; and as we understand, even carried to it on his own back, patients in the blue stage; for which all honour be to him, and praise from his Maker, at that day when the praise of man shall be nothing worth. Chancellor Livingston also, if I mistake not, tells the same story with regard to the conduct of the Papist priests in the time of the yellow fever in New York.—[From a review of Mr. Carlyle's "Past and Present," in the (Protestant) Churchman of Philadelphia, quoted by the Catholic Herald of Sept. 21.]

ENCOURAGEMENT TO SPIRITUAL PRIDE AND PRESUMPTION.—The following is an extract from an advertisement in last Monday's Record:—"Wanted, a clergyman, full of prayer and of the Holy Ghost, apt to teach, and with a good report of them that are without, to aid in the ministerial labours of a church in the midst of a city."

LIVERPOOL.—ORDINATION AT ST. NICHOLAS'S CATHOLIC CHURCH, COPPERAS-HILL.—The Rt. Rev. Geo. Brown, Bishop of Iloa, and Vicar Apostolic of the Lancashire district, held an ordination at St. Nicholas Catholic Church, in this town, last week, being Ember Week, the time marked out by the rubric of the Catholic Church for the administration of holy orders. On Wednesday the Rev. John Gosford and the Rev. F. Clough, from Stoneyhurst College, were ordained deacons. On Friday the same gentlemen were raised to deacon's orders, and on Saturday they, together with the Rev. John Kershaw, from St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw, Durham, were ordained priests. The bishop was attended by the Very Rev. Thomas Youens, D. D., Vicar-General of the Lancashire district, and several other clergymen. This being the first Catholic ordination that has taken place in the town, there was a numerous attendance on the occasion.—Liverpool Mercury.

USHAW COLLEGE, Oct. 1.—The Rev. Mr. Arnold was ordained priest on the 23d ult. This being the day on which the Rosary Societies of our Blessed Lady are commemorated, the day was observed here with great solemnity.—Ibid.

The consecration of the Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe, as Bishop of Milene, in partibus, took place at Cork on Sunday last. The Right Rev. Dr. Murray, the consecrating prelate, represented Europe. The consecrated prelate, being Conductor of Bengal, represented Asia; Dr. Banini Bishop of Liberia, stood for Africa; and Dr. O'Connor, Bishop of Pittsburgh, for America. A curious coincidence.—Cork Examiner.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCHES IN DUBLIN.—It is gratifying to see, at the present moment, the great care and attention paid to the temples of religion in the Irish metropolis. The metropolitan church, and St. Paul's Church, have just been elegantly painted, and otherwise much improved, outside and inside. St. Michael and John's Church has been painted on the exterior, and a large and valuable painting of St. John the Baptist, and of St. John the Evangelist, has been placed near the altar. The handsome church of the ancient and venerable order of our Lady of Mount Carmel, Whitefriar-street, is at length about being finished, as to its interior, in a style of peculiar taste and beauty superior to anything on this side of the artistically and gorgeously ornamented churches of Munich, or the Madelaine at Paris. Too much praise cannot be given to Mr. Boylan, to whose exquisite taste and judgment Dublin is indebted for the introduction and execution of this beautiful mode of adorning churches. The good work will be completed, we expect, before the evening feast of St. Teresa, so specially honoured by the Order of the Carmelites.—Correspondent.—The Tablet, Oct. 7.

PUSEYISM IN IRELAND.—The Banner of Ulster says that Dr. Mant, Bishop of Down and Connor, had abandoned his objections respecting baptismal regeneration, and had consented to ordain the five gentlemen rejected on a previous day. That journal says, "We can neither assert that this rapid change has been wrought in the prelate's mind by a communication from the primate, nor contradict certain rumours of that purport which are floating about."—Ibid.

[VOL. VI.

THE DOUBLE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES OF PROTESTANT CONTROVERSIALISTS.

It is usual with the Advocates of the Anglican established Church, in their controversies with the dissenting Protestant sects, to adopt not only arguments but principles which they reject and disown in their controversies with Catholics; and Protestants of all denominations are often forced to employ, in defence of Christianity, the very principles against which they protested in breaking communion with the Catholic Church.

When Luther stood alone and opposed his solitary voice to the universal teaching of Catholicity, the term Catholic was of no value in his estimation, and he went even so far as to dislike it for a very obvious reason. He banished it from the Apostles' Creed, and substituted for it the term Christian, thus publicly confessing, that he had ceased to be a Catholic, though he hoped he was still a Christian. Every one knows how ambitious the Protestants of our days are of the name of Catholic, in some sense or other, and yet it is quite evident that if Luther, after he had made a creed for himself, ceased to be a Catholic, Protestants at this day, however numerous, have no better title than he had to that venerable name, which, from the beginning, distinguished the obedient children of the Church of Christ from their rebellious brethren.

Whoever has looked into the disputes between the Anglican Church, as by Law Established, and the multitudinous dissenting congregations which disown her authority and reject her ritual, must have observed the charges of inconsistency brought against Churchmen for their abandonment of those principles on which the Reformation was undertaken. Thus it happens, that a Church of England-man, arguing against a Catholic, acknowledges the written word alone of scripture as the sole rule of faith and morals, as the only standard of the theory and practice of religious worship; but when hard pressed by the dissenters for texts of scripture, he has recourse to tradition, to ancient usage, and the consent of nations. Thus it happens, too, that a Church of England-man is bound to obey his private judgment in opposition to the authority of the Catholic Church, but he is bound to subdue his private judgment to the obeying of the Anglican Church authority, lest he should incur the guilt of Schism by becoming a Dissenter.

This inconsistency is so general and so obvious that it is quite unnecessary to insist on it here at greater length. Let us see if Christianity itself can be defended by Protestants against Deists and Atheists, without the aid of Catholic principles. We quote from Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Scriptures (vol. 1st; Ch. 5, Section 6.)

"But even though all the difficulties that are alleged (by infidels) to exist in the sacred writings could not be accounted for, yet this would be no just or sufficient cause why we should reject the Scriptures, because objections for the most part are impertinent to the purpose for which they were designed, and do not at all affect the evidence which is brought in proof of the Scriptures." "To insist upon particular objections, collected out of difficult places of Scripture, without attending to the main grounds and motives which induce a belief of the truth of the Scriptures, is a very fallacious mode of arguing: because it is not in the least probable, that there may be a true revelation which may have great difficulties in it." "It is very possible for God to reveal things which we may not be able to comprehend; and to enact laws, especially concerning the rites and ceremonies enjoined to a people so many ages past, the reasons of which we may not be able fully to understand."

Thus far Horne against infidels; but if he were arguing against Catholics, he would proclaim, with Daniel Calcutta and the rest, that the Scriptures are as clear as the sun at noonday, and that the most illiterate are capable of expounding them without any fear of error. Unfortunately, Atheists and Deists are not the only persons who reject a true revelation; and although, according to Horne, it is a very fallacious mode of arguing, (against Scripture) to insist upon particular objections collected from difficult places of Scripture, without attending to the main grounds that induce us to believe them to be a revelation from God, yet this is the very fallacy that emboldens Protestants to reject, as uninspired, the Books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus, the Book of Tobias, and the first two Books of Maccabees. All these portions of revelation were numbered by the 3rd. Council of Carthage as canonical books of Scripture, and Protestants can no more reject them for want of evidence, than they can reject several Books of the New Testament, which they now admit to be genuine Scripture. They will never be able to give any reason, except the fallacy which Horne exposes, why they reject from the Canon of Scripture, the above named books of the Old Testament, while they admit the Apocalypse, the epistle of St. Paul to the Hebrews, the epistle of St. James, the 2nd of St. Peter, and the 2nd and 3rd of St. John. We invite the attention of our separated brethren, who think themselves justified in not embracing the Catholic faith because they can make objections to it, to the two following extracts from the same Protestant authority.

"Difficulties can never alter the nature of things and make that which is true to become false. There is no Science without its difficulties, and it is not pretended that Theology is without them. There are many great and inexplicable difficulties in Mathematics: but shall we, therefore, reject this as a science of no value or certainty, and believe no demonstration in Euclid to be true, unless we could square the circle? And yet this is every whit as reasonable as it is not to acknowledge the truth of the Scripture, unless we could explain all the visions in Ezekiel and the revelations of St. John. We must believe nothing and know nothing, if we must disbelieve and reject everything which is liable to difficulties."

If Protestants would calmly and dispassionately apply these principles to the doctrine of the real Presence in the Blessed Eucharist, as taught by the Catholic Church, we should not find so many of them endeavouring to overthrow the clear and obvious meaning of our Saviour's words at the Last Supper, by objections drawn from Metaphysics, and finally rejecting this most sacred and consoling dogma, because they cannot explain fully what they should not expect to be able to explain.

We leave the candid reader to decide whether the following extract, changing merely the names, may not be pointed as directly at Horne and his co-religionists as at the incredulous and scoffing opponents of Christianity, against whom it is levelled by our author. "Nothing is more frequent than the charge of superstition and credulity which is brought by modern unbelievers against Christians, for giving assent to moral evidence of such force as to amount to moral demonstration. Yet the fact is, that the charge of credulity attaches with unanswerable force to these very rejectors of divine revelation. For they admit that a few illiterate Jews, devoted to external circumstances and to a national religion, conquered their prejudices, and published a universal religion, which was free from the numerous rites and ceremonies of their nation; that they taught religious and moral doctrines, surpassing the wisdom of the highest heathens—subdued the power and policy of the Jews and Gentiles, speedily propagated their tenets among many nations, and conquered the pride of learning, without divine assistance." Protestants as well as infidels must answer this reasoning. For the former as well as the latter are constantly accusing Catholics of superstition and credulity for giving assent to moral evidence of such force as to amount to a moral demonstration (the evidence, for example, which proves that auricular confession and the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist have been received as of faith in the Christian Church since the days of the Apostles) while they themselves believe, what it is infinitely more difficult to credit,—that these dogmas, so repugnant to flesh and blood, and unheard of for many ages after the death of the Apostles, were propagated, as divine truths received from them, among all Christian people, with the rapidity of lightning, no one knows by whom, at what precise time, or by what agency, but without exciting the least murmur, or suspicion of innovation either on the part of clergy or laity. In one word, they must believe that all ages, ranks and conditions of Christians went to bed one night or other, some time before the reformation, all Protestants, Lutherans partly, Calvinists partly, Anglicans partly, Quakers partly, Jumpers partly, Muggletonians partly, not to mention the various distinctions of Puseyites, Low Church, Free Church and Moderate Protestants, and that all these, without the aid of divine assistance, forgot, on the following morning, their former differences, and merged all their disputes and prejudices in the unanimous confession of one faith, of a new faith, such exactly as that which the Catholic Church has propagated to the bounds of the earth, and which her devoted missionaries, to this day, continue to seal by their blood.

TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, DUM-DUM.

On last Sunday thirty persons, amongst whom four were females, received the temperance pledge, at the hands of the Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy, the Principal of the College of St. John. On this as on all other occasions, the Catholic soldiers at Dum-Dum evinced their zeal to promote every measure which tends to advance the moral welfare of their fellow-men. There is not, perhaps, a station in India, in which more order prevails and more attention is given to the duties of religion, than Dum-Dum. The happy effects of this good conduct are evidenced by the excellent health which the soldiers at Dum-Dum habitually enjoy. We are informed on authority that there are seldom more than two or three of them in the Hospital, and, for the most part, their sickness is not of an alarming or fatal description.

In the course of the week before last another East Indian Lady joined Father Mathew's Society at the Chapel of St. John's College, Intally.

CONVERSIONS.

Within the last week, a Protestant young woman was received into the Catholic Church in this Vicariate.

Within the same period two Native Baptists, one of them a Teacher and the other a Catechist or Preacher, applied to a Catholic Priest in Calcutta to be received into the true Church. They were found on examination to be tolerably well acquainted with the Catholic doctrines; but, in conformity with Catholic discipline, their admission into the communion of the Church was deferred for some time in order that their moral conduct and sincerity may be duly proved.

SERAMPORE.

The solemn annual feast of the Serampore Catholic Church will be celebrated on Sunday the 11th February.

The High Mass will commence at Eight o'clock, A. M. His Grace the Archbishop will preach on the occasion. After the Sermon a collection will be made to defray the expenses of the schools lately established at Serampore.

JOY-BELLS FOR ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

With feelings of joy and gratitude we have to announce that his Holiness, Gregory XVI. has been graciously pleased to present a set of Joy-Bells to St. Thomas' Church, and we feel confident that our readers will join with us in sincere and grateful acknowledgements to the Sovereign Pontiff for this fresh mark of kindness and condescension towards his children in this distant mission. The arms of His Holiness are impressed on each of the Bells, and they have been cast in Ireland by Mr. Sheridan, whose letter on the subject, addressed to the Editor of the Weekly Register, we transfer here from the columns of the Freeman's Journal:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE WEEKLY REGISTER.

Eagle Foundry, Church-street, Dublin.

SIR,—Knowing that you wish to encourage domestic trade, I beg to make known through your respectable paper that I am now casting a magnificent peal of joy-bells for the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, R. C. Archbishop of Madras and Bengal, to be forwarded from this by order of the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe, to the church of Saint Thomas, in Calcutta, East Indies, and as the third bell of the peal will be cast this day, at three o'clock, I take leave respectfully to invite all friends to home manufacture to call and witness the fusing of the metals and the pouring of the bell; at the same time they can be gratified by the chiming of those bells already prepared for the same destination.

I am happy to inform you that the splendid peal of bells lately erected in the steeple of Saint Paul's church, Arranquay, for the Very Rev. Dr. Yore, was rung for the first time on All Saints' Day, and gave general satisfaction to the community. These were the first peal of joy bells ever made in Ireland.

I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,
JAMES SHERIDAN, Bell Founder.

CAIRO.

We have been favored with the following extracts from an interesting letter, written at Cairo on the 19th December last.

"According to the promise expressed by me, in my letter to you dated from Point de Galle, I write to you these few lines from the capital of Egypt. Our voyage from the southernmost point of Ceylon to Aden was very quick, and, as usual, very comfortable. Old Captain Moresby is certainly very anxious that nothing should interfere with the good management of his ship, and the satisfaction of his passengers; he appears to me one of those eternal "Church in danger" men, who think that the world would be utterly ruined in the hands of the Papists. Of course it was out of his power to annoy us, yet several sharp disputes of pretty long duration we had together. The Doctor of the ship is of the same metal; certain it is, that his zeal carries him beyond the bounds of his profession, for he takes care of the souls and bodies of his passengers, and acts as amateur padre on board. The ship when under weigh has service twice on Sundays, and that in the Cuddy-saloon. We Catholics retired to our cabins for the recital of our devotions.

"The Hindostan is certainly a noble steamer; what a pity her accommodations have been made so numerous at the expense of ventilation and comfort. After a passage of ten days from Point de Galle, in the afternoon of Saturday 2nd instant, we cast anchor in the beautiful harbour of Aden. I think I tell you nothing new when I say, that the land surrounding this fine harbour, is nothing but bleakness and desolation. Mr. — and I went on shore, and rode to the town!! of Aden. There we met F. F. Seraphin and Foget. We arranged matters in such a way, that our party sailed from the anchoring place of the steamer (which is about five miles from the town) to the point nearest to Aden on Sunday (the following) morning. Here a palkee awaited the —, and donkeys the remainder of us. Yet the — could not be prevailed upon exposing his person to the dangers of a fall from a jackass, so he trudged away on foot. But soon the fatigue attending the going up and down steep mountains broke his fear: he mounted, and is now a capital manager and even admirer of the asinine race. We heard mass in Aden, and spent the day very agreeably with the clergymen. The town of Aden lies in a romantic looking valley, completely walled in by high, rugged mountains. Hardly a blade of vegetation is visible. The houses, or rather huts, are almost all of them made of straw-roof and walls. When the British army took the place it contained no more than 600 inhabitants. Security and employment have already increased them to 15,000 at least. Vegetables and fruits, even most delicious grapes, are brought in great abundance from the vicinity, which is fertile. The water is indifferent, yet the climate very healthy. The Government are pushing on the improvements of the place more and more.

The Bedouins are again under arms, and were at the time of our stay there assembled to the number it was said of 6,000. This caused the Military authorities to strengthen the outworks towards the main-land with about 100 Europeans extra every night. About three days before our arrival I was told they seized an Arab ship laden with warlike stores, bound for Aden. The Captain was put into prison, but declared that he was ignorant of the person to whom these dangerous weapons were directed, as he was given to understand that the owner would himself come on board and shew himself such by a certain secret sign. The evening of Sunday we feted Captain Moresby in the Parsee's hotel at Aden. Monday afternoon we were again under steam, and passed the straits of Babelmandel that same night in a most brilliant moonshine. The — and — were, with many other passengers on deck enjoying the sight. The mission of Aden is in a most deplorable condition.

We arrived off Suez towards evening on Sunday, the 10th instant. Next day we disembarked, and about 6 o'clock P. M. we were on the way towards Cairo. The hotels in Suez are most deplorable hovels. The Pasha is building a new one, which promises to offer some comforts to travellers. — and — were conveyed in a Van of Mr. Tibaldi's, to the tune of £12 a head, or £36 all three. These Vans are curious contrivances of cars running upon two wheels, two single springs, with the sides of canvass, very much like Roman butchers' cars. In these, 6 persons are jolted at a push from Suez to Cairo over a most frightful road. I took a dromedary for 10 shillings!! was pretty comfortable, and quicker than the Van. Since we are in Cairo we have done nothing but sight seeing on donkeys. The — enjoys it amazingly much. Yesterday we went to the Pyramids &c. but none except myself and the — went to the tip-top of them. The Rev. F. Leonardo is doing well, and labors bravely for the advancement of our holy religion. He has established two schools, and is a virtuous, zealous, and judicious missionary, well worth encouragement. After to-morrow, we intend starting for Alexandria." * * *

LETTER NO. VIII.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—I shall in this letter take up the thread of my last, viz. your Protestant Unity. If we look for you abroad, for instance in India, we shall find your "Protestant Tree" cut down to the very stump, a bare shadow of what it is in Europe;

we may perhaps only meet with the Church of England alone, with a sprinkling here and a scattering there of Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, and one or two more, but the great body of creeds remain snug in that nursery of Protestantism, Germany, or in that hot-bed of sects, England, or like creepers run fancifully wild in that rank and democratic country, America. This the Church "Catholic" of Protestantism, as you sometimes misnomer it, is a very different thing in Europe and America, to what it is in Asia and Africa, but even out here it assumes so many skeleton forms as to scare away the heathen. The Public Press is a fit index of the public mind, often the viva voce of the people. I met the other day in a respectable Indian and staunch Protestant Paper with the following apropos remark on unity; it says,—“No one can be better acquainted with the fact that unity is strength, than a Missionary to the heathen; he has to contend with the objections brought against the truth of the doctrines he preaches, arising out of the want of unanimity on the part of Christian Missionaries. Though in this country there are not so many religious sects as unhappily exist in our Father land, the Christian Church is still so much divided as to afford a handle to its opponents; we have heard it said over and over again by intelligent natives, that they should not hesitate to investigate the claims of Christianity if its preachers would only agree among themselves as to what Christianity is, but that so long as they saw so many different denominations keeping aloof from each other, and disparaging and depreciating one another's labours, they could not be brought to believe that our religion is the true one.” This is a long quotation, but it is worthy of being recorded, from its extreme justness and truth, and, I must add, candour. Here it is shown that the intelligent heathen draws a more correct notion of Truth—of its quality of Oneness, than does the professed European Protestant Christian; in fact, he reasons upon it more philosophically, or rather his judgment is not blinded by prejudice of education, or his passions warped by the contentious spirit of sects. You can easily get him to comprehend the idea of a one supreme being, as the author of all things, and the Father of Truth, but when you come to treat of the faith and the doctrines divulged to us by Jesus Christ and his Apostles, this “want of unanimity on the part of Christian Missionaries,” these contradictory religions—those inimical sects, mar all your arguments in justification of one Faith, one Fold, and one Baptism. He laughs (and well he may) in your face—he points with ridicule to your numerous sects, and you cannot but feel the bitterness and the truth of his observation; but what would the intelligent heathen think, and what could you say, were ministers of all the professed Christian sects in Europe—the whole offspring of Protestantism—and one of each would be enough to fill the largest ship, to come out to India! were he to see Quakers, Lutherans, Unitarians, Socinians, Jumpers, Plymouth Brethren, Independents, Irvingites, Antinomians, and scores of others, besides Episcopalians, Calvinists, Baptists, Methodists, &c. come but to convert the heathen! What, what, can be said of such mushroom Christianity? only that it is a burning shame to the Christian, a dangerous snare to himself, and a fatal evil to the poor heathen—a deadly stumbling block in his way,—a state of things that shut out the light of heaven from his sight. The Bishop of Salisbury, whom I cited in my last, thus speaks of it in his printed Sermon:—“How different, again, would be the effect upon heathen nations, were Christianity presented to them in that harmonious development in which it was set forth by the inspired followers of its divine author, and all who bear the name of Christians were seen united in one faith and one worship; instead of this, our present dissensions too often exhibit the nominal Church of Christ as a jarring assemblage of hostile sects, and thus divert the attention from the simplicity of truth to the complications of error,” p. 8. The italics are mine to note the truth and the force of those incontrovertible facts. A Protestant writer in India says in a running commentary upon this Sermon, “Alas! his remarks are too true; the Protestant Church is constantly dividing and subdividing itself, and its history since the Reformation is the history of one sect striving to convert to its views the members of other sects. The unity and union with which the spread of Christianity ought to be pursued, are diverted into a thousand separate channels; each sect labours for itself, and is jealous of the rest.” I read in the papers of the day, that a society established some years ago in the presidency of Madras, and called the “Indian Missionary Society,” lately became a sacrifice to the spirit of Protestant disunion; it had to dissolve or destroy itself, it died like the offspring of an unnatural mother which casts her own from her, for want of warmth and support; there was no love or affectionate unity there, yet one of the Missionaries said of it at one of its meetings, “This is just the society that is wanted among the heathen,” and why? why because, as a writer says of it, “for its Catholic Spirit—as it recognized no distinction of sects, and was approved of by Churchmen and Dissenters,"—but if it had had the true Catholic spirit, it never would have died so; its fate then tells its own story, that it carried from the commencement its mortal disease within it, because Protestantism gave it the breath of life. Can it be wondered at, therefore, that even intelligent and well educated heathen men, such as the late Rammohun Roy (who died in England) and others, have departed out of this life, if not pure Hindoos, infidel sceptics, and that others, like the present learned and talented Tagore, have remained so to this day. This Protestant blight, like unseasonable frost in spring, alas! nips and destroys every appearance of fruit and vegetation in the heathen world; the journey of such men to Europe must be indeed fatal to all hope of their conversion; they hear there the continual clash and the jarring noise of sects, and thus intelligent minds must view with disgust and some degree of indignation, people act so contrary to their profession. They hear them say there is but one Lord, one Faith, and one Fold, and yet they behold scores and hundreds of different and adverse folds, where the sheep—the people, will not meet or enter, no more than if a wolf, a royal tiger stood at the portal of each gate ready to devour them; even the beautiful unity of the Catholic Church herself is in a manner hid from the pagan world by these untoward and hostile sects crossing her path and standing in her way, like the sun overcast by clouds; the naked and the heathen eye can hardly distinguish her glorious orb through the thick and misty darkness around, so that nothing but a bright and strong ray of grace, shooting directly from on High, can show to the poor darkened mind of the heathen where this "Pillar of Truth," stands, or is to be found. I can again bring forward the Bishop of Salisbury as an evidence, and in confirmation of the above, as to the evil and fatal tendency of your eternal divisions, for, in page 9, he says, "It is difficult to overrate the stumbling blocks which in this manner the schisms of Christians (Protestants) place in the way of the conversion of the heathen world." Relative however to your diminutive and puerile form in India, you will meet with this significant remark in one of the printed letters, 12th May, 1826, of the late Bishop Heber. He says, "Except at Calcutta itself, and its neighbourhood, there is actually no sect worth naming, except the Church of England; all the Scotch who are worth having, when out of Calcutta, come to Church with us, and many Officers of that nation have been confirmed by me, as an indication of their purpose to join us entirely." Bishop Wilson, the present Metropolitan of Calcutta, says, in his last "Charge," "What instrument in the eastern world is so adapted to assist in this divine work (the illumination of the east) as our Apostolical Church, now happily for nearly thirty years established," mark only "thirty years," and it is now more than 1840 years since the command was given "Go, and teach all nations"—but I shall have to show to you presently that these good bishops have not had "the illumination of the east," all to themselves, that there are other "gospel lights" or Biblers who pronounce those luminaries pur-blind. As to the fashion or quality of your constitution as a Church, you may, I suppose, say of it, as your celebrated Dr. Hook says of the word "Protestant" as to its meaning Catholic, "that it is sometimes one, and sometimes the other, and always both together," that Protestantism is sometimes in its heterogeneous form of sects the Church of Christ, and sometimes so in its individual sects; such is the pliant and the lax nature of its unity, it is something upon the plan, though not so perfect, of those toy-houses which children have for putting together and pulling to pieces at pleasure, but are these fit habitations for man? No, no more than Protestantism, in its thus disjointed condition, or packed state, is suitable for the redemption of his soul. Your contentions indeed whether you constitute the Church of Christ in the aggregate or separately is the daily theme of your controversialists. Dr. Mountain, Bishop of Montreal, says, in his charge for 1842, that, "we have no business to make approaches either to Romanism on the one hand, or to Dissent upon the other," but this, "approach me not," is the frothy language of the High Church. The Rev. Mr. Drummond, of Edinburgh, one of the Episcopal clergy, conveys the sentiments of hundreds of thousands of his class, the Low Church, as Dr. Mountain does of his, when he expresses himself thus in his written protest against the new appellation given to the Episcopal Church of Scotland, "Reformed Catholic Church"—that this alteration seems to aim a blow against multitudes in this country, who, though not Episcopalians, belong nevertheless to 'Reformed Churches,' and are, in the best sense of the term, members of the Catholic Church," these "multitudes" of course include Quakers, Anabaptists, Irvingites &c. This is the latitudinarian unity of Protestantism, all denominations are jumbled together in one inexplicable whole; the current of Protestant belief is going with this party of divines: a Dr.

Bunting, in his address, at the city dinner lately given to the dissenting ministers of London by the "late" Lord Mayor, said that, "He considered it was the right and the duty of every man not only to worship his God according to the dictates of his conscience, but it was his privilege to endeavour to prevail upon others to join him in that worship." In vain do the "High Church" Bishops and their advocates strive now to stem the torrent of this "Christian liberty" or Socialism, or, as the Rev. Hugh M'Neile calls it in one of his letters, "this infidel liberalism, which implies that Revelation is useless." What indeed can be a more demonstrative or practical proof of your want of unity, as a collective body, than your eternal divisions and schisms upon the vital point of national education. The Church of England will have no interference as to her religious dogmas, children must be exclusively taught according to her principles and belief, where she has the power; equally touchy is the Kirk of Scotland, and all Dissenters are just as tenacious of their own religious opinions. I refer you to the fate of the late Factory Education Bill; the ball of contention like wild-fire is ever kept up, and thus the people remain uneducated in secular knowledge, and uninstructed in religion, because Disunion as a fury overruns the land, interferes with and mars the happiness of the people. Sir James Graham had to confess in Parliament that Protestant England is the worst educated nation in Europe as to the lower classes, and if you search for the cause and its root—if you seek for the cankerous core—you will find it deeply embedded in Protestant division. Thus England is breeding within her a many-headed monster, religious dissension, and which will overthrow in time all social order; she has the germ within her, and time will produce the fearful catastrophe!—unless, yes, unless she returns to Catholic Unity, for it is the shield of Kings, and the guardian of innocence, for spiritual anarchy, the begotten of schism, is ever the fomentor of temporal disruption and rapine. I must here mention a fact that in the colony of New South Wales, the Governor, Sir George Gipps, tried, in 1839, to introduce a bill through the legislative council for the education of the people there, but Protestantism tore it to pieces. Church and Dissent would not meet in the same school-room, because their religions did not tally. Sir G. Gipps, in his seat in council, observed, "In this country there is an Episcopalian here, a Presbyterian there, and next a Catholic; there were also it appeared Episcopalian of two sorts, Presbyterians of two sorts, Methodists, Baptists &c. presenting such a heterogeneous mass as never was seen."—Again, "And he entreated them (the council) to bear in mind that all the evils which now affected the country—all her calamities—might be traced, one way or the other, to the fact of religious differences. It was for them to say, by their vote this day, whether the happiness of future generations should or should not be marred with religious controversy and discord." His sincere and hearty appeal was in vain—the demon of disunion threw out the bill, and this was but an epitome of a similar bill in England the other day—The Factory Bill,—Protestant division producing the same evil effect in the western as in the southern hemisphere, leaving us to view the Catholic Church among the "heterogenous mass," "as the lily among thorns," as "his spouse," among the illegitimate daughters of schism. More of this in my next.

Yours faithfully,
C. A. C.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

To the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop,
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

MY LORD,—I have the honor to forward to you one hundred and twenty-four rupees four annas, being the subscription money for the ASSOCIATION DE LA PROPAGATION DE LA FOI, from July 1842 to December 1843. It is very long since I intended to forward the money, but I had no opportunity. It will be delivered over to your Lordship by the agent of Mr. Fallon, Commissioner's Court Registrar at Moulmein.

The ASSOCIATION DE LA PROPAGATION DE LA FOI was established at Mergui in July, 1841. I forwarded first the money to the Rev. H. Moré, and I received from him the Annals for the first year, viz., from July 1841 to July 1843, since that time I have not received any number of the Annals. I wish to receive two numbers in English and two or three in Portuguese, if possible, of each livraison. I am sorry to say the good œuvre is not prospering now at Mergui, owing, it is to be feared, to the non-reception of the Annals. I most earnestly beg your Lordship that all the numbers wanting of them may be sent to me as soon as possible. If they are not procurable in Portuguese at Calcutta, I wish to receive four numbers of each livraison in English.

I have the honor to be,

My Lord,

Your most humble obedt. sert.

APPEAL TO THE CHARITABLE IN THE CASE OF THREE CA- THOLIC ORPHANS.

Three Orphans, the children of deceased Soldiers of H. M. 13th Regt. were brought from Kussowlie a few days ago to Calcutta and sent to the Government or Protestant Orphanage.

The Archbishop Vicar Apostolic having claimed the children, on the grounds that they were Catholics, and the offspring of Catholic Parents, the Brigade Major most kindly ordered them to be transferred to the Archbishop's care.

On the delivery of the children to the Protestant Orphanage, the Sergeants Guitar and McCarthy, at whose expense and under whose care these children travelled to Calcutta, were paid by the Protestant Orphanage the sums laid out by them for the travelling charges of the children, viz. Sergt. McCarthy received Rs. 129-4-10 and Sergt. Guitar Rs. 93-0-3. On the transferring of the children to the Archbishop, the Sergeants just named had to refund the entire sum they had received. As it would be too great a hardship to these poor men to sustain so heavy a loss, especially as they are just ready to embark for home as invalids, and require means to procure what will make their long passage a little comfortable, the Archbishop recommends their case to the consideration of the liberal and charitable portion of the Community.

IRELAND.

(From the Morning Chronicle, Dec. 4.)

CALUMNIES ON THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CLERGY.

The Dublin Evening Post of Thursday, published a most complete and circumstantial contradiction of a statement recently made in the Dublin Evening Mail, to the effect that the Roman Catholic Clergy of a whole district in Tipperary had preached from a text in Ezekiel, on the expediency of exterminating the Protestant population.

The calumny first appeared in the London Morning Herald, and the Evening Mail adopted it, asserting that sermons of the same character had been preached in every other county in Ireland, and that the government and the police department had received full information on the subject.

It turns out that there was not a single particle of foundation for the statement; but, on the contrary, the priests have been actively engaged in inculcating peace and tranquility.

The Evening Post publishes a great number of letters from deputy lieutenants, magistrates, and clergymen, proving that the Roman Catholic clergy are incessant in their endeavours to maintain order, and suppress outrage. One of the letters published is from the Hon. F. A. Prittie, custos rotularum of Tipperary.

The Evening Mail of last night, notwithstanding this complete exposure of the horrible calumny against the Roman Catholic clergy, does not make the slightest allusion to the subject!

The Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe, Coadjutor Bishop of Bengal, has left Ireland for England, in order to make arrangements for sailing to his mission. His lordship is expected to return to Ireland in a few days.

The annual Synod of the Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland, is to take place in Dublin on the 14th inst.

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS IN IRELAND.

It appears that the Irish Government do not find that they can conveniently wriggle out of their state prosecutions, as was at one time erroneously supposed by their own organs. They have created a monster, and they must serve him. They have descended from the clouds of do nothing into the level open country of law, and being there they find the enemy before them, and they must stand the encounter. They have, in folly, if not in blood—

Stept in so far, that, should they wade no more,
Returning were as tedious as go o'er

They have tied themselves to the stake, and bear-like they must fight the course. Mr. O'Connell has them at a disadvantage. A legal defeat would not injure his cause one iota; while it would be fatal to them. If O'Connell should be condemned, as the Government organs avow they hope and expect, the Repeal excitement may be increased; he may be exalted into a martyr; the devotion of the people to him may be augmented tenfold: but nothing will have been done towards putting down the Repeal agitation. On the contrary, the conviction of O'Connell would only prove more clearly the necessity for Repeal, and would thus strengthen immeasurably the cause which it is intended to crush. A legal defeat would not injure the Repeal cause, because the cause does not depend in any way upon the circumstance that the Government can or cannot find juries willing to convict O'Connell; or rather it does depend upon this circumstance, in so far as the suspicion of the Government being able, as it is known to be inclined, to pack juries to ensure a conviction, is one very considerable grievance which Repeal is intended to annihilate. But, apart from this, O'Connell's cause being based on wrongs and supported by the millions who are wronged, depends for its success on the wrongs and on the determination of the millions to endure them no longer. It depends not upon legal power, but upon reason and justice united with law (now powerless) and arrayed against a power which usurps the name and functions of law. So long as these hold together, Orange juries may determine what they please—the agitation will not be shorn of one hair of its strength. The agitation is, as we said, built up in wrongs—can you overthrow it by heaping petty wrongs upon its head, and thus augmenting the substance of which it is composed? Perhaps you may, when you have discovered a plan for pelting down icebergs with snowballs, which do but stick to its sides and make it more ponderous and menacing than before.

But the Government depends for its prosperity upon semblances, upon fictions, upon miserable illusions, upon the appearance of a legal support. Take away this fictitious support, and down comes the monstrous and chaotic fabric prone upon the ground. If the Government is beaten at law, it has no resource to fall back upon. It has no hold upon the country. It depends upon a miserable minority. It is swelled out into an appearance of strength like a bladder by wind, and "a pestilent congregation of vapours." Make one hole in the bladder, let out the wind, and the nasty skin collapses and displays its real miserable dimensions. If their victim escapes them at law, then, having no justice, no people, no fact upon which to stand, they will indeed have sustained a grievous and irreparable defeat. Victory at this new game of theirs will be no victory, but defeat; and defeat will be a yet worse discomfiture. They will be puzzled how to employ their triumph when they have got it, while their adversary will be at no loss to turn his triumph to a good account. They are thus, it seems, playing at an odd game of double or quits, with the quits left out of the account. There are no quits at this game. It is all "double." The only alternative is "double" one way or "double" another; direct defeat or indirect; a milling blow right between the eyes, or a disastrous cross buttock. This is the beautiful position in which they have placed themselves. It is a lottery, with all losses. There are no blanks and no prizes here. It is "heads I lose, tails you win"—reversing the old conjuring trick. Place O'Connell in prison, you swell up the bulk of agitation, give its thews and sinews new strength, and stimulate it into unaccustomed activity. Set him loose by a verdict of "not guilty," you bring down ruin upon your own heads. The Lords of the Philistines have taken Sampson—not blind, indeed—but labouring at the public mill in the Corn Exchange. They have brought him out to make a sport of him; to have a giant-bait in one of the four courts. It will be an odd scene, if to ensure his destruction they allow him to pull down the pillars of the building and involve all the copartners of their guilt in a miserable and comprehensive ruin.

But we have not yet got to the result of the trials. The gossip of the curious in political affairs now turns wholly on the manner of the trials. Before what jury it is to take place? Is there to be a special jury to insure conviction, or a common jury to give the prisoners the appearance of a chance? Is there to be an ex officio information, or will the ordinary form of prosecution by indictment be adopted? Upon these topics there is at present an infinite variety of rumours, which it is of no great use to discuss. But, whatever be the probability in regard to them, one thing is certain—namely, that the choice of mode and means will be determined not by any consideration touching the best method of securing a just verdict, but by considerations touching the best method of securing a conviction. In ordinary cases a Government—that is, a decent Government—proceeds with some show of impartiality; bears in mind that though it is, indeed, plaintiff in a State prosecution, yet it is in reality the common trustee of all the subjects of the realm, and bound to exercise its enormous powers with a due regard to the welfare of the humblest and meanest of them; and, therefore, shuns everything that could look like an endeavour to extort a verdict, or cajole a conviction out of a jury. This is the case in ordinary trials; and to do this is as much the duty of the Government as it is for a private person to abstain from fingering his neighbour's purse or pocket-handkerchief. But in the present instance a different proceeding will be adopted; and the persecutors will kindly forget their duties as a Government to remember only their interests as plaintiffs.

Do you doubt this? If you do, listen to the ravings of the Government organs in Ireland, which boldly prophecy a conviction, and, beforehand, triumph in the anticipation of two years' imprisonment for Mr. O'Connell. No secret is made of it. The thing is publicly boasted of, with immense manifestations of joy. What the Government will labour to secure, is, not an honest trial, but a conviction in any manner. "Make money; honestly, if you can; but make money." This was the maxim of the rascally merchant. "Procure a conviction; honestly, if you can; but procure a conviction." This is the cry of the rascally organs of the Government; and this will be the policy of those whose organs they are.

Nor are we left to any very obscure circumstances of inference in drawing this conclusion. It was originally intended to proceed with special juries from the city of Dublin. However, the editor of the Dublin Evening Post happened to know something personally about Dublin special juries; and, accordingly, he applied for and procured a list of the panel from which special juries are struck, and printed the same in extenso. Now, the nature of the Special Jury panel, when made up according to law, will best appear from the following statement, which we copy from a recent number of this clever journal:—"The Jury Act qualifies to serve on Special Juries every man between the ages of twenty-one and sixty, having 10*l*. by the year in fee simple, fee tail, or for life—every resident merchant, freeman, or householder (inhabiting a house of the yearly value of 20*l*)—every merchant, freeman, or householder, having property, real or personal, to the value of 100*l*. From these classes the Jurors' book required to be formed. The returns should contain—in the first column, from every collector, the names of qualified persons in alphabetical order; in the second column, the barony, district, or place, in which each qualified person resides; in the third, the title, quality, or calling of each person; in the fourth, the nature of the qualification, whether freehold, leasehold, merchant, freeman, or householder."

If the list were made out according to the provisions of this Act, it would contain from twelve to fifteen thousand names. The number of twenty pound houses in the fifteen wards of Dublin, is eleven thousand one hundred and twenty-two; and the residents in these form only one class from which the panel should be made up. Well, with such a list in posse, what is the list in esse, as printed by the Evening Post? Why, if the Post had printed such a list as we have mentioned entire, it would, to the exclusion of all other matter, have occupied about three complete numbers of the paper. Such an outrageously long list would, of course, have been exceedingly inconvenient; accordingly, the actual list is cut down from twelve or fifteen thousand to the more moderate dimensions of from three to four hundred. Three hundred and eighty-eight names are all that are handed down from the good old times of the Tory corporation, in the place of twelve or fifteen thousand. Three hundred and eighty-eight! Many of this select band are disqualified by age; many by the cold hand of Death; and when, by these means, the list is reduced to something like three hundred, it appears that of this small number about three-fourths or four-fifths are Orange Protestants; and that the Catholics and Liberal Protestants of Dublin are only allowed to place on the Special Jury panel about sixty or seventy names.

Now, certainly, all this might be without any discredit to the Government, which is not accountable for the misdeeds of the old Tory Corporation. But it is impossible not to see, from the indignation of the Tory journals of Dublin, that the publication of this list, and the exposure of the injustice of making up a jury from such a panel, has disconcerted the Government, whose sentiments they speak.

"It is far from a usual thing at any time to publish, beforehand, the names to be found on the sheriff's list of the general panel; it is particularly invidious and improper at a time when the influences of terror or corruption may be brought to bear on the decision to which they will have to come." So writes the Evening Mail.

The Evening Post has very properly ridiculed this ridiculous pretence; but the absurdity of the thing is even worse than this clever writer has made it appear. Upon whom, we would ask—supposing terror or corruption to have any place in the matter—would these influences be made to apply? Upon the whole three hundred and eighty-eight, whose names are thus "improperly" and "unusually" published? or upon those twelve of them who may ultimately be selected to form the jury, and whose names are sure to be published, as a matter of course? It is so obvious, if corruption or intimidation are to accomplish anything, that they must be employed upon the selected twelve, and not upon the remaining three hundred and seventy-six that it is almost needless to insist upon it; but it is truly significant of the intention of these honest and profound statesmen, that they should be thrown into disorder by an exposure so utterly unimportant, if their intentions were really otherwise than discreditable. They were not ashamed to pack a jury from such a list if it had been kept secret; but rumour now declares that they have changed their intentions, and will be content with a common jury after all!

Perhaps some of our readers may think that we are not very charitable in taking it for granted, on such very paltry evidence as the nonsense of the Evening Mail, and the rumours of newspapers, that Lord Eliot and the law officers of the Crown are engaged in a conspiracy to muddy the stream of justice, and pervert law at its fountain-head. If any innocent reader, in the simplicity of his heart should adopt any such imagination, we can only give him the humble tribute of our praise for being so perfectly uncontaminated with, and inexperienced in the ways of this wicked world. If, however, he should refuse this compliment, and put us upon our proof, we regret to say that the past history of Lord Eliot, and of the present Tory Government, proves to demonstration that if these horrible perversions of justice be abstained from in the present instance—policy, not a sense of right, will be the actuating motive on this occasion. We know there are some people who hold a different opinion. They are disposed to believe even Irish Government, almost immaculate as to intention; and they cannot bring themselves to imagine that any Ministers will be so foolish and so wicked as to put false-swearing upon the table for evidence, or to bring false-swearing, or (what is the same thing) a known resolution to find the prisoners guilty, into the jury-box for a verdict. Very foolish and very wicked all this would be, no doubt. But, have we no examples of the same kind? Are these tricks wholly unheard of? Has the course of justice—even under the immaculate Lord Eliot—been always pure? And have we no prior conduct from which to judge of the probable policy of this besotted and beleaguered administration? Most undoubtedly we have. Lord Eliot is not now, for the first time, figuring before the world as the manager of a Crown prosecution. The readers of the TABLET may recollect some escapades of a like kind some months ago. But, lest they should forget, we take the liberty to refresh their memories.

(1.) And first, as to the delicacy of Lord Eliot's law officers in the matter of witnesses. Those who will have the goodness to look back to their files of this journal for the early part of last year, will there find several instances of a very peculiar style of delicacy in this matter. The practice of allowing the police to hold known ruffians in their pay, in order to spy out (or contrive) violations of the law is perfectly familiar to them, and is, indeed, a part of their ordinary practice. So much is this the case, that it was even defended by Lord Eliot himself in the House of Commons. Three cases of this kind came to light, in the King's county assizes of February, 1842; in one of which a fellow of the name of Levins, who was in the receipt from the police of a regular weekly stipend as spy, being found a little too keen in his pursuit of game, had to stand his trial for perjury, was convicted, and sentenced to transportation. At the same assizes there were two other cases of a like character, in one of which an infamous attempt to convict an innocent person of the crime of posting a threatening notice, was defeated by the transparent perjury of a Government spy, of the name of Thomas Combe. It is well to recall these little incidents, to show Lord Eliot's notions about the administration of law; but we give them only as introductory to the great case more immediately in point.

At the Longford winter assizes (1842) there were two Ribbon trials on Crown prosecutions. In these cases, as in others, there were informers giving evidence for the good of their Queen and country. One of these informers—as the case ran—had to prove the possession by the prisoners of unlawful pass-words. The prisoner in the first trial happened, as it appeared, to be no Ribbonman at all, and therefore there was a little difficulty in making out a case against him. But what will not the sacred thirst of gold, and the steady discipline of a Crown informer, effect in a case of need? In the instance before us the informer served his Queen and earned his wages, by slyly thrusting the papers containing the pass-words into his victim's pocket, and then charging him with the criminal possession of them. The first prisoner was charged with the crime by this Government officer upon oath. But the perjury and the villainy were proved upon him, and the prisoner was at once acquitted accordingly. Well, the second prisoner stood charged with the same crime, on the unsupported evidence of this proved perjurer. Did the Government on this account let go their victim? Not at all. They put this second prisoner into the dock—they put the proved perjurer and villain upon the table—they allowed him to repeat his perjuries—they allowed his villainy to be proved against him a second time—and then sent the innocent prisoner, as if he was a suspected character, to the jury for a verdict, on the maimed, monstrous, and abominable evidence we have just described. The man was acquitted, it is true; but the law officers of the present Government gave him a chance of conviction on the unsupported evidence of a proved perjurer, a manufacturer of false testimony, a conspirator against innocence by trade and profession. Taking this case into account, we see no reason to hesitate in believing that Mr. O'Connell will most probably be put on his trial on the already discredited evidence of Mr. Frederic Bond Hughes. Indeed, this case is far less glaring than that from the Longford assizes.

(2.) The second point is that of the constitution of the jury. And here we have another case to guide us from the same Halcyon era of 1842. Let us remark, by way of preface, that Mr. O'Connell is not on trial for his life. Even before his conviction, and when, for aught they know, he may be proved innocent, the friends of the Government only award him—in their wildest dreams of enthusiasm and as a fancy punishment—an imprisonment of two years. "Murdering Mansfield" himself, we believe, does not go beyond two years. We think it, then, a fair remark, that Lord Eliot's instruments will hardly be less scrupulous in this case of a misdemeanour than they were in a case of murder where the prisoner was on trial for his life. Arts which are thought lawful to noose an Irish Papist for the gallows, can hardly be considered overstrained when employed to get a Popish agitator under lock and key. Now mark what has been done in the way of compounding a jury, under whose verdict a poor wretch was hanged only last year.

Our readers, many of them—all our Irish readers certainly—recollect the case of the unfortunate Francis Hughes, who, in March, 1842, underwent, at Armagh, his third trial for the murder of a Mr. Powell, at Newtown Hamilton; who stood this third trial and perished under it. On the two former occasions, the juries had separated without a verdict, in consequence of a division of opinion—the Catholic jurors voting mostly for an acquittal, the Protestant jurors voting mostly for a verdict of "guilty." When the unfortunate wretch, whose innocence many persons strongly believe to the present day—was put upon his trial for the third time, the Crown lawyers departed from the usual course in the composition of the jury. They were determined to have a conviction. And accordingly they violated—not the law, but the modern practice—by challenging, without reason assigned or assignable, every Catholic on the panel, and by this means, with very little trouble, they got a sentence of death pronounced upon the prisoner, amidst his own protestations of innocence and the most frightful cries of "murder" proceeding from every part of a crowded court. Having reason to know, beforehand, that a Protestant jury would convict Francis Hughes, they took pains to get a Protestant jury, in order to convict and hang him. It is reasonable to suppose that they believed in his guilt, and that they set their ingenuity to work to procure a hanging jury in order that a murderer might not go free. It is, moreover, not unreasonable to suppose that they just as potently believe Mr. O'Connell guilty of sedition; and, therefore, that they will take no less pains to procure a jury properly disposed beforehand to secure his imprisonment than they took in the case of Hughes to ensure his performance on the gallows.

From these legal precedents we draw the conclusion that Lord Eliot's Government will not be nice about the employment of fit means to secure a conviction; will not be too apt to boggle at perjury in a witness—if perjury should come across their path; will not stick at trifles in securing a sound Orange jury to ensure a sound Orange verdict:—in other words, that the notion of a fair trial, in these cases, is a farce; that every point will be strained to bring about a conviction; and that the Irish people deserve to be slaves for ever if they leave their lives and liberties at the mercy of such an anti-National Government. Tab. Nov. 4.

THE PUSEYITES, THE ANGLICANS, &c.

PUSEYISM IN AMERICA.—Bishop Onderdonk, the Protestant prelate of New York, in his address to the late convention, said—"Mere Protestantism is not, necessarily, Christianity. That is not the ground upon which the Church is based. It is based upon its Catholicity—upon its evangelical character. This ground the Roman Church assumes to occupy. From this position it is the duty and obligation of Protestantism to drive her, and to show her that she has forfeited, by her abuses, the right to its occupation—to show her and to convince the world that it is our Church that truly deserves this name, by its protesting against those errors that deprived Rome of its enjoyment." And then the bishop went on to show that, but for those errors, Rome was right and Catholic, and that it was not true that mere Protestantism was true Christianity as taught by Christ and his apostles. This was one of the mistakes which the Christian Church laboured under. One of the errors that have followed the Reformation was the abuse of the right of private judgment, and the other was the belief that everything in the Church of Rome was wrong.—New York Freeman's Journal.

REASONS FOR ABUSING THE CATHOLIC CHURCH—Mr. Newman says—"If you ask me how an individual could venture not simply to hold, but to publish such views of a communion so ancient, so wide-spreading, so fruitful in saints, I answer that I said to myself, 'I am not speaking my own words, I am but following almost a consensus of the divines of my Church. They have ever used the strongest language against Rome, even the most able and learned of them. While I say what they say, I am safe. Such views, too, are necessary for our position. Yet I have reason to fear still that such language is to be ascribed, in no small measure, to an impetuous temper, a hope of approving myself to person's respect, and a wish to repel the charge of Romanism.'"

THE BISHOP OF LONDON AND THE ANTI-TRACTARIANS.—In consequence of certain innovations alleged to have been made by the officiating curate of Ilford church, Essex, some of the congregation, opposed to those strange forms, as unsuited to the primitive simplicity of the reformed religion, called a meeting of the parishioners, at which the subject was discussed with much warmth, and a memorial to the Bishop of London was agreed to, calling upon the right rev. prelate to interpose his authority, as bishop of the diocese, to put a stop to the practices complained of, their tendency being to drive from the church its most constant frequenters. The appeal has not been disregarded. The Bishop of London has forwarded to the memorialists a letter expressive of his sentiments upon the facts as detailed in the memorial, but without adverting to the abstract theory of the Tractarians. The right rev. prelate calls attention to the course indicated in his last visitation charge to the clergy of the diocese. In reference to the specific allegation of the introduction of novel forms, set forth in the memorial, his lordship is of opinion that the clergyman is not accountable, provided the service be formed in accordance with the Rubric. In such cases the congregation have no right to object to the introduction of those forms. If, however, the minister goes beyond the Rubric, he is open to censure. The prayer for the church militant, &c., should not be omitted, nor is the congregation entitled to object to it. The memorial averred that the minister had been in the habit of making the sign of the cross (a Popish form, which had given great offence to conscientious Protestants); that he usually read the Litany with his face towards the communion-table, having his back towards the congregation; that he knelt while placing alms on the table during the offertory service.

These matters called forth the right rev. prelate's censure upon the curate by whom they were performed, and the incumbent is condemned for having permitted the continuance of such irregularities unrebuked. In reference to a particular sermon preached in the parish church, as the memorialists alleged, maintaining the doctrine of transubstantiation, his lordship considers that the sermon referred to does not admit of that construction to the extent which the memorialists had put upon it. The letter, which is of very great length, concludes by enjoining harmony betwixt the ministers and their flocks, as the surest way to the promotion of their piety and sound religion.—Times.

UNION WITH ROME.—A correspondent of the Herald, in that paper of Monday, making reference to a previous letter of his, which we quoted at the time, says:—"It was then remarked 'that either the Romish Church must descend from her false position, and give place to the truths of the Church of England, or that the Anglican Church must go half towards and meet in her errors the Church of Rome; or else that no 'union' could be effected.' And so soon, alas! we have an example of the truth of this observation, in the secession of the Rev. Charles Seager, M. A., of Worcester College, Oxford, from our Church. This gentleman was Pusey and Ellerton Hebrew scholar in 1834, in 1836 his name appeared in the 'class list,' and in the same year he obtained the Kennicott Hebrew scholarship. Since that time he has been engaged in tuition (principally in Hebrew) at the university. Now, what I would ask is this: will not the secession of such a man as Mr. Seager be additional proof, even to the 'Tractarians' themselves (for to others there has been too much already) of the pernicious tendency, nay, we may almost say the certain danger, of their whole method of teaching? For, Sir, Mr. Seager is a learned man—has been one of their own party, and also a resident in Oxford; so that he, at least, cannot reasonably be thought to have misunderstood their views, or to have been unable to seek counsel from the heads of the Puseyite movement, in any difficulty which might have presented itself to him. Nevertheless, with all this learning and all these opportunities, he has seceded; and thus in this instance has 'Union with Rome' been effected!"

THE REV. W. SIBTHORP.—This gentleman continues to supply the newspapers with paragraphs. His plan for attaining notoriety is simple and ingenuous. It is, so far as appears by the extract published from his letters, to write to his different friends opposed accounts of his religious feelings and his sentiments concerning the Church of Rome. A letter recently quoted by Mr. Bickersteth, written by Mr. Sibthorp on the 5th of October last, contained this passage:—"My dear Bickersteth,—I deem it my duty to inform you that I last Sunday received the sacrament at St. Helen's, as declaratory of my separation from the Roman, and my return to the Anglican Church. I am, therefore, no longer a member of the Church of Rome. I have come to the conclusion after much deliberation, and the conviction I have is this—that the Church of Rome is the great harlot—the mother of abominations—an adulteress; and her worship is idolatry chiefly Mariolatry." But a letter addressed to another friend of a more recent date, Nov. 18, intimates that his opinions of Rome are much more favourable, and that he shall, probably, return to "the mother of abominations" again:—"I write to assure you, and all who address me now with the kindness you have done, that I am aiming to lie at God's disposal, at the foot of the cross, to do and suffer whatever be His holy will. I still praise, and unless I come to see things very differently, shall praise, the Catholic Church for her daily devotions, her hourly offices, her symbolic rites, her inestimable practice of confession, her intercommunion with the spirits of the just made perfect, her connection with the glorious company of the apostles, and her many wholesome and well-connected truths. Yes; my mind in all these things is unaltered; but as yet I dare not retrace the steps I have taken; and I trust, as you justly and devoutly observe, that my reasons, if they remain, may be found just and weighty when we shall all appear at the tribunal of God." This poor gentleman is evidently to be greatly pitied.

IMPIETY IN THE PULPIT.—The Reverend Stephen Langston, a preacher at St. James's Church, in Jersey, is stated in the Jersey Gazette, on the authority of T. M. Mahon, Esq., of St. Helier's, to have uttered horrible blasphemy against the most Blessed Virgin Mary; after reading the words "Henceforth all men shall call me blessed" he had the fiendish daring to speculate on the possibility that the chosen vessel of God for the redemption of the world might now be in Hell! This happened on June 28, 1842. On the 4th of June, 1843, he denied in the pulpit that he had used such words, or believed in such a possibility; yet on that very 4th of June, while denying this gross insult to the mother of his Saviour, while apologising for his contemptuous and uncharitable language towards Catholics, "he"—(according to Mr. Carus Wilson, who signs a letter to the Rev. Editor of the Jersey Gazette, containing the statement)—"the Rev. Stephen Langston, speaking of Thomas à Becket, and putting his opinion of him against all historians, thus, in my hearing, expressed himself:—'I—(Stephen Langston loquitur) I—look upon him—as—a—miscreant—that ought to have been hung—drawn—and—quartered.' Sir, I heard this with my own ears, and shuddered!! and for the credit of the congregation of St. James's, I will add, that this pulpit pruriency produced a shudder, involuntarily, among all the congregation around me."—Jersey Gazette.

BIRMINGHAM.—At a late meeting here the Protestant Bishop of Worcester bore the following unwilling testimony to the importance of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith:—"Although I am not one of those who are disposed to 'unprotestanise' (as it is called) the Church of England, still there is one point belonging to the Roman Catholics in which I think they are most worthy of imitation. It is well known that a fund has existed for centuries at Rome for the purpose of propagating the Christian faith amongst the yet unconverted heathen, and that this fund is amply supported by means of the Papal treasury. (Hear, hear.) Now, it is in this respect, and this respect only, that I think we cannot be too close imitators of the Church of Rome." (Loud cheers.)

MISCELLANEA.

CONVENT OF THE SISTERS OF MERCY.—We rejoice to learn that the Sisters of Mercy, recently established here, are winning for themselves the esteem and admiration of large classes of Protestants. Some pious Catholics have proposed an annual subscription, to be placed at the disposal of this holy sisterhood, and we sincerely wish success to so excellent a project.

PROFESSION AND RECEPTION.—On Thursday last, 26th ult., a solemn profession and reception took place, in the chapel of the monastery of Mount St. Joseph, Clondalken, by the Rev. Dean Meyler, V. G., in the absence of the venerable Archbishop of Dublin. There was solemn High Mass offered by the Rev. M. B. Kelly, C.C., assisted by the Rev. John Moore, and Rev. Mr. Kelly, chaplain to the monastery. A number of females were also present.

Miss C. Beveridge and Miss Teresa Fitzgerald, from this city, received the white veil at the Convent of the Sacred Heart, Montet, Switzerland, on the 22d of last month, from the Bishop of Geneva.—Limerick Chronicle.

PASTORAL INSTRUCTION FOR LENT, 1844.

TO THE FAITHFUL OF BENGAL.

PATRICK JOSEPH, by the grace of God and the favor of the Holy See, Archbishop of Edessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, wishes Health and Benediction.

BELOVED BRETHREN IN JESUS CHRIST,

Under the ancient dispensation, the people of God were obliged by the Divine Law, solemnly to commemorate, at stated times, in each successive year, the great events connected with their deliverance from the bondage of Egypt, and the introduction of the sacred code of religion, which the Almighty revealed to them through his servant Moses. This obligation was enforced with the most awful sanction, most especially with regard to the annual solemnity of expiation or atonement, when the children of Israel assembled together, in order to propitiate the Divine mercy and supplicate for pardon, as well for their individual transgressions, as for those of the community to which they belonged. "It," says the Holy Scripture, speaking of the feast of atonement, "shall be most solemn and shall be called holy: and you shall afflict your souls on that day, and shall offer a holocaust to the Lord. Every soul that is not afflicted on that day, shall perish from among his people."

"A man," they are the words of the Apostle Paul, "making void the law of Moses, dieth without mercy." How much more, do you think, he deserveth worse punishments, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath esteemed the blood of the testament unclean, by which he was sanctified: and who hath thus offered an affront to the spirit of grace? Now, Beloved Brethren, would it not be an affront to the Son of God, and of the blood of redemption, would it not be an affront to the spirit of grace, if we, who are, by faith, the true children of Abraham, if we, who glory that in the Catholic Church, among whose children we have the great happiness to be numbered, every iota of the Law and the Prophets has its consummation and adequate fulfilment; if, we repeat it, we should hesitate to join sincerely and cordially in the general humiliation and affliction, which Apostolic usage has enjoined for the holy and penitential season of Lent.

For, Beloved Brethren, in the Christian dispensation, Lent is the chosen period, which is set apart and consecrated by Catholic antiquity, to commemorate, in a most special manner, the atonement offered up on Calvary by the great High Priest and victim of the new and eternal testament, that atonement by which the hand-writing of sin and death which stood against mankind was blotted out for ever, and Heaven again thrown open to the children of Adam. It is in the language of inspiration, "the acceptable time," "the day of salvation," in which the faithful throughout the universe unite together to offer to Heaven that holy violence, of which the Saviour speaks, saying, that, "From the days of John the Baptist, the kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and the violent bear it away." It is, emphatically, the time, when it becometh us to bring forth fruits worthy of penance, when the sinner is laid to the sword, and when the awful threat is uttered, that every one who doeth not, shall perish.

forth good fruit, shall be cut down and cast into the fire.

Do not, beloved brethren, seek to exempt yourselves from the holy austerities of Lent, under the pretence, that your lives are not stained by the guilt of any open or scandalous transgression. The Royal Psalmist who mingled his bread with ashes and watered his couch with his tears, poured forth his soul in penitential prayer, and besought of God to cleanse him from his hidden sins, and to spare him because of the sins of which he was the occasion to his brethren. "From my hidden sins, cleanse me, O Lord, and from the sins of others, spare thy servant." Is it not written, that for every idle word, which man shall utter, he shall render an account in the day of judgment? And who is there among us, who would dare presumptuously delude himself, and assert, that he is exempt even from this infirmity. The Apostle of charity, St. John, proclaims, that, "If we say that we have no sin; we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us;" whilst, on the contrary, "If we confess our sins," the same inspired writer assures us, "that God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all iniquity."

What remains then, brethren, but, that, in accordance with the admonition of St. Paul, we judge ourselves, in order that we may not be judged and condemned by that terrible but just judge, of whom it is written, that "It is a terrible thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

Flatter not yourselves, beloved brethren, that the working out of your salvation is an undertaking easy of accomplishment, exempt from peril, one which demands at your hands no sacrifice, that is painful to flesh and blood. Every page of inspiration announces, on the contrary, that flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God, that the way to Heaven is narrow, that the path to it is straight, that there are few who find it, and, in a word, that if we would succeed in this awful enterprise, "We must strive to enter by the narrow gate, for many shall seek to enter and shall not be able."

How opposite is this doctrine to the apparently liberal, but really pernicious and mis-called charity, which the world commends. Let us listen to the world and to the maxims which are applauded by its children. What contrast is there imposed by Catholic Faith of morality, which will not be slighted and set at naught, as inconsistent with man's liberty and independence, and with the universal beneficence of God to his creatures. In effect, if what the world teaches on salvation be true, then the Saviour, instead of declaring that the way to heaven is narrow, the path to it straight and that there are few who find it, should, on the contrary, have proclaimed, that it was so broad and spacious, as that it could scarcely happen, that any should be so unfortunate, as not to find it, and walk securely on it to the region of everlasting happiness. But, so far from describing the way to heaven to be thus ample, Jesus Christ pronounces instead, that such is the distinguishing characteristic of the road which leads to perdition. "Wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there are who go in thereat. How narrow is the gate, and straight is the way that leadeth to life! and few there are that find it." Do you not see, beloved brethren, that the Saviour, when speaking on the difficulty of entering heaven, and on the fewness of those who are to be saved, makes use of language, which imports admiration and astonishment, as if he could not contemplate so awful a subject without emotion, without shuddering at the awful consequences of the terrific truth which he revealed.

Long before the Redeemer uttered this alarming announcement, the prophet Isaias compared the number of those to be saved, of those who are to lift up their voice and to give praise, when the Lord shall be glorified, when sin and death shall be no more, and the kingdom of the just shall be established, to the few olives that remain, when the olive tree is shaken out, or the grapes that are to be found, when the vintage is ended.

If these things be so, beloved brethren, is it not our duty, to strive, to labor earnestly, and with a holy emulation, that we may by faith and good works, make our calling and election sure? Is it not incumbent on us, to enter at once on the great work of our sanctification, and not defer our conversion from day to day, lest our lot be like to that of those unhappy persons, of whom the Saviour speaks, in the words which follow his holy injunction to enter by the narrow gate. "But when the master of the house shall be gone in, and shall shut to the door, you shall begin to stand without, and knock at the door saying, Lord, open to us: and he, answering, shall say to you, I know you not whence you are."

In the parable from which this sentence is taken, it is added, that they who were thus excluded, by reason of their delay, hoped to propitiate the Master of the house, by reminding him, that they had eaten and drunk in his presence, and that he had taught in their streets. But all in vain. The acceptable time, the day of salvation, the reign of mercy had, for them, passed away for ever, and had given place to the rigorous judgments of God's unsearchable justice: without hesitation, the same dreadful answer is returned; "I know not whence you are: depart from me all ye workers of iniquity."

Would it not seem, beloved brethren, that the Saviour, in speaking thus, had in view, to warn especially us, who have access to the divine banquet of his body and blood, and are taught by his living apostolic representatives the sacred truths of salvation, that if we abuse or neglect to profit by the holy faith we profess and the sacraments we partake of, our lot in eternity shall be as unfortunate, as if we never enjoyed these blessed prerogatives. Would it not appear, that the Saviour wished thus to warn us, not to flatter ourselves with the hopes of being sharers of our salvation, because we belong to the true Church, unless we comply with the injunction, to strive and enter by the narrow gate, and keep ourselves in constant readiness, to accompany the master of the house and enter the heavenly Jerusalem, whilst the door remains open, which conducts to that abode of eternal peace.

Among the Jews who were listening to the Redeemer's words, some would seem to have laboured under the delusion, that, because of their being a chosen people, or on account of their imagined moral excellence, they might claim to be exempted from penitential works. To this class they apparently belonged, who told Christ of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. "And he answering said to them: Think you that these Galileans were sinners above all the men of Galilee, because they suffered such things? No, I say to you, but unless you shall do penance, you shall all likewise perish. Or those eighteen upon whom the tower fell in Siloe, and slew them, think you, that they also were debtors above all the men that dwell in Jerusalem? No, I say to you, but except you do penance, you shall all likewise perish."

Thus, beloved brethren, from the lips of truth itself, we learn, that to repent, to bring forth fruit worthy of penance, is an obligation incumbent on all, without exception, and that to withdraw ourselves from this obligation, is to be necessary to our own eternal ruin. And, in reality, truth and consistency demand, that it should be so, for, as we have already promised, St. John assures us, that if we say, we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. But if we have sinned, we, like St. Paul, should rejoice in our sufferings and fill up those things that are wanting of the sufferings of Christ in our flesh." "You, therefore, brethren, knowing these things before, take heed, lest being led aside by the error of the unwise, you fall, from your own steadfastness. But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be glory now and unto the day of eternity." Amen.

REGULATIONS FOR LENT.

1. On Sundays neither Fasting nor Abstinence is enjoined.

2. Flesh meat is allowed once in the day on all the Week days of Lent, except Wednesdays and Fridays, Ash-Wednesday, the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday in Ember-week, (which occurs after the first Sunday in Lent,) and the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of Holy Week.

3. On the Week days on which Flesh-meat is allowed, it is to be eaten but once in the day; and Fish and Flesh-meat are not to be used at the same meal.

4. Fish, Eggs, and White-meats* may be used at the Collation or minor refectio.

5. As in the present regulations for Bengal, there is such a great departure from the severity of the ancient Canons, and even from the present discipline of most other Churches, it is hoped that the faithful will, in compensation, assist during Lent more frequently on Week days at the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass; and by Prayer, Spiritual Reading, Alms-deeds, and other works of corporal and spiritual Mercy, but, above all, by a devout and diligent preparation for the Holy Sacraments of Penance and the Blessed Eucharist, endeavour to redeem their sins, to recover Divine Grace, and to offer some atonement to the offended justice of God.

6. The time for complying with the Paschal precept, commences on Ash Wednesday (Feb. 21st), and closes on Trinity Sunday (June the 2nd).

7. On every Friday, the Litanies will be recited before the 7 o'clock Mass to supplicate God for the return of all who are separated by heresy or schism from the one true Church.

8. In accordance with the present established usage, the Morning and Evening Sermons on Sundays will be continued both at the Cathedral and at St. Thomas' Church.

9. On Wednesday evenings the Archbishop will preach at the Cathedral an English discourse. On Friday evenings the Rev. J. X. Mascarenhas will preach in the same

* White-meats means food made with butter, cheese, &c.

Church in Portuguese, and on Sunday evenings the Rev. A. Goiran in Bengallee.*

10. At the Catholic Chapel in Fort William, instructions will be given in English, on the evenings of Thursday and Sunday.

11. At St. Thomas' Church, Chowringhee, on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, the Rev. C. Havers, S. J., will preach in English.

12. At the Cathedral and at St. Thomas' Church, Divine Service will commence on the appointed evenings at 7 o'clock.

13. On Wednesday and Friday evenings the Devotions to the Passion of the Saviour will begin at 5 o'clock, at the Church of the Sacred Heart, Durrumtollah.

14. Instructions and Devotions will commence at Dum-Dum Chapel on Tuesday evening at 6½ o'clock.

This Pastoral shall be read from the Pulpit on Sexagesima and Quinquagesima Sundays, during the Parochial or solemn Mass, and affixed to the door in all Churches, Chapels or Oratories, which exist in the parts subject to our Jurisdiction.

Given at the Cathedral House, Calcutta, the seventh day of February, A. D. 1844.

THE VERY REV. DR. KELLY, LATE VICAR GENERAL OF BENGAL.

We are happy to observe, that a beautiful Marble Tablet has been erected in the Cathedral Church to the Memory of the late Dr. Kelly, Vicar General of Bengal.

This appropriate tribute to departed worth is but one of many instances of the good taste and generosity of the Lackersteen Family, at whose expense it has been erected, and the workmanship is highly creditable to the sculptor, Mr. Weaver.

A concern for the honor of the dead is not only prompted by the finest feelings of our nature, but is hallowed by the usages of religion; the example of the saints, and the records of inspiration, both under the Mosaic and Christian dispensations. The scripture informs us of the concern which Abraham manifested for the honorable interment of Sarah, his wife, and the place of Abraham's own interment, as well as that of the Patriarchs in general, of the Kings and Prophets of old, is also recorded.

An angel from God assured the good Tobias that the charity which he exercised in burying the dead, made his prayers acceptable to God; and in Ecclesiasticus, the duty of honoring the memory of the dead, is joined to the most sacred duty of almsgiving. "Stretch out thy hand to the poor, that thy expiation and blessing may be perfected. A gift hath grace in the sight of the living, and restrain not grace from the dead."

The piety of Joseph of Arimathea and of Nicodemus who embalmed and interred with becoming honor the body of the Redeemer, is commended in the New Testament; and neither the example nor commendation of this refined and disinterested piety has been lost on the faithful followers of Christ at any period of the Christian era. It is not necessary to refer to ecclesiastical history to bring to our readers' recollection the reverence with which the faithful have ever regarded the remains and the tombs of the martyrs and confessors, and of those pious dispensers of the mysteries of God, who, like Saint Paul, instructed their respective flocks in the Gospel of peace, not for filthy lucre's sake, not as a hireling or as a pedagogue, but as a father in Christ.

We, therefore, congratulate the Catholic community of Calcutta on the Memorial lately erected in the Cathedral Church to honor the name, and perpetuate amongst us the memory of an Ecclesiastic, whose virtues and services to religion should never be forgotten; and we beg leave, in their name, to thank the Lackersteen Family for the compliment paid, no less to the Catholic body, than to Dr. Kelly's memory, by the erection of this Tablet.

Scarcely had Dr. Kelly's death been heard of in Madras, (the scene of some of his most splendid exertions), when the Catholics of that city displayed the most lively feelings of gratitude for his services, and the finest dispositions imaginable to do justice to his memory. At a meeting of their body, held in May 1842, at which T. G. Clarke, Esq., (an individual of great public spirit) presided, it was unanimously resolved to erect, by subscription, a monument of their sense of his worth and services, which should cost at least 600 Rupees; and, although we have not heard of their laudable intentions being realised, we are certain that this has not happened through indifference or want of inclination on their part, as the subscription list showed an amount little below 600 Rs. on the very day the meeting was held.

We are confident, therefore, that the project is not lost sight of in Madras, and that the day will come when a more costly tribute will be there paid to Dr. Kelly's memory, (finer it could not be) than the elegant and lasteful Tablet which bears his name in our Cathedral in Calcutta.

Considering the frequency and rapidity of the communication now existing between Madras and Calcutta by steam and otherwise, and the well known reputation of Mr. Weaver of this city, as a sculptor; we think we might be allowed to remind our fellow Catholics of the Sister Presidency, respectfully, of the facility thus afforded them of giving effect to their very commendable intentions, in a manner worthy both of themselves, as a numerous and respectable community, and of the distinguished ecclesiastic whose memory they propose to honor.

If this suggestion, which, we submit with all possible deference, should be adopted, we need not add, that of course the inscription as well as the dimensions and plan of the future Tablet, and all other practical requisites should be transmitted to Mr. Weaver, who could not otherwise be expected to undertake the execution.

The following is the inscription on the Tablet, just erected in the Calcutta Cathedral:—

TO THE MEMORY OF
THE VERY REV. WILLIAM KE ^{re-} ^{that} ^{They} ^{must,}

Late Vicar General of Bengal,
A native of Wexford, in Ireland,
Born in 1804,

Professor of Belles Lettres

AN ANA-BAPTIST.

The following letter from a Protestant Gentleman of the Established Church to a Catholic Clergyman, will be read with peculiar interest:

"The bearer of this, named _____ has been and is an Ana-Baptist for a long time, and now from some circumstance he thinks that his sect of parsons are come out only to make money, and do not care for their flock. As he is an inhabitant of Intally he has asked me to give him a few lines to you, that you may get him instructed in our faith and doctrines (in the Bengallee Journaage which he can read) of the Catholic Church, of which he would like to become a member, I think seems to have heard that some of his brethren have preceded him, and states that others will follow him.

"I humbly trust that the Lord will bless your endeavours in enlightening him to his conversion, and that you may be the means of his eternal happiness and of thousand others in that neighbourhood: so that the Baptist Pond he kept always dry!" Yours respectfully and much obliged servant,

Calcutta, Feb. 6, 1844.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The following extract of a letter, dated 7th November last, from Bishop Griffith, Vicar Apostolic of the Cape of Good Hope, we have been favored with from his Grace, the Archbishop:—

"Again I have the felicity of greeting your Grace through Captain Roome, with whom I had not an opportunity of settling accounts, when I closed my last letter to you, per Steamer. I afterwards learned from him that we Catholics here were still more indebted to your generous people of Calcutta by five pounds which he handed me, in addition to the Bill, which gave £38. 18s. 3d. so that £43. 1s. 8d. should have been the sum of my acknowledgment. I, therefore, take the present opportunity of declaring our increased gratitude, and still deeper sense of what you have done for us."

SERAMPORE.

We are requested to remind our readers that the annual feast of the Serampore Catholic Church will be celebrated to-morrow, Sunday, the 11th February.

CONVERSIONS.

During the last week a young English Protestant Gentleman and two Native Baptists have declared their resolutions to embrace our holy Faith and requested instruction.

IRISH CATHOLIC SOLDIERS IN BENGAL.

Our readers will have noticed in our last issue (page 64) one Bequest of Rupees ninety and another of Rupees forty-seven, left by two Irish Soldiers lately deceased, the former bequest for the Society of the Propagation of the Faith, the latter for our Orphanage. We want words to express our admiration of the lively faith, charity, and zeal for religion which animated these humble but faithful children of St. Patrick. We are sure that our pious readers will all join in the holy prayer of the Church for their eternal repose. Requiescat in pace.

VESPERS.

ST. FRANCIS DE SALES' EXHORTATION TO ATTEND TO VESPERS.—"BESIDES hearing Mass on Sundays and Holidays you ought also, O Philothea, to be present at Vespers, and other hours of the divine office, as far as your conveniency will permit. For as these days are dedicated to God, we ought to perform more acts to his honour and glory on them than on other days. By this means you shall feel a thousand sweetnesses of devotion, as St. Augustine did, who testifies in his Confessions, that hearing the divine office in the beginning of his conversion, his heart melted into tenderness, and his eyes into tears of pity. And indeed, to speak once for all, there is always more benefit and comfort in the public offices of the Church, than in private devotions, God having so ordained, that community should be preferred before all kinds of particularity. I say the same of all sorts of public prayers and devotions, which we should countenance as much as possible with our good example, for the edification of our neighbour, our affection for the glory of God and the common intention." Introduction to a Devout Life, Book i. chap. xv.

The Rev. Mr. Mullock, who was sent some time since to Rome on business of his order, has been appointed Superior of the Church of St. Francis, Dublin, and the Rev. Mr. Cuddy has been appointed to superintend the Waterford Convent.—Ibid.

THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY—STATE PROVISION.

We need not direct attention to the resolutions of the Catholic Hierarchy of Ireland, which we elsewhere insert. They are of the most vital import. They are of the most decided character. They set the question of a state provision for the Catholic Clergy of Ireland at rest for ever. A generous and disinterested purpose is in these resolutions, rested upon high and holy grounds. The Hierarchy of Ireland have resolved that they for themselves, and the clergy, who are spiritually their subjects, shall generously attach themselves to the fortunes of their people. They have devoted their services to those flocks, with an entire abandonment of self. They will weep with their misery; they will rejoice with their good fortune. In their hour of trial, they will be found sustaining them. In their day of success, they will partake their triumph. It is the determination that they here express which has won for the Catholic Clergy of this country the most transcendent influence—it is the perseverance in that determination which will enable them to retain it. Their power is great, but they prove themselves able to control it. Their position is exalted; but, with the full sense of that exaltation, they evince the humility by which alone they can permanently retain their station.

And what can be more disinterested than the conduct of those illustrious Prelates? They reject all connexion with the state, though that must bring them power and influence. They resign all temporal interests, though these must be dear to the heart of man. They forego all personal advantage, though it is hard to abandon all thoughts of self. No doubt a state provision would be gladly given them. An ample and an independent state provision would no doubt be offered them. But they regard it not—nay, they reject and despise it. They reject it as a temptation—they despise it as a bribe.

The assembled Prelates of the Irish church have taken in this matter high and holy ground. They might have repudiated the notion of a state provision coming from their enemies. They might have proclaimed their fears that those enemies meant them no kindness in thus seeking to bind them by golden links. They might well have felt persuaded that they who stripped them first, and then taunted them with their poverty, would never give them wealth for any but an impure purpose. They might easily have concluded that those who cease not to misrepresent them—who perpetually vilify and defame their characters and their faith, should have some sinister object to serve when they suddenly became calm and mild, forbearing and considerate. The Prelates of Ireland might easily conclude that they who insult them by the assertion that they should be paid, “not to teach religion, but to cease to preach rebellion,” cannot intend them honour. Thus would they have abundant grounds for the rejection of all overtures from such a source. But the Hierarchy of Ireland thought not of insults—they heeded not the defamation—they were regardless of the vituperation poured upon them. They remembered not that they were men, but that they were pastors of the church; and they proclaim, not that they will receive no favour from those now in power—not that they will not listen to any proposition from the present government, but “that they will resist,” now and always, “every attempt that may be made to make any state provision for the Catholic clergy, in whatever shape or form it may be offered.” Like true champions of the faith, they consider not their own wrongs, but they remember their religious obligations, and they avow their determination that neither through them nor in their time shall the faith which was delivered to them from their predecessors in the episcopacy be ever tainted by a cancerous connexion with the state.

The country will rejoice that the question is thus set at rest for ever. The people will more fondly and trustingly lean upon their attached and faithful pastors. —The Weekly Freeman's Journal, Nov. 18, 1843.

MEETING OF THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY.

At a General Meeting of the Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland, held in the Parochial House, Marlborough-street, on the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th of January, 1847.

The Most Rev. Dr. MURRAY in the Chair, The following Resolution was proposed and adopted:—

“Resolved—That, alarmed at the report that an attempt is likely to be made during the approaching session of parliament, to make a State Provision for the Roman Catholic Clergy of Ireland, we deem it our imperative duty not to separate without recording the expression of our strongest reprobation of any such attempt, and of our unalterable determination to resist, by every means in our power, a measure so fraught with mischief to the independence and purity of the Catholic religion in Ireland.”

At a General Meeting of the Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland, held in the Presbytery House, Marlborough-street, on the 9th day of November, 1841,

The Most Rev. Dr. MACHALE in the Chair, The following Resolution was unanimously adopted:—

“That his Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Murray be requested to call a Special General Meeting of the Prelates of all Ireland, in case that he shall have clear proof or well-grounded apprehension, that the odious and alarming scheme of a State Provision for the Catholic Clergy of this portion of the empire be contemplated by the Government before our next General Meeting.”

At a Meeting of the Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland, held in Dublin on the 15th of November, 1843,

The Most Rev. Dr. MACHALE in the Chair, It was proposed by the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, and seconded by the Most Rev. Dr. Slattery, and,

UNANIMOUSLY RESOLVED,

“That the preceding Resolutions be now republished, in order to make known to our faithful Clergy and People, and to all others concerned, that our firm determination on this subject remains unchanged; and that we unanimously pledge ourselves to resist, by every influence we possess, every attempt that may be made to make any state provision for the Catholic Clergy, in whatever shape or form it may be offered.”

LETTER FROM THE REV. DR. MILEY TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

"We do not seek to pay the Roman Catholic clergy as priests, but as public officers, interested by the liberal assistance afforded to them in the maintenance of the national tranquillity. We offer them a salary, therefore, by means of which they may be released from the tyranny of a rude and reckless multitude, and for which the fair consideration is, not that they shall continue to preach Popery, but that they shall no longer preach rebellion."

"It appears to us that such a measure would be the natural means of introducing members of respectable families into the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland, instead of candidates for orders of low station; (the root of the whole evil is this)—Maynooth contains scarcely any gentlemen."—Times, Nov. 9, 1843.

SIR,—The Catholic clergy of Ireland have had to endure no scanty amount of vituperation and slander at your hands; you have assailed them repeatedly with imputations and epithets, the foulest that could be supplied from the recesses of a diabolical imagination: demons they are, no less, disguised in sacerdotal vestments, or you are a libeller of the most unblushing stamp.

Ought the clergy of Ireland repine at this, or do they repine? Forbid it heaven! Their Divine Master and Model, was not the worse abused and vilipended—overwhelmed by the satellites of Pilate, Herod, and the Sanhedrim, with such atrocities, that even your brutality, in comparison, assumes the air of bland and good-natured pleasantry? Repine! no; why should they not rather rejoice, as if it were not written—"Blessed are ye, when they shall revile you, and persecute you, and speak all that is evil against you, untruly for my sake—be glad and rejoice, for your reward is very great in heaven."

Yes, it is true, it is, in fact, notorious, that you have been long and zealously endeavouring to mantle our priesthood in disgrace, and thrust it forth, thus crowned with opprobrium, to be mocked and execrated by the empire. You now, in your journal of the 9th instant, write us down as traitors; as a gang of base-born, selfish, incorrigible anarchists; or more hateful still, as a hierarchy of impious hypocrites, who handle the Gospels only to foment rebellion. Nevertheless, our retaliation shall amount to merely this:—"May God forgive you, for you know not what you say;" and I, as one of the thus outraged, shall even undertake to show that your delinquency, like that of your prototypes, is as much mitigated as it can be, by ignorance—by ignorance respecting the matters you pronounce upon—of the grossest description; but whether sincere or stimulated, I decide not, leaving that between yourself and your Eternal Judge.

The root of all evil in Ireland, you say, is this: "Maynooth contains scarcely any gentlemen;" and you would remedy this evil by holding out such bounty as would be "a natural means of introducing members of respectable families to the ranks of the clergy."

The meaning you attach to respectability we know; (a) but what do you mean by the term

"gentleman?" Shall an eagle intellect, a spotless character, charity, and zeal for beneficence as glowing as a seraph's, be sufficient? No: we regard it is a money matter, and nothing else; no other test but property is ever recognised in England. Those attributes of moral and intellectual pre-eminence of which you speak, the great and good God may bestow; but in England it is Mammon alone can make a "gentleman."

Well, then, supposing that in Maynooth there be "scarcely any," pray were there many of this class among the twelve Apostles? How many of these were selected for their respectability? Oh, what an oversight it must appear to you, that in constituting the Apostolic college there was not something tantamount to a fifty-pound test; so that there might have been in it some sprinkling, at least, of "gentlemen." But alas! they were every one "paupers," persons of "low station." Have a care, Sir, that in seeking to insult those whom you are pleased to pursue as enemies, you have not become guilty of aspersing the wisdom of your Saviour. He did not say, "Blessed are the monied interests;" the wealth on which you would insist as a qualification. He denounced as an impediment:—"Go," He said, to the young man who had much riches, "Sell all that thou hast, give it to the poor, and then present thyself; for, my disciple—one of my own chosen lot—you cannot be, until you have ceased to be a gentleman, a man of property."

Again, if it be calamitous that "in Maynooth there are scarcely any gentlemen," how woful the condition of Christianity in St. Paul's time? "See your vocation, brethren," he says, "there are not many wise, according to the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble;" in a word, it was with the Apostolic church in that day as with Maynooth now: there were in it "scarcely any gentlemen;" and this continued to be cast as a reproach at the Christians by the Pagans, the government, writers of the three first ages, precisely as you hurled it at us in your paper on Thursday last.

The Apostle tells us the reasons why heaven decreed to select the clergy from the poor and the humble, rather than from the purse-proud classes, as you would order it; you may refer to them, I trust with benefit, in the first chapter of St. Paul's first letter to the Corinthians, from the 17th verse to the end. But independently of the motives (adorable and magnificent) then unfolded, must it not have been obvious to common sense itself that the work cut out for the Apostles and their successors was not of a character to be entrusted to hirelings, to a clergy of your respectable mammon-loving type? It might have been otherwise, perhaps, had the commission been to teach Chesterfield's letters to the heathen world, and not the gospel; to form Epicureans instead of Christians; instead of planting the cross of Christ upon the capitol to erect the temple of Jove upon Mount Calvary. How would your daintiness, starchy respectabilities have figured in the catacombs, on the gridiron, or under the fangs of the Hyrcanian tiger? To be beaten with rods, to be exposed to every hardship "in journeying often in perils of shipwreck, in perils of robbers, in perils in cities, in perils in the wilderness, to be hoisted and reviled, and maltreated as hateful, the very offscouring of the earth; all this in labour and painfulness, in much watchings, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness,"—surely, Sir, you will not say that this was treatment or an occupation fit for "gentlemen;" oh, no it was fit only for such "operatives," as St. Paul.

But, Sir, your darling theory of recruiting the clergy from monied men was realised at length. With the introduction of feudalism it very naturally triumphed; and from the year nine hundred, or thereabouts, to the middle of the eleventh century, the parochial clergy of Christendom, the bishops, and even the popes, were all, with lamentably few exceptions, gentlemen—men of rank and fortune—attracted to the sanctuary by no other "consideration" than that very one by which you propose (in charity, no doubt,) to provide a respectable, gentlemanly style of clergy for "that superstitious and demoralized mob," the Irish. Now, how fared it with Christ's vineyard under this system of clerical optimism of yours? Why, Sir, this tenth century was an age of iron, of lead, of Sodomitic brimstone, of asæfæta, hell-fire, and opprobrium for the church. Red-handed miscreants, with high-sounding titles, plumes in their helmets, and quarterings upon their shields, had almost everywhere reduced the Spouse of the Saviour to the condition of a handmaid, and, standing in the holy place, made merchandise of all that was most sacred to their courtiers and barons, who purchased only to make profit by a traffic of retail. "Never, certainly, in any other age," exclaims his eminence the illustrious and devout Baronious, "was the church, to all appearance, in peril so imminent, and obvious of perishing, as in this (b); for all that she had hitherto to suffer from Pagan emperors, from schism, and heresy, may be esteemed, in comparison, a sort of child's play (usus quodammodo puerorum)—nay, in a high degree beneficial, inasmuch as, thereby, her truth and heavenly charms were made brighter, and new lustre accrued from each successive triumph. But what execrable, and for ever-to-be-abominated indignities had not this immaculate spouse to suffer, when most cruel tyrants (tyranni sævissimi) usurped the election even of the Roman pontiffs; and, proh pudor! proh dolor! forced monsters of immorality into that chair of Peter, which is revered by the very angels."

Thus, Sir, it is by your Protestant principle of subjugating the clerical to the secular power, that we came even by our bad Popes. Their office was no more contaminated by their crimes, it is true, than was the high priesthood or the apostleship by the enormities of a Caiphas or of an Iscariot; and what renders more evident than perhaps any other fact, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the church during "all days," is this, which is notorious, that not one of these dissolute livers ever deviated in doctrine from the ancient faith. But under such auspices as you are fain to establish over our long-persecuted, but, thank Heaven, uncorrupted church, there flourished unblushing simony and concubinage, with their monstrous progeny of evils, until the son of a poor tradesman, of no "respectability," a person of "low condition," (his name was Hildebrand), rising up, under the title of Pope Gregory VII., smote down that tyrant feudalism with the bolts which Christ had armed him with, and, receiving the scourges from his hand, drove out the money-changers, lay and clerical, from his house. For what other object but to make head against these ever-recurring attempts to mammonize religion, was it that the mendicant, "pauper," orders were raised up, at various intervals, by Providence? Can you deny that Luther, a peasant's son, derived his power and success from the fact, that the church—especially in Germany—had been long and almost exclusively served (?) by a clergy composed of gentlemen—nay, of princes, barons, and feudal lords?

And mark, how blind to your modern improvements is Catholicity; how incorrigibly she clings to that old-fashioned system that prevailed even in the first age; for the holy Synod of Trent, in pointing out to bishops the class of candidates they are to select for orders, expressly enjoins that they be the sons "chiefly of the poor"—"Pauperum antem filios præcipue eligi vult," is the sublime and emphatic ordinance which chimes so admirably with that divine voice from the mountain—"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

No, Sir, instead of holding out a high bounty, as you would do, to attract the "gentlemen," the Catholic church will merely tolerate their services. To the sentence above quoted, the holy Synod adds—"Nec tamen ditiorum excludit;" that is, though a preference is to be given to the "sons of the poor," nevertheless the sons "ditiorum" of "monied men" are not to be excluded (c).

Nor will she have them at all until they doff their stars and garters, and such other gauds of heraldry. It was customary with St. Ignatius to leave those candidates who came to the novitiate bedizened in all the gala of nobility, to wear their finery until it became sadly tarnished, and when in this soiled and tattered plight, to send them with a wallet as mendicants through the streets they had many times and oft paraded in pomp with liveried escorts, and even to beg a pittance at the gates of their ancestral palaces. This, Sir, to you no doubt is "foolishness." It is, however, the wisdom of Christ crucified, who was "folly to the Greek, and to the Jew a scandal;" and it was thus that missionaries were disciplined who knew how to tread in the footsteps of the Apostles; not only to preach the gospel but to die for it. While, like her Lord, she prefers the poor, delights "from the dunghill to exalt the pauper (provided he be gifted with the nobility of intellect and virtue) that she may seat him side by side with princes, yea, with the monarchs of the earth;" the church can still point with exultation to scions of the highest aristocracy, and of the most wealthy houses, as shining saints—with distinguished lustre in the fasti of her a De Salis, a Francis Borgia, a Xavier, a Loyola, a Saint Charles Boromeo, a Saint Andrew Orsini, a Saint Philip Neri, not to go back to a Thomas of Aquino, a Domenigo de Gusman, an Anselm, a Bernard, much less to an Ambrose, a Bennet, or a St. Gregory of old patrician lineage; but, nevertheless, if the autocrat of all the Russias, or the heir apparent of the highest crown in Europe, were to present himself for a place among her clergy, with no title but regal insignia, and holding out his money bags, the church would have no answer for him but that of the Prince of the Apostles to Simon Magus—"Keep thy money to thyself to perish with thee."

But I perceive it will not be possible for me to apply these premises to your proposed "bargain" with the Irish clergy, without trespassing to too great a length; you will, therefore, have the goodness to excuse me if I decline, until another day, to advert to your proposal to bribe us into loyalty.

For the rest, let mammon make gentlemen in England or elsewhere, but be assured (it will not be long till you see the proofs of it) that, with Heaven's good help, which has not been denied it during fourteen centuries, the same mammon shall never give priests or bishops to the church in Ireland. Ever, as with their predecessors, shall the injunction of the apostle be the motto, in this particular, of those venerable prelates to whom the gate of the sanctuary and the custody of the sacraments have been entrusted:--

"Every high priest, taken from among men, is ordained for men in the things that appertain to God: that he may offer up gifts and sacrifices for sins—who can have compassion on them that are ignorant and that err, because he himself also is compassed with infirmity. Neither doth any man (no matter how 'respectable' or 'rich') take this honour to himself, but he that is called of God, as Aaron was." (d)

I am, Sir, your obedient humble servant,

JOHN MILEY.

THE REV. DR. FLETCHER ON THE ANGLICAN CHURCH.

This is a work* to which the attention of all ought to be directed, whether clergy or laity. The signs of the times demand it; the subject itself demands it; and last, though not least, the very name of its learned and venerable author, demands it: for the name of Dr. Fletcher is a guarantee for the production being what it professes to be. It is certainly a compendium, but a compendium, systematic in its arrangement, comprehensive in its contents (it embraces the whole of the subject), and lucid and logical throughout. There is but one desideratum, and that is a want of reference to the various documents and authorities, which are copiously adduced in its pages. We regret that the Dr. has not given us chapter and verse for his quotations; not that we question for one moment the accuracy and research of the author, but because nothing but the thing in black and white (and hardly that) is capable of meeting the critical and sceptical age in which we live. The Anglican Church has had countless volumes written in its favour, and many in its disfavour; it has had its eulogists, its critics, and its canvassers; and it promises to exhaust as much of pen, ink and letter-press as ever; for from days when Luther "bellowed in bad Latin," as Hallam happily expresses it, and boasted that he stood alone (solus eram) to the present moment, when the disciples of Pusey and Newman are breathing forth their quasi-yearnings for a junction with Rome in their "Tracts for the Times," and through their organs, the British Critic and the English Churchman, never was there, it would seem, such a troubling of the religious waters, such animosities, such hopes and fears, as to the two antagonistic systems, viz. that of Rome, and that identified with the Thirty-nine Articles. In the forthcoming struggle, it behoves each one to buckle on his armour afresh, and hold himself in readiness for the contest; it behoves the advocates of time-honoured Rome to examine again the substructions of the modern Anglican Establishment; for if religion is one, if Peter be the rock, and Rome the centre of unity: if salvation is of her as it was of the Jews, then separatists from her are certainly schismatics, and we may assuredly moot the question, whether a religion merely of yesterday is to be a religion of tomorrow. In this contest on the one hand, we must insist, in spite of centuries of calumnies, on the stability of the Catholic Church: a stability as certain and immovable as the rock on which she is founded; and on the other, we must urge the instability, the sandy foundation of the Anglican Establishment. To dissipate the visionary and lingering notions of these who manifest a longing for a union with Rome, we must boldly inform them that between truth and error there can be no compromise, no resting place; there must be the confession of the one and the abjuration of the other.

To become acquainted with the real history of the Anglican Church, may be deemed by some no easy achievement; but let them peruse with only common attention the multum in parvo production of Dr. Fletcher, and from the very clear, able, and chronological way, in which he has anatomised the subject, they may make themselves masters of the question, at a comparatively trifling cost. As to extracts, we must confine ourselves to one, on the all-engrossing topic of the day, viz., the Oxford movement towards the City of the Seven Hills. We select this, because it conveys, in our judgment, a safe and sound view of what has been facetiously termed by some, the new mania, and by others has been enthusiastically pronounced the first step to the reconversion of England. Before we give our readers the extract on Puseyism, from the concluding chapter of the Doctor's work, we would just inform them that the work consists of twelve chapters. The first treats of the origin &c. of the Anglican Church under Henry VIII.; second, of its progress under Edward VI.; third, of its interruption under Mary; fourth, of the progress of the new hierarchy under Elizabeth; fifth, of Parker's Consecration; sixth, seventh, and eighth, of its continued progress under Elizabeth; ninth, of the effects produced by the Establishment of the Anglican Church; tenth, treats of the schismatical character of the said Church; eleventh, an excellent chapter on the name "Anglo-Catholic Church;" and the twelfth,

* A short Historical View of the Rise, Progress, and Establishment of the Anglican Church."

the most opportune and useful perhaps of all, presents us with some judicious remarks on the proposed union with the Church of Rome; in other words, on the Oxford movement, which is now impregnating with its spirit the adherents of the Anglican Establishment, in whatever quarter of the globe they are found. Now for our extract from the concluding chapter:—

“It is often asked, and this more generally by the Protestants than by the Catholics, why the learned writers (the Puseyites), considering their affection for the Catholic Church, and their slender respect for their own—why they do not at once give up the latter, and embrace the Catholic? These are questions which themselves alone can answer. Their conduct is, certainly, a subject of surprise to the public; and a mystery, which no one can explain. It is on account of the incoherency of their language—alternately praising and abusing the Catholic Church; to-day, studying to promote the union; to-morrow labouring to contract it,—that they are so severely treated by the writers and members of their own establishment; accusing them of duplicity, and imputing to them motives alike dishonourable and ungenerous. Very different from all this is my opinion of them. I consider them as persons even more estimable for their virtues than they are remarkable for their learning and their talents. At the same time, I do think this:—that there is an incoherency in their writings, a waywardness in their conduct, for which it is impossible to account. Thus the reader has just seen, with what love and fervour they speak of the Church of Rome. And yet it is true, that there are not a set of men, not even the mountebanks and heroes of Exeter Hall, that have abused the Church of Rome, more insolently than they have done. I could cite, but out of respect for their characters I will not, I could cite endless extracts from their works to show this. This, then, certainly is true, that if the learned writers do really wish, as they profess they do, for a reconciliation with the Parent Church, their plan, or method of bringing this about, is, of all others, the most singular.

“With regard to the proposed and wished-for union, there is, of course, nothing that the Catholic more ardently and more anxiously longs for. Its blessings to religion, and its benefits to the kingdom, would be infinite. So for example, we have just seen, exhibited by the benevolent Lord Ashley, a spectacle of the moral state of this kingdom—a spectacle of vice, ignorance, and depravity, such as disgraces no other Christian nation. Even Sir James Graham, although the staunch defender of his Church, admitted, on the occasion of his lordship’s motion, that “It may be safely asserted that the important subject of religious education has been neglected in this country in a greater degree than in any other civilised nation.” This fact, or concession, accounts at once for the evils depicted by his lordship. For without religious instruction it is vain to expect either virtue or good morals. Well, but what, then, is the remedy? The remedy is obvious. Recall and re-establish those means by which, in ancient days, the aforesaid evils were prevented. Recall Catholicity, and she will bring back with her those same principles and practices which long rendered England the model of Christian nations. She will speedily rebuild those mounds and restore those fences which answered the twofold purpose of stemming the tide of vice and of sheltering the exercise of virtue. We shall then no longer hear or read, as we now do incessantly, of that countless number of disgusting crimes which disgrace the nation, much less of those constant tragedies which every day afflict it: men seeking for consolation in the horrors of self-destruction. (Suicide is a completely Protestant crime, unheard-of and unnoticed in the annals of this country before the Reformation.). Then, too, instead of these numberless sects and that religious anarchy which divide and distract the kingdom, we should form one family, harmoniously united in one faith, and one order of worship.

“And neither would these be the only blessings that would result from the happy reconciliation. Then those immense revenues of the Church, which are now devoted to the enrichment of the present body of the clergy, with their wives, children, families, and so on, would be, in great part, consecrated, as anciently, to the relief of the poor and the comfort of the distressed. (It is, again, to Protestantism that we owe the oppression of poor-rates and the grievances of poor laws.) Catholicity restored, we shall soon again behold, rising up from their ruins and adorning the landscape, those sanctified asylums, where innocence, far purer than vestal, was wont to bloom, and where virtue was prepared for Heaven; those magnificent abodes, where benevolence and generosity used to dwell in every possible shape of tenderness and charity; where the poor found relief; the sick met with care; the traveller, a home; the broken-hearted, comfort. Then we should see restored to their ancient splendour those now-neglected monuments of ancient piety, the few churches which the barbarism of the Reformers has not destroyed; but which even in their present shamefully neglected state, are still the noblest monuments that adorn the nation. These would early be re-established in their former beauty; and in them, instead of the dull cold service which they now witness, we should again behold offered up, amid Hosannas of joy and gladness, that divine sacrifice of love, which is the soul of devotion and the essence of Christian worship. In short, only renew the blessed alliance, and soon a new order of things will reign. The present wilderness will become an Eden, smiling in flowers, and rich in fruits; and England once more be what it was in its olden days, Briannia Sancta.

“But, alas! I feel it; I feel that I have been describing but the visions of a pleasing dream. The obstacles which oppose the blessed union are numberless, as they are powerful. The dark, blind, ignorance of our religion, which pervades every rank and order of society in this country, not excepting its clergy—their hostility, rancour, and inveterate prejudices against it, all deeply burnt into the public mind by the bigotry of the pulpit and the injustice of the press—these are obstacles to the compact which nothing short of the Divine interference can remove. Then comes the stern and united opposition of the entire body of the Dissenting sects. To all these the renewal of the reconciliation would be deemed ruinous. It would spoil their trade and deprive their ministers of the main source of their livelihood; for it is by the promotion of disunion that they live. But, abstracting even from these considerations the spirit and temper of the times, the general indifference to all religion, the prevalence of incredulity—above all, in the higher and more literary circles the rage for pleasure and dissipation, and the almost universal reign of vice, are themselves circumstances which defeat every well-founded hope of an approaching return to Catholicity."

We have not even attempted to do justice to Dr. Fletcher's little work; the best justice that can be done it, and ourselves, is to procure it and make its contents our own. It will amply repay a careful perusal. In parting with the learned doctor and his excellent production, we would urge him, on its reaching a second edition, to supply the references to the authors quoted in his pages.—Tablet Correspondent, Nov. 11.

SITUATION OF IRELAND.

X ARTICLE.

Fifth and last period.—Act of Emancipation.—O'Connell.

Our readers are now aware of the means whereby were accomplished that legislative union which the English Government forced upon those whose independence it destroyed. When one thinks of all that this union has cost in money as in meanness, it will appear most natural that Government should feel no inclination to lose a power so dearly bought. It would be almost a folly if after so many efforts to realize a fusion of the two people, dispositions were shown on the part of the dominant power to resume the former state of things. The declarations which ever since 1800 the Cabinet has dictated to the Crown touching the immutable necessity of maintaining the act of Union-declarations recently renewed by the reigning Queen,—are therefore in concordance with the policy determined upon.

It seems to be the fate of Ireland never to obtain anything in the way of concessions but by enforcement. Ireland knows this and acts accordingly. How often was the Emancipation of 1829 officially declared impossible. Promised since 1800 as a compensation of the suppression of the local Parliament, it was afterwards irrevocably refused. George III. declared with all imaginable solemnity that such an act was incompatible with the oath he had taken at the time of his coronation, that it would be striking at the root of Protestant supremacy, that never would he give in, &c. &c. Pitt having tried to oppose the King's prejudices in that respect was dismissed the cabinet without scruple albeit his services were at the time so necessary to the Crown. From that period up to 1829 the same measure was the object of the most violent opposition not only on the part of the King and his Ministry, but also with both Houses. On three different occasions the bill of Emancipation was rejected by the House of Lords, and Sir R. Peel, in the House of Commons (1825) was one of those who most energetically opposed the principle of the bill. What, however, actually ensued?

This same Sir R. Peel seconded by the Duke of Wellington, who in the House of Lords had also signalized himself by a persevering opposition, took the initiative of the measure and had it adopted by his party! The Emancipation Act bears date the 13th April 1829. A very short time had elapsed for this marvellous transformation to be effected! Why? In 1829, Ireland, worn out by "hope deferred," assumed an attitude which it was impossible Government could longer disregard.

We should therefore concern ourselves but little about the official declarations that are now resounding with so much eclat. Ireland will and must have justice done her when she seriously determines to compel it. Some not long ago conceived that as the Queen so firmly spoke against the repeal of the Union, O'Connell would probably give the signal of an insurrection; but he did more wisely by acting differently. An insurrection, violent troubles, would indeed serve but too well the enemies of Ireland!—The leaders of the Irish movement, by remaining calm and quiet, by using but pacific means, will keep the agitation within all legal bounds, till some external crisis demands all the attention of the Government. Then, the aggressive energy of Ireland will increase at the same time with the difficulties England may fall into, and necessity will produce those concessions which wisdom and justice advised the grant of so long ago. The history of the past may in this respect instruct us as to the future.

At all events, this attitude of agitated and threatening expectation is better for all parties even than a mad attempt at the exertion of physical force and the policy of O'Connell, if not the most expeditious is assuredly the most sound as regards Ireland; but can England keep much longer the actual status quo, in presence of a permanent agitation, keeping the populace in a ferment, necessitating a display of large military force, and considerable expenses; in a word, making the preservation of peace nearly as onerous as would be the active costs of actual war?

To return to the events which followed the establishment of the Union in 1800, some years of discouragement and torpidity succeeded to this sadly memorable period, but by little and little energy revived and the contest, for an instant suspended, began anew with fresh spirit. The great aim was to obtain a political and parliamentary emancipation. By the English laws Catholics were morally proscribed, they were not permitted to sit in either of the houses, to take any part, in the discussion of the measures which were to dispose of the interests of the community. In order to put an end to this pariah condition, associations were formed, at the head of which was at the time John Keogh.

John Keogh was the predecessor of O'Connell in this species of popular dictatorship which makes Ireland move as one man. If O'Connell's fame has eclipsed that of the former agitator, yet history will not fail to record the services rendered by Keogh to the Catholic cause.

It was about 1810 that O'Connell first attracted the attention of his countrymen. He was then thirty four years of age. Born at Carhen, in a mountainous and wild region of the province of Munster, his first tutor was an old Catholic priest. His father subsequently sent him to Louvain under the Dominicans, and, at a later period, to St. Omer, where he entered a college of Jesuits. He was intended for the church. "But he probably felt his to be too corporeal a nature to make a good priest," says Mr. Sheil, one of O'Connell's most talented countrymen, "and as the Bar had just been opened to Catholics, he entered it and soon attained a high rank amongst his colleagues." The hall of a Court of justice soon become too narrow a sphere for his ardent eloquence, for his indefatigable oratory, and ere long in the open air, in the presence of innumerable multitudes, he preached a sort of crusade against the laws of proscription which bore upon his country, and he taught them the means of forcing England to abrogate those laws.

It is in this manner that O'Connell made himself what he is now, the absolute master of masses, the most absolute king that ever ruled in Ireland. In 1826 the exclusion of the Catholics was still extant. He undertook to break down the disability, and presented himself as a candidate to the electors of Clare. After most stormy discussions, he was elected. From that day forward the English Government felt they could not much longer refuse emancipation.

On the 15th May 1829, O'Connell made his first appearance in Parliament. At his debut he declined taking the oath to Protestant supremacy, and after violent debates his election was cancelled. He then returned to Ireland soliciting a new election which was granted him by the same electors of Clare. Once in possession of his seat in Parliament, he only left it when, hopeless of being efficiently seconded in the House of Commons, he took the lead of the movement in favour of repeal.

Repeal! Such is now the sole object of his efforts, such is the rallying word he cries aloud to the Irish people! Many believe he will not obtain it. Patience! The same was said, and we should not forget it, of Catholic Emancipation, as also of all the other concessions which preceded it.

The best manner in which to paralyse his action in this field would be to admit the timely reform of the Irish Church, of the system which puts tenants at the mercy of landlords; in a word, the reform of all that remains iniquitous and intolerable in the social and political condition of Ireland. But is Government prepared under a Tory ministry to consider such reform? Meanwhile the question forces itself on public attention with such emphasis that a trifling degree of over-delay may make the English Government run the risk of hearing what the voiceless tongue of the event has uttered to so many other governments struck with similar blindness—IT IS TOO LATE!

MISCELLANEA.

A VISIT TO DARRYNANE, BY A PROTESTANT CLERGYMAN.—(Abridged from a number of the Dublin Christian Journal, a Protestant and Conservative publication.)—Little did I think, when one evening in the dining-parlour of a Protestant and High Conservative, that the next would find me enjoying the hospitality of the greatest political Romanist of the age. After breakfast we took it into our heads to have a nautical excursion across an arm of the sea which separated the two counties, in order to get just a peep and no more at the far-famed abbey. Having a fair wind, we expected that, after accomplishing the object of our suddenly-planned voyage, we should be able, before night, to be anchored in our own bay; but, being suddenly becalmed, we did not make the harbour of Darrynane until about the time that we hoped to be half-way home; and as it was, we were half content to have the prospect of getting on "terra firma," being exhausted and suffering greatly from the effects of sea sickness. But no sooner had I heard that no less a personage than an M.P. had come to our relief, than I started upon my feet, weak and exhausted as I was, and after a kind invitation on his part to come along with him, assuring me how happy his father would be to see us, I accompanied him. But the rest of the party were not so complying as myself, so we left them, having first arranged that they should come to breakfast the following morning. We had not proceeded far when we were met by another M.P. in another boat, who, on hearing of the obstinacy of my friends, exclaimed that it was not to be tolerated, and soon boarding them himself, he did not leave them till he succeeded in getting them to return with him. All this attention we felt the more grateful for as being till then perfect strangers to those from whom we experienced it; but known to differ widely from them in religion and politics. The whole reception we met with, especially from the host, was to us a corroboration of all previously heard of the hospitality of this "traveller's home." Stories have been told and are believed by many—of oddities, peculiarities, airs, and assumptions—such as the last to obey the dinner-bell, all, both male and female, being expected to stay standing round the table until he made his appearance and took his seat; and that, when dinner was over, he was the first to retire, all again standing up to do him homage at his departure. But in anything we saw there certainly was nothing to justify such stories; but everything the very opposite. In fact he conducts himself like other human beings, seeking to make his home and conversation every way agreeable to his guests, with nothing that could offend the most fastidious or sensitive, and he even the whole evening (with much, I am sure, to call him away), gave us the pleasure of his company in the drawing-room. I had also heard that religion and politics were totally excluded; but we had both, not in the way of controversy, but rather, as I would say, historically and practically. In reply to a marvellously quick succession of questions from the head of our yachting party, he freely gave his opinion of several of the most eminent public characters of the day, assigning to each whatever position of merit he conceived them respectively entitled to, without appearing much biassed by his political prejudices. With myself he entered as freely into a different sort of conversation, in which, from a brief discussion of the law of marriage, we were led on to speak of the greatness of a Saviour's love, the infinity of his merits, and our consequent obligations. Into this we thus glided, as it were imperceptibly, without the appearance of design. My friend took his seat beside us, and asked me if I was trying to make a Protestant of our learned host. It happened in the course of conversation, that one of our party made a solemn asseveration by the Divine name which I thought should not go unnoticed, observing that whatever other differences of opinion might exist, we were agreed as to the sinfulness of the expression that had dropped from the lips of one of the Protestants of the trio. The reproof was well taken, after which I made some remarks to them how little such a habit had to excuse itself, it being of all sins the most easily avoided! in which our host concurred, and so our conversation went on very pleasantly till we were interrupted by some music. Our company was composed of several Roman Catholics and Radical M.P.'s &c.; the head of our own little party, a well-known Conservative in the county from which we came, and his excellent and accomplished partner, niece to two of our Conservative grandees, the one a commoner and the other a peer; a host of other ladies, of the same creed and politics with our hospitable entertainer, and myself. The reception and entertainment of a parson here is not an unfrequent event, and was much less so in the times of the home mission. I heard that, even when the family were from home, the person in charge had directions from his master to be always prepared with a plentiful food for both the missionary and horse as often as, in their way by, they might choose to call. After a comfortable night's rest in the same room with the only one of the four sons who has not yet been a member of the British senate, and being most kindly and courteously waited on with razors and whatever else I wanted by an honourable M.P., I repaired to the library and read a portion of the Douay Bible I found lying on one of the shelves. After breakfast I walked out, numerously escorted, to see the place. I plucked a large plantain leave, which I said I would take home and preserve as a relic from the abbey. (I have it still carefully preserved between the leaves of a folio copy of "Burnet's History of his own times.") After seeing as much as time would permit (and dismissed with oft-repeated invitations to come again), we set sail at one o'clock, with the impression strong upon, at least, my own mind, that the never-to-be-obliterated remembrance of all the kind attention we had experienced must ever more constrain me to mollify my feelings, and modify my words, when thinking or speaking of a certain political personage, of whom, as a political foe, I had oft spoke in terms of unmeasured reprobation.—Freeman.

YORK.—CATHOLIC CONFIRMATION.—The Rev. Dr. Briggs, of York, held a Confirmation in the Roman Catholic chapel, Wakefield, on Sunday week, when about 100 individuals were confirmed.

RIGHT REV. DR. HIGGINS.—The Tory and anti-Catholic journals, in their usual veracious manner, have been, for some days past, circulating, with a sound of trumpet, that the Right Rev. Dr. Higgins (the able Bishop of Ardagh) had been summoned to Rome, to give an account of some of his late political speeches and letters. We have laughed heartily at the extreme gullibility of these anti-popish gentlemen, who seem so very anxious to have his Holiness meddling in political affairs—against which meddling they so often call upon us, Catholics, to swear, or to protest. But, for the satisfaction of these fabricators of fictions, we have great pleasure in stating, that the exemplary and learned Bishop of Ardagh has just returned to Dublin from France, where he had been ordered for the benefit of his health—that he is now in better health and spirits than he had been in for many years past—and that, so far from the Pope expressing any opinion on the matter referred to, his Holiness has, by a recent brief, appointed the Right Rev. Dr. Higgins one of his prelates, or bishop to the papal throne.

Prayers and Novenas are now offering in various parts of Ireland, for the preservation of peace under the present exciting circumstances.

As an English gentleman was lately driving in the neighbourhood of Dublin, his attention was attracted by "G. P. O." (from the General Post Office) on all the mile-stones, and he asked his car driver what it meant? "Oh, Sir, don't you know what it means? 'God preserve O'Connell,' to be sure."—Philaethes, in the Morning Chronicle.

USES OF ART WHEN DEDICATED TO GOD.—The Radical announces that Marshal Soult passed through Cahors on the 15th, on his way to Paris. He stopped a few hours in that town, to hear the mass and partake of the hospitality of the Bishop of Cahors. "We see with pleasure," observes La Reforme, "that the contemplation of the religious pictures which Marshal Soult brought with him from Spain has elicited and nurtured in his heart sentiments of piety which edify all France."

THE MASSACRE AT PARIS—THE FEAST OF BARTHOLOMEW.

That the Massacre at Paris was a preconcerted plot for the destruction of Protestants, concealed with infinite cunning for several months, is often found asserted, especially in tracts compiled for the use of schools; but let us now inquire on what foundation an opinion so replete with improbabilities rests. The writers who assert it are numerous, some of them take it for granted, others attempt to prove it. But by what authorities are they supported? Suspicion, report and conjecture merely, as we hope to prove to the satisfaction of our readers after having compared the most authentic documents on the subject. The horrid deed of blood and perfidy we will not attempt to justify. We will not even extenuate its atrociousness by expatiating on the two real conspiracies for seizing on Charles and his Court, and for subverting the constitution of the country, which the Calvinist actually attempted to execute*; or on the four pitched battles which they had fought against the armies of their Sovereigns, or even upon the massacres with which they themselves had previously inundated all France†; so far from this we are ready to exclaim, with Thuanus, in contemplating the horrors of St. Bartholomew's-day, "Excidat illa dies ævo, neepostea eredant sæcula."—The very calumny which the King and Queen invented to excuse their barbarity, is a sufficient proof they did not conceive it lawful to commit such crimes to serve their religion; and as this Massacre was contrived without the participation of the French Clergy, a body who were most forward at the time to oppose its completion, and ever since been most warm in reprobating it, it is evident it had not the approbation of the Church‡. It has been undertaken to produce bulls and declarations of Popes establishing persecution as a tenet of the Catholic religion, and we are referred by some to the individual act of a pontiff which establishes no doctrine whatsoever; even were we to admit that Gregory the 13th had approved of the foul deed of St. Bartholomew's-day, after having viewed the matter in the clear and steady light in which we have beheld it, we should not even think that persecution was proved to be a tenet of his faith, but should judge him to have partaken of Charles and Catherine's sanguinary disposition, in opposition to the character which historians have stamp-

* Maimbourg, Hist. Calvin, vol. vi. Those of Amboise and Meaux, the latter of which appeared so heinous in the King's eyes that he vowed never to forgive it. The Huguenots had before, when they took up arms against him, in 1562, threatened him with the greatest indignities, namely, to whip him and bind him an apprentice to a mechanical trade. Ibid. vol. iv. It appears from Thuanus that his chief resentment was directed against Coligni, and that it was the murder of him which drew on that of the other Protestants.

† We do not speak of the innumerable massacres committed by the Calvinists of France upon priests, religious, and other unarmed people during the civil wars which they carried on against their Sovereigns. Davila relates, that upon the death of Francis 2d, when liberty of conscience was granted them, besides burning down Churches and Monasteries, they massacred people in the very streets of Paris. Heylin relates, that in time of profound peace these same people, taking offence at the procession of Corpus Christi performed in the city of Pamiers, fell upon the whole clergy who composed it and murdered them.

‡ It is particularly recorded of Henuyer, a Dominican friar, bishop of Lisieux, that he opposed to the utmost of his power the execution of the King's orders for the murder of the Protestants in his diocese, answering the governor of the Province when he communicated it to him; "It is the duty of the good shepherd to lay down his life for his sheep; not to let them be slaughtered before his face. These are my sheep though they have gone astray, and I am resolved to run all hazards in protecting them."

ed upon him. We cannot but recollect the infinite pains which the French King took, by letters, ambassadors, rejoicings, &c. to make both his subjects and foreign Princes, but particularly the Pope, believe that, in killing the Huguenots, he had only taken a necessary measure of self defence to preserve his own life, together with the constitution and his religion*. If we admit these accounts to have been believed at Rome and Madrid, as there is every reason to believe they actually were, the rejoicings at these Courts will put on a very different appearance from that in which they have been exhibited by our adversaries. So powerful a nobleman as Admiral Coligni, who had twice led his army against that of the Crown, was naturally an object of jealousy to the administration; but he had of late obtained a considerable ascendancy over the mind of the young King by hinting suspicions of the designs of the Queen Mother. He exhorted Charles to take a more decided part in the Government of the Kingdom, and proposed to him the conquest of the Netherlands, during the contest between the King of Spain and the insurgents, and for this purpose offered the King an army of ten thousand Huguenots; declaring that if he refused to aid the Protestants in Flanders, those in France would again be compelled to take up arms for their own safety, and exhorted him to throw off the tutelage of an ambitious mother, who kept the Sovereign in the back ground that she might bring forward a favorite son, and perpetuate her own authority. These insinuations made a deep impression on the mind of Charles; his words and behaviour warned Catherine and the Duke of Anjou of their danger, and it was determined to remove the Admiral, their most formidable enemy, by assassination. As he returned through the city from the Council an arquebuss was discharged at him. One ball shattered his hand, a second lodged in the shoulder; however the wounds were not dangerous; but his partisans hastened in crowds to his house and offered to spend their lives in the quarrel. At the first news, Charles burst into lamentations, which were succeeded by threats of vengeance against the assassin. He visited the Admiral, and Catherine thought it prudent to accompany him, with her two sons, and the chief officers of the Court. They found the wounded man in bed; he requested to have a private interview with the King, and Charles commanded his mother and brothers to remain at a distance. The Queen afterwards acknowledged that these were the most painful moments of her life. Her consciousness of guilt, and various other matters, caused her to interrupt the conference, by pretending that silence and repose were necessary for the recovery of the Admiral. During her return in the same carriage with the King she endeavoured to elicit from him the particulars of conversation. He exclaimed and said what the Admiral told him was true. After a restless night Catherine spent the morning in anxious deliberation with the duke and her confidants—in the afternoon they broke the matter to Charles. They reminded him of the two rebellions of the Huguenots and of the formidable power of the Admiral; they observed that the man who could offer a force of ten thousand armed men against the king of Spain, might, at his pleasure, employ the same number against the king of France. They informed him that the chiefs of the party were at that moment plotting the destruction of their adversaries, and that if he were to wait till the next morning, his mother, brothers, and most faithful officers, and perhaps himself, would be sacrificed to their vengeance. They implored of him permission to anticipate the cruelty of their enemies, and to wreak on Coligni and his friends, that destruction which they had prepared for others. The young king was at length subdued, and yielded to the entreaties of his mother. A little before the time the signal was to be given to rush on their enemies, the silence of the night was interrupted by the report of a pistol. They shuddered with horror; their resolution forsook them; and a messenger was dispatched with contrary orders, but then it was too late—the Duke of Guise, with three hundred men, burst into the Admiral's house, and the dead body of the unfortunate man was thrown from a window; the Duke of Nevers and the Marshal de Tavannes, at the head of a troop of guards, rode through the streets, crying treason; companies of armed citizens under their respective leaders hastened to the work of blood, and the populace, whose passions were excited by the example of their superiors, and the circulation of the most alarming reports, imitated and surpassed the cruelty of the original assassins. The perpetration however of these outrages induced the king to complain, on the 14th of September, that, though he had published his declaration of the 28th of August, and signified his will that it should be strictly obeyed, yet, to his great displeasure, similar atrocities continue to be committed. Wherefore he repeats his former prohibition, orders the transgressors to be punished with such severity as may prove a lesson to others, and declares his resolution of calling to account all those who shall dissemble or connive at such excesses. In another letter to the Duke of Guise, of the 18th, he asserts that he will compel obedience, that his orders shall not be disobeyed with impunity, and assures his cousin that the most agreeable news which he can send him will be the punishment of some of those who transgress his commands.

As far as Charles, therefore, was concerned, the massacre was not premeditated, and in most, if not in all, the true origin of it was probably the excited state of the public mind, the sudden consequence of the late wounds received by the Admiral, and the recollection of past injuries, which was hourly renewed by the sight of the churches formerly laid in ruins through the zeal or resentment of the Huguenots. After having exhibited to our readers this view of the Parisian massacre, and the authorities by which it is supported, we think no doubt can remain that the opinion which we have adopted is the most probable, and the only one supported by real authority.

SERAMPORE.

On last Sunday morning the Church of Serampore was a scene of great solemnity, in celebration of the annual feast in honor of the Blessed Virgin Mary. The walls within the sanctuary were entirely covered with crimson silk damask and the main body of the building was handsomely decorated with costly silks and cloth; in short, the interior of the Church was grand, imposing and solemn. The Rev. Mr. Rabascall, the zealous Vicar of the Church, celebrated High Mass, aided by an efficient choir composed of Messrs. Valadares, Ajeus, Garattee, &c., Mr. Suppus, the eminent German Organist of the Cathedral, presided at the Organ. After the Gospel the Archbishop read, in an impressive manner, the Lenten Pastoral for 1844, which was followed by a Sermon, in which His Grace, with his usual eloquence, expounded the Gospel of the day, clearly manifesting the necessity of not only hearing the word of God but of keeping it. The communicants on this occasion were sixty-five, and the collection on behalf of the Serampore Schools, amounted to 63 Rs.

After the service the Rev. Mr. Rabascall very hospitably entertained a party from Calcutta at breakfast. Among the guests were Mr. Elberling, the Judge and Magistrate of Serampore, and Dr. Abbott, the Surgeon of the settlement.

To one who has not visited Serampore during the past twelve months, the improvements that have been made in the Priest's residence must be very cheering. In place of the small lower-roomed house, appears a fine upper-roomed and commodious building, erected, we understand, at the exclusive cost of a Convert, whose charity and good works appear unbounded. The apartments on the lower floor are assigned for school rooms and refectory for the boys, and the upper story for dormitories for boys, the Masters and the Priest. We counted thirty substantial bedsteads in the boys' dormitory, uniformly constructed, having clean beds and coverlids.

The boys were cleanly dressed, and appeared healthy and cheerful. In the adjoining premises is the School for girls, under the superintendence and care of the ladies of the Loretto House. We had also an opportunity of observing the order and arrangements adopted in this School, and we need scarcely add, that we were highly delighted; in fact these Pay Schools, like every other undertaking of our venerated Archbishop, Dr. Carew, have, by the Grace of God, met in a short time far greater support than could have been anticipated.

To the 63 Rupees collected on last Sunday, at Serampore, we have to add ten Rupees subscribed by Mr. A. Baptist and two pieces of Madras cloth contributed by M. D'Souza, Esq.

DUM-DUM.

On Thursday the 15th instant, the Archbishop administered the Holy Sacrament of Confirmation to about thirty-five persons at Dum-Dum. On the same occasion about forty of the Military devoutly approached the Holy Communion. During the Mass several of the Band attended in the orchestra and performed some sacred airs with great effect. The deportment of the congregation throughout was most exemplary and edifying.

HOWRAH CATHOLIC CHURCH,

We are requested to mention that the annual Novena at the Howrah Catholic Church will commence on the 4th of the ensuing month, and that it will conclude on Sunday, the 10th, on which morning a solemn High Mass will be performed at 10 o'clock, and a sermon will be preached by the Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy, after which a collection will be made to defray the costs and charges of a clock which has arrived on the French ship Hooghly, for the steeple of the Howrah Church.

CONVERTS.

Since our last publication the Darogah of a Mofussil Court, a native woman, both Pagans, and a young Englishman of the Established Church have applied to be admitted into the Catholic Church in Bengal.

CHRISTMAS FESTIVAL

In this city, we are proud to say, Christmas has been truly a Catholic festival. Celebrated on the one hand, as far as possible, with all the splendour which the Ritual prescribes, it was honoured on the other, beyond our expectation, by the numbers who flocked to our churches, and by the piety with which they assisted at the solemn services of Religion. In the Cathedral, his Lordship the Right Rev. Bishop, V. A. celebrated solemn Pontifical Vespers on the evening of the 24th, and High Mass the following morning, after which, agreeably to notice previously given, and in virtue of faculties received from Rome, he imparted the Papal Benediction according to the prescribed form. His Lordship also celebrated High Mass on New Year's Day and the festival of the Epiphany. Vespers were likewise sung on Christmas and New Year's Evenings and on the Evening of the Epiphany, and were followed on each occasion by an appropriate sermon and Benediction of the most holy Sacrament.

In the Evening of Sunday 31st Dec. solemn services were celebrated in the Catholic Cathedral and in the chapel at Royapettah, in thanksgiving for the many and signal favours received from God during the year. The sacred functions commenced by the solemn invocation of the Holy Ghost, the choir chaunting the beautiful hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus." This was followed by an appropriate discourse. The Blessed Sacrament was then exposed on the altar and the Te Deum was sung, with the Collects for thanksgiving, for His Holiness the Pope and for the Congregation, and the ceremony terminated with Benediction. We were highly gratified at the numerous attendance of the faithful on this and the other occasions to which we have just alluded, and more particularly at the piety with which all joined in these sublime exercises of Religion. Relying on the co-operation of his Beloved Flock our Venerable Bishop established within the past year the pious practice of giving Vespers with Sermon and Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament on all holidays of obligation. The result, we are proud to say, has fully justified his and our most sanguine expectations. The blessing of heaven cannot but descend upon such fervour in the profession of our holy faith and the observance of its sacred ordinances.

We were also truly edified at the number and piety of those who approached the holy sacraments of Penance and Eucharist during the Christmas season. At Trichinopoly and Bellary the truly zealous Chaplains have also had similar cause to rejoice in the Lord. In the former place the Catholics of H. M.'s. 94th Regt. were crowding to the confessional, whilst in the latter there were 93 communicants on the 4th Sunday of Advent and upwards of a hundred on Christmas-day. This consoling intelligence proves in what a proud position Catholicity at present stands within this Presidency. May God, who has begun the good work in us, perfect it unto an eternal reward.

ST. THOMAS APOSTLE, PATRON OF THE VICARIATE
APOSTOLIC OF MADRAS.

On Thursday the 21st Dec. the festival of the glorious Apostle St. Thomas, Patron of this Vicariate, was celebrated with peculiar solemnity by the Catholics of Madras. In the morning solemn high Masses were celebrated, at St. Thome by the Right Revd. Bishop, Vicar Apostolic, and in the Cathedral by the Very Rev. Dr. MacAuliffe. In this latter Church, there were vespers, as usual, in the evening, after which the panegyric of the Saint was preached by the same Rev. Gentleman. The sacred functions terminated with Benediction of the Most Holy Sacrament.

Copy of a Letter from Quarter Master Joyce, H. M. 63d Regt. to the Right Rev. Bishop of Castoria, Vicar Apostolic of Madras.

BELLARY, 4th January 1844.

MY DEAR LORD,

I suppose Mr. Doyle has informed you of the three converts we received lately from the Protestant and Baptist ranks. The Baptist was a Catholic, but through inducements held out to him by the missionaries at Moulmein he joined that sect. He has, however, deeply regretted the scandalous and false step he had taken, and made all the amends in his power, in the presence of a large congregation, to repair the scandal, by getting Mr. Doyle to read a most feeling letter, which he addressed him on the subject, and in which he cautioned the men to avoid arguments on the subject of Religion, as also the reading of the books of other sects. The other two were Protestants and are very good men. A scape grace, bearing the name of Catholic, an Englishman, who never was received into the church, but was in the habit of going to mass since he joined at Moulmein about two years ago, on hearing that Mr. Doyle was determined to follow up such delinquents as did not come to their Religious duties, said that the rules of the Catholic church were too strict for him, consequently he could not live up to them and would therefore go to the Protestant church where no restrictions would be put on his conduct. He is gone, and we are all very glad to get rid of the scabby sheep. I was almost forgetting to mention one of his remarks, which was this, "That our church compelled a man to honour his father and mother." This (he said) he never could do, particularly to his father, but that he could afford a little to his mother, but not much. He was tried by a General Court Martial at Moulmein for robbery, a short time before we left, so your Lordship can see that his loss gives us no reason to regret him. A Protestant Soldier and his wife, who is also a Protestant, have applied to Mr. Doyle to have their infant child baptized by him with a view to bring it up in the Catholic faith! I am happy to inform your Lordship that there were 93 communicants on Sunday the 24th ult. and upwards of 100 on Christmas-day, and I believe there were more than those numbers at Holy Communion on last Sunday and New Year's-Day. The men are progressing very much in sobriety, good conduct, and piety, and all this is certainly attributable, under heaven, to Mr. Doyle's indefatigable zeal in following them up and in having them brought down to him. It is hoped that every Catholic in the Regiment will soon be a Catholic in reality. A great many of the most violent and drunken of them have been reformed and are now doing well. I received a letter from my poor mother, saying that the Nuns, coming out on the "Lady Flora," have a parcel from my sister for me. Please tell Mr. Edwards to forward it by Bangy as soon as possible after their arrival. Just think, my Lord, of my mother, who is nearly 80 years of age, having gone 20 miles to see a Repeal meeting. Ellen joins me in most affectionate regards to your Lordship, the Nuns, Priests and to Mr. Edwards. Wishing you all the compliments of the season and many happy returns of the same, and a safe arrival to those of the mission coming out on the Lady Flora.

I remain,

My dear Lord,

Yours most affectionately,

E. JOYCE.

EXCLUSIVE CATHOLICITY.

If it were possible for Catholics to fall into the general mass of society, and be, like the most valuable part of it, unimpeachable in morals, in education highly endowed, and, in practical piety, doing honour to their religion, it would be well. It was thought that, after the Emancipation Act of 1829, this would be the result, and that thenceforward the distinctions in politics, as in everything else, would be those of individuals, rather than of bodies, and that no man would have right to claim honour or advantages, or complain of their being withheld, merely because of his belonging to any class of religionists. But unhappily this was not so. The Emancipation Act was made a cold and abstract declaration merely of the Legislature, and a dead letter in practice, and the Catholics were again banded together from the sense of mocking insult, in addition to the old feeling of injustice; and common cause has been made by them for the vindication of admitted rights. Even to the Catholic body this was a very unhappy contingency, inasmuch as every neglect, either real or fancied; every refusal of favours either on good or on personal grounds, to which a Catholic was subjected, was placed to the account of his Catholicity; and hence a bitterness of heart was produced, as unjust to the fancied offender, as it was corroding the individual as well as general Catholic mind.

The consequence is, that the Catholic body have been forced into the retention of an exclusive character, and the strength that they possess, though injudiciously directed in many respects, has, to a certain extent, been made to bear on some of the grievances to which they are subjected. In regard to grants of public money for schools and colleges, for religious instruction in the army and navy, and in many of the colonies they have, as compared with other classes of religionists, been unjustly dealt with. And in the disposal of political patronage, so very unfortunate has been the system of exclusion, that an office refused to a Catholic, is almost invariably placed to the account of his religion; while, had society been permitted to right itself after the passing of the Emancipation Act—and had Catholics been permitted to range themselves as they liked in respect to political parties, they would have shared in the patronage of the State, whichever administration was in power, instead of now being forced to make the extraordinary claim of State Patronage, from a Ministry to which they are generally hostile, or forced to be so.

This position of matters has rendered organs of Catholic opinion necessary, and hence the number of journals in Ireland, and the attempt to start and carry on others in Great Britain. It has, however, been thought by many both good and wise in the Catholic body, that merely Catholic Journals are unadvisable; first, because of the exclusive character they assume; and secondly, because Protestants do not read them. As regards the latter reason, we know that Protestants do read Catholic Journals, and as it unfortunately happens that Catholic Journalism has not yet, for the most part, attained even mediocrity in tone and quality, their reading is positively disadvantageous to the Catholic body, for everything is seen in a most unfavourable light, coarseness of manner, deficiency in acquirements, or a vis inertiae, productive of nothing but apathy and feebleness. This, however, will gradually disappear, and improved Journalism will not only exhibit or create activity in the Catholic body, but ultimately secure a more favourable impression on the Protestant mind.

Instead, however, of Catholic journals being objectionable, as such, the circumstances of the times seem to render them indispensable. It is to be hoped that, by and by, the policy of the Government will, on the question of place and preferment, act on the principle of equal justice to all; and by advancing Catholics leave those who will not accept it to be like other political parties, taking it from their friends, and being excluded by their political opponents—and thus witnessing Catholics and Catholic journals to be Whig, Tory, or Radical, as they and their readers incline.

But, in religious matters, the position of Catholicity demands not one but many organs, and will continue to require them. In fact, they are forced to this, inasmuch as the other religionists of the empire have their organs in every locality. Religious opinion is becoming so active a principle in this country, and will, by and by, be so very conflicting, that the Catholic body must follow the practice of other classes, and by strengthening, supporting, and elevating these journals, give tone and character to their principles and their influence. The Catholic body must have journals to represent and reflect their opinions; and in supporting them they should take care that the body suffer not by the conduct of journalists, and the sentiments, moral, political, or religious, that are given forth to the public,—in a word, that they be not unworthy of the great party they are set up to represent.—Edinburgh Courier.

GERMANY.

CATHOLIC LIBERALITY.—In one of my letters from Germany I drew a contrast between the conduct of the Catholics there, who are numerous and powerful, towards their Protestant neighbours, who are few and poor, and the conduct of Irish Orangemen towards their Catholic fellow-countrymen; and I confess that if anything could for a moment make me doubt of the future regeneration of my country, it is her having given birth to so many bad men. Whilst the Orange press is crying down Popery in Ireland, and actually calling out for the massacre of the poor Catholics, the Catholics of Germany give the use of their chapels to the Protestants who are too poor to build churches for themselves, and throughout the Catholic Continent a syllable is never uttered against the religious opinions of any sect. I put the question before and I ask it again, are Irish Catholics worse than those of other countries? No their bitterest enemy could answer in the affirmative.—Pilot Correspondent.

NUNS AND MONASTIC INSTITUTES.

Abridged for the Catholic Institute of Great Britain, from a pamphlet published in 1815.

A COMMUNITY of NUNS, is an Association of Catholic Women, who having no relish for the pleasures of the world, nor feeling themselves inclined to perform the duties of a married state; and actuated by motives of religion; freely, of their own accord, and after the most mature deliberation, and a long trial, engage themselves by solemn vows, to practise the Evangelical Counsels, under the obedience of one common Superior of their own choice, and according to certain rules and constitutions which they have adopted: some devoting themselves to the education of youth; others to the care of the sick in hospitals; and some few to a life of retirement and prayer. If the liberty of conscience of which we boast, as one of the most valuable consequences of our wise constitution, is not to be confined to books, certainly Catholics have a right of exercising, without molestation, that mode of religion which they think best. And if, according to the principles of their religion, it is an acceptable thing before God, to tend to perfection by the practice of the evangelical counsels—surely a small number of their daughters have an incontrovertible right to tend to that perfection. And if they imagine that they will correspond better to their holy vocation, by living in retirement with companions of their own sex, than by remaining amidst the busy scenes of the world, why should such a liberty be denied them? Is there any law divine or human compelling women to marry? Is there any obligation of conscience to live in the town rather than in the country? Is there more virtue in idling away our time in visits, balls, frequenting the theatre, &c. &c. than in living in the company of pious friends, who have the same inclinations, and make their happiness consist in the discharge of the useful occupations and religious duties which they have voluntarily imposed upon themselves? But as this concise, though succinct defence of our nuns would not satisfy those who know them only from the falsehoods and satires of the day, let us enter into details respecting them.

The nuns who devote themselves to the education of youth, do it from the purest and noblest motives,—from motives of religion. They think themselves answerable to God, for the negligences which might endanger either the health or the morals of the children entrusted to their care. They receive them from the parents as a sacred deposit, which they ought to preserve, not only sound and unblemished, but which it is their strict duty to return one day improved in every virtue, and in every branch of liberal education. The mistresses who preside at the different exercises, are ladies who are themselves adorned with all the accomplishments to which they are to form their pupils, and who discharge their laborious office with that zeal and activity with which we always perform the occupations of our liking and our own choice. They watch over the natural propensities and rising passions of their pupils, with the solicitude of a pious and tender mother; who, by a long experience, has acquired the rare talent of conducting every one of her children according to their particular disposition; and who seeks for no other reward of her troubles and labours, than the temporal and spiritual good of the object of her affection, and the consciousness of having done her duty. Another advantage of education in a convent is, that if a mistress is obliged to interrupt her functions from sickness or any other cause, there is always another ready at hand, and equally qualified, to supply her place. Moreover, the children, seeing in their mistresses, persons their equals and sometimes greatly their superiors in birth, &c. are grateful for the marks of affection and interest which they receive from them; and beholding them always invested with a sacred character, they pay attention to their lessons, open their young hearts to them with freedom and confidence, and listen to their admonitions with docility and a sort of religious respect.

You are sometimes told of a danger of our daughters being seduced by the example of the nuns to embrace a state of perpetual continency, and thus expose us to be deprived of a number of eminent citizens and venerable matrons, who might have been the pride of the country. It is enough to reply, that the number of unmarried women in these realms is almost incredible. It is a fact, attested by the return made to Parliament in the year 1811, that at that epoch the number of females in England, Wales, and Scotland, amounted to 6,282,716, and that only 2,544,215 were married; and, consequently, that there remained unmarried 3,718,501—of all ages, from one year to a hundred years old. Now, if out of that number we take off all children and girls to the age of twenty, and reckon that altogether these form the two-thirds of unmarried women, which is beyond the standard of proportion established in the bills of mortality, we shall have 1,239,833 unmarried females, from the age of twenty and above. One million two hundred and thirty-nine thousand women living in celibacy, either from choice or from necessity; and yet not a word from the pulpit, or in the senate, to stop the progress of a celibacy which might appear to threaten our towns and villages with the danger of being turned into dreary solitudes! Notwithstanding the immense deficiency of men, which must be the necessary consequence of such an extension of celibacy, our armies have never been in want of able commanders—our fleets of gallant admirals—our legislature of profound statesmen—or our courts of justice of upright and wise magistrates: and yet we are told that the whole population of the three kingdoms is in danger of being exhausted should a few Catholic females (not one in a hundred thousand of our unmarried women), from motives of religion, embrace a state of perpetual chastity, and live in retirement!

Let us remark moreover, that in Catholic countries, the esteem or contempt of religious chastity has been always a sure and infallible criterion of the morals of the people. As long as virtue was predominant in a Catholic nation, religious celibacy was highly esteemed, and many were found to embrace it; on the contrary, in proportion as depravity gained ground, religious celibacy fell by degrees into disrepute, and there were few disposed to embrace it; whilst, at the same time, the number of persons unmarried increased, and the sacred obligations of matrimony became every day less and less respected. The cause of this seeming paradox is nevertheless obvious. According to the principles of the Catholic religion, perpetual chastity is looked upon as one of the evangelical counsels, and as a state of perfection. Therefore, as long as the morals of the people are virtuous, and religion is respected, there will be many tending to that state of perfection; and the contrary will happen when morals degenerate and irreligion prevails. To be convinced of the truth of this observation, we have only to read with due attention the history of the reigns of Louis XIII and XIV of France, and compare it with that of their two immediate successors. The licentiousness of manners, and the ignorance and neglect of the duties of religion, occasioned by the civil wars, having been repressed during the happy and energetic government of Henry IV, it is astonishing to see the number of religious houses which were either reformed or founded; and the age of Louis XIV is no less remarkable for the multitude of persons distinguished by their rank, fortune, and talents, who embraced a state of perpetual continency, than for the number of its brave warriors, able statesmen, eloquent orators, great poets, eminent artists, and men of genius in every branch of literature and science. But under the government of the profligate and impious regent, Philip of Orleans, irreligion and immorality having infected almost all ranks of society, religious establishments were visibly decaying, and a vicious and criminal celibacy became fashionable. Religious continency has not been, nor ever can be, the cause of the depopulation of a country.

Again, if we examine the accounts which have been published of late years, concerning the population of the different kingdoms and states of Europe, we shall find, that everything being taken into consideration, viz. climate, fertility of the soil, extent of commerce, and the nature and form of the government, the Catholic states are as well peopled as the Protestant. The population of Italy, notwithstanding the number of the clergy and the religious, is greater now than it was under the Romans. This is attested by St. Ambrose, who affirmed that it was so in his time, and by a passage from the works of Pliny the naturalist, who declared that if it were not for the kind of prisons, in which the slaves were shut up, a part of Italy would have been a desert. Whilst Sweden was a Catholic country it was more populous than it has been since the Reformation. The Catholic states of Germany contain as many inhabitants as the Protestant, according to the respective extent of territory. The same may be said of the Swiss cantons; nay, that of Soleure (a Catholic canton) is more peopled proportionably than any other. The Catholic Netherlands, before the shutting up of the Scheldt, and the rising of Amsterdam, the rich republics of Italy in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, particularly Venice and Genoa, were not destitute of inhabitants, nor less prosperous than England and Holland. Prussia is not more populous than the three former ecclesiastical electorates; nor Bavaria, Sweden, and Denmark than Lombardy.

Robertson himself says, that at the time of the Reformation, Germany abounded in inhabitants. (Hist. of Charles V, vol. iii.) However, in all these countries, religious celibacy was not only tolerated, but even honoured and greatly encouraged, and convents of both sexes were very numerous. No. It is not religious celibacy which can be detrimental to population, nor injurious to the propriety of the state. It is the celibacy proceeding from luxury, egotism, licentiousness, and excessive love of independency. It is the celibacy of the poor, who from want of assured means of subsistence, to bring up their numerous families, decline contracting legitimate connexions, and abandon themselves to all sorts of profligacy and crimes. In short, it is the forced celibacy, necessarily resulting from our almost uninterrupted destructive wars, which, especially for these twenty-two years past, have swept away the flower of the youth all over Europe, not by hundreds and thousands only, but by hundred thousands and millions.

If chastity be an honourable virtue in itself, does it lose that character only when a young person resolves to preserve her innocence pure and undefiled for ever, in order to have it always in her power to offer to God the homage of a chaste and undivided heart, and to devote herself with more liberty to the service of the sick and of the poor, or to the education of youth?

Marriage is a holy state instituted by God; and in the order of providence and of nature, the general and ordinary state of those who live in the world. Those, therefore, who from motives of religion, and in a Christian and holy manner engage in this state, do well and are to be praised. And the Catholic Church is so far from prohibiting and dishonouring it, as some misinformed Protestant writers affirm, that she ranks matrimony among the sacraments of the new law, requiring the same dispositions of the parties who enter into it, as in those who approach the Lord's table. She judges so awfully and mysteriously of this solemn contract, as absolutely to prohibit persons who have engaged in it from ever violating it, on any pretext whatever, during the lifetime of their partners; thus strictly conforming her doctrine to the injunction of our Saviour: "What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder." Matt. (xix, 6.) Nevertheless, those who for the sake of practising a more perfect degree of virtue, and by a divine call, prefer a state of perpetual virginity, embrace that which is more perfect and excellent. Dr. Wells, a learned Protestant, (Paraph. on St. Matt.) confesses that Jesus Christ declares voluntary chastity, for the kingdom of heaven's sake, to be an excellency, and an excellent state of life. We do not see among the Jews instances of women making a vow of perpetual virginity; but the continency of widows after the death of their husbands is mentioned with praise. Judith is honoured for having lived in retirement, fasting and mortification, during her widowhood. The high-priest and the ancients of the people call her "a holy woman, and one fearing God," (viii. 29.) "Thou hast done manfully and thy heart has been strengthened because thou hast loved chastity, and after thy husband thou hast not known any other; therefore, also, the hand of the Lord has strengthened thee, and therefore thou shalt be blessed for ever." (xv. 11.)

It is true that we read in the book of Genesis, these words addressed to our first parents by Almighty God, Increase and multiply; yet they do not imply a strict command, at least to be literally obeyed at all times, through all the succession of ages, and to the end of the world; but it is a blessing upon the progenitors of mankind, and a promise that their posterity should increase and multiply, and fill up the whole earth. An evident proof of the truth of this observation is, that the sister of Moses always remained a virgin, and certainly this great lawgiver and friend of God would not have suffered it with impunity, if she had been guilty of infringing one of the commandments of the Almighty. Some Protestant commentators have pretended that virginity was a disgrace among the Jews. Several examples show that it was not so. Elias, Elizeus, and Jeremiah, never were married. Among the Essenians, a sect much respected for their strict obedience to the Mosaic law, several men and women lived in perpetual continency; therefore these interpreters have confounded virginity with sterility. Sterility was looked upon as a disgrace, and as a sort of malediction from God; because in the promise of the law, (Deut. vii. 14) it was said that neither man, nor woman, nor the beasts of the fields, should be sterile.

But virginity is properly the fruit of the gospel. It is not a precept, it is only a council; it is, perhaps, that which shone with the greatest splendour in the church, and produced the most eminent virtues. In his admirable sermon upon the Mount, our Saviour says, "Blessed are the clean of heart, because they shall see God." And his disciples having said to him, when he was teaching them the indissolubility of matrimony, "If the case of a man with his wife be so, it is not good to marry;" he answered them, "All men do not receive this word, but they to whom it is given. For there are eunuchs who were born so from their mother's womb, and there are eunuchs who were made so by men, and there are eunuchs who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake; he that can receive it let him receive it." It is also the manifest doctrine of St. Paul:—"Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ." (1 Cor. xi. 1.) "I say to the unmarried and to the widows; it is good for them if they continue as I. He that giveth his virgin in marriage doeth well, and he that giveth her not doeth better." (Cor. vii. 33.) The blessed mother of our Lord always remained a virgin. St. John the Baptist, whom our Saviour declared to be the greatest of those who were born of a woman was a virgin, St. Joseph was a virgin, St. John the Evangelist was a virgin; and, according to the opinion of the primitive fathers, the predilection of Jesus Christ for him, proceeded from his love of chastity, and because he was a virgin when he became one of his disciples, and remained always a virgin till his death. This great apostle, in his Apocalypse, says that spotless virgins are the companions of the Lamb, and enjoy the singular privilege of following him wherever he goes. The tradition of the Catholic Church on this point is unanimous.

Among the Romans, Greeks, and barbarians, who had embraced Christianity, many holy virgins preferred torments and death in its most frightful form, to the violation of their integrity, which they had bound themselves by vow to preserve without defilement in mind and body; and since the destruction of the Roman Empire in the west, and the invasion of its provinces by the barbarians of the north, virginity has continued to be held in the greatest esteem and veneration. And wherever Christianity has penetrated, in Germany, Poland, Sweden, Denmark, Hungary, Bohemia, Russia, England, Scotland, and Ireland, in the old as well as in the new continent, under the burning sun of Asia and Africa, as in the cold regions of the north, and in the mild climates of France and Italy, virginity has been honoured and practised by thousands during many centuries. Even among the sects separated from the Catholic Church for these 1400 years, Nestorians, Jacobites, &c. &c. virginity has been and is still considered as a state of perfection, and religiously kept by both sexes.

We read in the Acts of the Apostles, (xxi.) that Philip the Deacon had four virgin-daughters. "Among us," says St. Justin (Apol. i. No. 16) "there is a great number of people of both sexes, sixty and seventy years old, who being from their infancy instructed in the doctrine of Jesus Christ, persevere in chastity, and I engage myself to show several of this description in every condition of life." Moreover, this father assures us, that the faithful were prompted to live in a state of continency, from these words of our Saviour already mentioned: "There are eunuchs &c. who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake." "If we marry," says he, "it is only to have children; and if we avoid matrimony, we keep a perpetual continency." Now such Christians who, in the days of St. Justin, were sixty and seventy years old, and had been brought up from their infancy in the doctrine of Christianity, must have been taught by the apostles themselves, or their immediate successors. Athenagoras, who wrote in the same century, expresses himself in like manner: (Leg. Pro. Christ.): "A great number of men and women there are among us who live in celibacy, from a hope of being more intimately united to God. Our custom is to remain such as we were born, or to marry but once." And Hermes, the friend of St. Paul, says, in his little treatise, The Shepherd (No. 4): "He who marries again, commits no sin; but if he does not, he acquires great honour with the Lord. Live in chastity and decency, and you will live for God." St. Epiphanius and St. Ambrose affirm besides, that St. Clement, one of the immediate successors of St. Peter, highly commended virginity at the end of his second epistle. Tertullian cries out, "How many voluntary eunuchs! How many virgins of both sexes!" St. Ambrose mentions virgins consecrated to God, by receiving a veil from the hands of the bishop at mass. Some vowed their virginity without receiving the consecrated veil, but wore black or grey modest garments, as a mark of their state. St. Chrysostom speaks nearly in the same manner. The strictest nuns were those called in Syria daughters of the covenant; which name included the deaconesses and other canonical maidens, who not only made vows of virginity, but also in many places, were appointed to sing hymns and canticles in the church, as we read in the Syriac life of St. Ephrem. All those classes of holy virgins lived in private houses, before monasteries were founded; but never in the same houses with men, as St. Cyprian testifies. In these first ages of Christianity, some of the virgins consecrated to God, lived with their parents, or two or three together by themselves. They never went out, but to church, where they had a place separated, by boards, from that of the rest of the women. There can be no doubt that they had consecrated themselves to God, by vows of chastity: for St. Cyprian says, that if one of them should fall, she would be incestuous and an adulteress, not to a husband, but to Christ. Tertullian calls them sacrilegious who throw aside a habit consecrated to God. And St. Austin positively affirms, that those who withdraw from the monastery, act contrary to their vow, and contract guilt by not fulfilling it. They employed in manual labour all the time which they did not dedicate to prayer, singing hymns, and spiritual canticles. They also practised fasting and other mortifications. St. Ambrose mentions a society of twenty virgins living together at Bologna: he says that they worked not only to gain a subsistence, but that they might also have wherewithal to bestow in charity. He describes, as follows, the ceremonies of the solemn profession of a virgin. She presented herself, says he, at the foot of the altar, where she made her profession before the people; the bishop preached to her, gave her the veil which distinguished her from the other virgins; invited, by a prayer, Jesus Christ to come on the day of these spiritual nuptials, to receive his handmaid, who consecrated herself to him by a public profession, after having long before dedicated herself to him in spirit and in heart.

ANTI-PUSEYISM.—On the anniversary of the memorable "gunpowder plot" in 1605, and of "the revolution" in 1688, the commemorative services of the day were used in many of the metropolitan churches, the ministers of which took occasion to allude to the deliverance of the Church and nation from the domination of Rome.

One thing is noticeable in Puseyism. The observation of old forms, and the restoration of old practices are synchronous with the washing of old walls, and the removal of long accumulated incrustations. How much rubbish of purification (whitening, lime, stucco, &c.) has the attention lately attracted to ancient buildings swept out of the churches! The design of the founders ~~is~~ now sometimes made visible.—This is, at least, something.

The fifth of November, and the prayers for the plot afforded another opportunity for exemplifying the peace of the Church in England. The High Tories of the Low Church would stick by the prescribed form. The Low Tories of the High Church would not be dragged through the mire "with the blind leaders of the blind." They justify themselves in refusing or declining on the ground that these prayers were only appointed to be read by the Sovereign, King James I., in council, and were never appointed or confirmed in convocation, or by the Church. This is starting another and very delicate question, viz., whether the Sovereign, as "Head of the Church," can authorise prayers, &c., without the concurrence of the Church herself? And upon this point the contest waxeth warmer. The Tory Anti-Puseyist press say they do not care how these prayers came into the book of Common Prayer, but there they are, and have been in use for 154 years, and "Constant usage proves the opinion of the Church as to the propriety of the service better than twenty votes of convocations; and the ordination subscription binds the subscriber more strongly in every thing which continued usage, that is, really the consent of the Church, does not rescind, more strongly than any number of acts of convocation and Acts of Parliament."—Tablet.

The Puseyite Archdeacon Manning, the Tractarian Bishop of Down and Connor, Doctor Skinner, Bishop of the Congregations of Episcopal Dissenters at Aberdeen, and others, have formed a society, to be called the "Spottiswood Society," for the purpose of reprinting the writings of the episcopalian divines of Scotland and others, of a Romanist tendency. Amongst the works advertised for republication are those of Bishop Forbes, published after his death, and which prove him to have held Catholic opinions on the subject of invocation of saints, the Eucharist, &c.—Sheffield Independent.

THE ANGLICAN CHURCH.—"A secular temper came gradually over it, which was but little abated at the earliest part of this century, and of which we have too many traces still. In earlier days we never heard of self-denial, or any of the harder duties, even when collections were made for objects of charity; 'sacrifices' was a name unknown: everything was on an easy footing; decency and propriety were the standards and substitutes for holiness; daily advancement seemed scarcely contemplated as possible; to live under rule was unthought of; fasting was apparently expiring; daily service was being fast given up, even in our towns, for want of worshippers, even in the resorts of those who had leisure, the very service in Lent was often broken in upon, because two or three could not be brought together. In the country Good Friday itself was in whole districts neglected; catechising disused. Our People thus grew wild, and most of what was in earnest in the lower ranks fell into dissent. Communion was withdrawn from sight, and our 'daily bread' offered perhaps twice or thrice in the year. Doctrine and practice declined together; the true doctrine was forgotten; the service became cold, and few came; religious fervour seemed to be out of the Church rather than within it. Religion was never spoken of nor common topics spoken of religiously; our final account seemed to be forgotten among one sort, whilst in another a 'judgment according to our works,' was denied: measures of duty, teaching, ends, motives, hopes, seemed alike earthly; or, on the other hand, men were called upon to rely upon a Redeemer's blood, without being taught how to follow the blessed steps of His most holy life. On one side was a foundation with nothing built thereon; on the other, a lowly building—well, perhaps, that it was so, since it had no foundation. Religious education, church-building, and works of charity, were at a stand, so that if any one gave on a large scale, he became a sort of witness against the world; indecision was shown by complaint of the length of the service; unspirituality, by the constant proposals to alter it. In the state our empire was the idol; while fifty millions were, year by year, expended on war; not one five-hundredth could be obtained for one year for a religious purpose: we were ashamed to own, in the presence of our heathen subjects, that we were Christians; we paid military respect to their idols, and denied a knowledge of our own God; the thought of sending out a bishop to India, produced a panic; our very clergy seemed often more afraid of 'over-much' religion than of over-little. Of their two great sections, the one seemed to maintain the skeleton of a traditional system, holding truth often as a negation of other truth; the other, despairing that 'these dry bones could live,' betook themselves to a system foreign to our Church, formed themselves on the writings of the Non-conformists, and so were often themselves driven into dissent. Of the Sacraments, to use the language of an elder familiar with the school, 'the one was denied the other regarded as a means of religious excitement.' One may recite all this, which is only a specimen of much more that remains untold, though one must recite it with aching heart and shame of face." (Letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, by the Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D., Oxford, 1842.)

Mr. Newman, in his Introduction to his famous Tract, No. 90, laments "that the Church's strength would be irresistible, humanly speaking, were it but at unity with itself. . . . but that till its children be stirred up to a religious course, they must be content to be in bondage, and to work in chains." Mr. Ward, too, another zealous follower of Mr. Newman, thus speaks:—"The English Church seems, at least, to give an uncertain sound; she fails in one of her very principal duties, that of witnessing plainly and directly to Catholic truth; she seems to include whom she ought to repel, and to teach what she is bound to anathematise," &c. (A few words more in support of No. 90.)

But let us hear another writer of a different class. Has not Dr. Wiseman himself proved, almost to demonstration, the "Protestantism of the Anglican Church?" We all, no doubt, remember his powerful article in the Dublin Review for May, 1842. What language is used there, sufficient to overthrow our most sanguine expectations. Is not the Anglican Church called— and justly so—"a decrepid rebel of only three centuries: bearing stamped upon her features the history of her career, an offspring of the loose, coarse, and scoffing mind of Luther, and of the cold, harsh, and heartless fatalism of Calvin; stripped of all the glories of a Church, with preachers for priests, superintendents for bishops, consistories for synods? Their whole episcopate is Protestant to the core, bark and pith, root and bough—all eaten into, and hollowed, and hopelessly destroyed by the same canker-worm; it is useless to hope for Catholicism from it."—Tablet.

PROTESTANT MISSIONS IN THE EAST.

It is a subject of very painful reflection with many thoughtful Christians, that after all the display of zeal the last fifty years have evinced towards the subject of missions, comparatively little has been effected. Numbers of amiable, patient, industrious, single-minded men have left their homes, chosen a sphere of duty in the midst of hardships and difficulties, and, unknown to the world, have nobly done their part in the Christian cause: and yet what has been gained? The heathen have seen them come, have heard the sound of their discourses, have benefited by their charities, have learned to regard them as kind and benevolent friends: but on their death all is gone. The heathen multitude have been touched, as it were, but not gained, moulded, settled, and grafted into the religion. That this is a plain and sad matter of fact, I think scarce even an enthusiast will be hardy enough to deny; indeed, it is what is mournfully enough confessed—as a perplexing and disheartening truth, by many who wish it were otherwise, and pray that the heathen might become partakers of the same mercy with themselves. Is there not then some cause? Is there not some fatal flaw in our present mode of carrying on the work? In a word, is the system and method adopted—the true one? Let a missionary, for instance, leave this country upon the present system, earnest and resolved, knowing to what labours he is called; let him select his own station; let him establish himself—with his printing-press and assistants; let him continue his whole life faithfully labouring; and what, after all, is gained? Take the instance of Schwartz. The chief missionary dies; the few converts and subordinate lose their only bond of union: the establishment comes to nothing; the whole falls to pieces, as a piece of burned lime on being exposed to the air. And supposing his life to be long spared—which it seldom is, his success consists only in forming personal friendships rather than converts; and it is a question, whether he could transfer his flock to a stranger, with whom they were not personally acquainted, without putting their faith to a very serious risk. In all this there must be some deep-seated cause or causes; for Christ's word is with power, and His name was not wont to be used in vain by his servants who formerly spread His religion; neither is His holy name now less powerful than it used to be, for with Him a thousand years are but as one day. There must, therefore, be some fatal flaw in our system: for although they have wanted neither patience, labour, nor zeal, missionary labours of modern times amongst us have proved barren—to an extent truly deplorable. (Formby's Visit to the East, p. 160. Burns. 1843.)

MISCELLANEA.

A Correspondent says that the Rev. Mr. Sibthorp is meditating, if he have not already decided, upon another move into the bosom of the Roman Catholic Church. Since his recent alienation, or, as some assert, his abjuration of the errors of Popery, an active correspondence has been carried on between the rev. gentleman and Dr. Wiseman, and other priests at Oscott College, where Mr. Sibthorp is expected in a few days. He denies in his letters that he ever left the Roman Catholic Church, although he pleads guilty to having been absent "without leave," and to having given cause of great scandal to the enemies of the "true faith."—Herald.

CONVERSIONS.—In the Catholic Church, St. Mary's parish, Drogheda, on Wednesday morning, a native of England, and therefore a Protestant, named John Coates, was received into the "one fold." His profession of faith was made before the Rev. Mr. Gogarty, and a considerable number of persons who were highly edified by the pious demeanour of the newly-generated. In the same church last week a respectable female, whose parents reside in this town and are still Protestants, made profession of the Catholic faith before the Rev. Peter O'Reilly, of the same parish.—Drogheda Argus.

PRACTICE OF IDOLATRY.—We flatter ourselves that no one will suspect us of insincerity on this subject, as no one can deny our opportunities of knowing the truth. We say, then, deliberately, that any man must be mad, or a liar, who charges the Catholic Church in England with the practice of idolatry—with the practice of paying Divine honour to any being or thing other than God. We say "in England," not as having any doubt of the Church in other countries, but because we are speaking here only of our own personal experience. Moreover, we have often tried to form some conception of the state of mind which could render it possible for a person really believing and knowing what is implied in the doctrine of transubstantiation, also to believe and practise idolatry; but we have never succeeded—so all-but-impossible does it appear to us. We say, further, that since we (unworthy) have entered the Church, we have been making discoveries in another direction. We have found that instead of being too lavish, the English Catholics are far too niggardly in their use of those touching devotions, and those means and instruments of devotion which the Church encourages for the edification of her children; far too infrequent and distant in their addresses to the Saints, and to the Blessed Mother of God in particular—(whose name and titles it is a happiness even to write)—far too cold in their use of images and the sensible aids to worship. The notion that in a Catholic Christian these things lead to idolatry, or are in any way connected with it, is nothing better than a wild whim-y, proceeding from that cold, harsh, sour, saddened, bottomless, repugnant, and repulsive fanaticism, which calls itself Evangelical Protestantism. Idolators, Mr. Faber? because we are devout to Mary and use images? Why, we are not half idolatrous enough. We haven't half enough of Mary-worship and image-worship. We should be much better Christians if we had much more of it. But we are a perverted race; chilled down almost to freezing point in this ice-pail of Protestantism. The dreadful contagion of scepticism everywhere around us has bred a pestilence in our flesh, and wasted the very bones and marrow of our faith. We are afraid of loving Christ as we ought in the Sacrament of the altar; and not loving Him, how can we love His Mother, His Saints, and the images and memorials of things hallowed for His sake. Idolators! We haven't heart enough, or blood enough in our torpid veins to become idolators. We haven't the making of one idolator in a hecatomb of us. There is rather too much of the Sadducee in our composition. We strive to be correct, cold, and formal. To idolise is a term of hearty affection. We dare not idolise anything; how, then, can we be idolators? No, no; the man who pretends he has smelt out idolatry among the Catholics of England, may next boast of his discoveries in the articles of pigeons-milk and strap-oil—two things which school boys are sent to purchase on April fool-day.—Tablet, Nov. 19, 1843.

ST. GEORGE'S CATHEDRAL.—"When we look with pain on the mean buildings which the Establishment are raising up, the universal feature of which is cheapness, we see a splendid temple has been raised in the environs of the metropolis, which is not equalled by any church built since the Reformation, which, with the presbytery and schools, will form a truly ecclesiastical group, and evince that ages of persecution and obloquy have not annihilated the spirit of church-building in the professors of the ancient faith. And when we reflect that voluntary offerings alone, without aid from the Government, or from rates wrung from the unwilling pockets of Dissenters, have sufficed to rear the pile; and when we hear further that another equally spacious structure is about to be built in another suburb, it will be seen that the ancient spirit of church building which led to the construction of the thousands of glorious piles in our land, though obscured and depressed, is not entirely extinguished."—Gentleman's Magazine, Oct., 1843. So much for the Protestant; now for the Catholic view of the question:—"In the days of faith, ancient London contained within its walls a population of about 200,000 souls, and this population erected and upheld ninety-seven parish churches, a vast cathedral, and numerous collegiate churches, besides many colleges, monasteries, convents, hospitals, and chantries. It is computed that the Catholic population of the metropolis amounts to upwards of 200,000, and yet, with shame be it written, they cannot erect one parish church, but suffer a magnificent temple to remain without pinnacles or spire, without a tower or bells, with windows unglazed and floor unpaved, rather than contribute a few shillings for so glorious and holy a purpose. Many probably think that the finishing of St. George's Church is a matter that exclusively belongs to those Catholics who reside on that side of the water; but such is not the case. It is not the affair of a locality—it concerns the entire metropolis, and no Catholic should cease to contribute till he sees the spire surmount the tower, the cross the spire, and the cock (emblem of St. Peter's fall) the cross, that all within sight, from the Surrey hills to Hampstead, and from Greenwich to Harrow, may be warned that, unless they watch and pray, they will be sure to fall into temptation."—Orthodox Journal.

WESTBROMWICH.—On Sunday, Oct. 29, 1843, the Sacrament of Confirmation was administered in the church of St. Michael, Westbromwich, by the Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman, to eighty persons, the majority of whom were adults, who through the goodness of God and the untiring exertions of the beloved incumbent of this place, had recently embraced the Catholic faith. Before the administration of the holy rite, his lordship addressed the recipients in a truly eloquent and apostolical manner. In the evening the Right Rev. Father in God addressed a large and respectable congregation. There were present many Protestants and Dissenters, whose attention to the learned bishop's powerful discourse was intense. On Tuesday last a tea meeting was held in the Catholic School-room, which was numerously attended. There were present the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Spencer, Dean of St. Mary's College, Oscott; the Rev. G. Bent, the esteemed pastor of Westbromwich; the Rev. Mr. Fox, of Walsal; and the Rev. Michael Horgan, of Dudley. Several excellent addresses were delivered during the evening. The object for which the meeting was held, was to obtain means to assist in the erection of a beautiful-toned bell, which has recently been purchased by subscription: it was made by Mr. Blewes, of St. Bartholemew-street, Birmingham, and was obtained at a very reasonable charge. The increasing duties of our pastor have induced the Catholics of Westbromwich to raise a handsome sum of money, which they have presented to the rev. gentleman for the purchase of a horse.—The Tablet, November 11, 1843.

DUMFRIES.—On last Wednesday week, All Saints, the Catholics here were truly happy to see the Duke of Bordeaux kneel among them, before the altar of the Most High. His Royal Highness and suite, the Duc de Levis, Admiral Villaret de Joyeuse, Monsieur de Bertrande, and attendants, left the Duke of Buccleugh's Castle, Drumlanrig, at an early hour, arriving in Dumfries, sixteen miles distance, about nine o'clock. At the church door they were met by the Rev. Wm. Reid, and conducted to the seat of M. C. Maxwell, Esq., of Terregies. All classes were highly edified by the example, and very much pleased with the appearance of the Royal Duke. After Mass they set off immediately, as we understand, for Alton Towers.—Ibid.

SYNOD OF THE CATHOLIC PRELATES.—The Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland commenced their annual synod in Dublin on Tuesday last. The attendance has been most numerous, only three or four very infirm prelates being absent. Matters of considerable importance, it is expected will be discussed and adopted at this meeting.—Tablet Correspondent.

CONSECRATION OF THE RIGHT REV. DR. M'NALLY.—On Sunday last the solemn consecration of the Right Rev. Dr. Charles M'Nally, late Prefect of the Dunboyne Establishment, of Maynooth, took place in the Catholic church of Monaghan. So early as ten o'clock the church was filled to overflowing with the bishops, clergy, and laity, from that and the surrounding counties, presenting a truly-interesting appearance. At half-past ten o'clock his Grace the Primate of all Ireland, the Most Rev. Dr. Crotty, accompanied and assisted by the Right Rev. Dr. Higgins, Bishop of Ardagh, and the Right Rev.

Dr. Browne, Bishop of Kilmore, proceeded to the solemn act of consecration. The consecrating bishop, and the bishop elect, had been fasting from the day preceding. The church was fitted out with the usual cross, candlesticks, credence, holy water vessels, aspersorium basin, water, towel, bread, censer, censer-boat, &c. &c. The Bishops were clothed in the pontifical vestments, and the solemn ceremonial, as prescribed in the Roman Pontifical, was strictly observed. The Right Rev. Dr. Cantwell, Bishop of Meath; the Right Rev. Dr. Denvir, Bishop of Down and Connor; the Right Rev. Dr. M'Gettigan, Bishop of Raphoe; and the venerable Bishop of the Diocese, the Right Rev. Dr. Kernan, assisted on the occasion. After the apostolical letter of his Holiness was read, and the examination and responses of the newly-appointed bishop over, the consecration was proceeded with, when the newly-consecrated prelate passed through the church to impart to the thousands assembled his solemn benediction. The scene was touchingly sublime. In the evening the Right Rev. Dr. M'Nally entertained the private, the bishops, and the clergy, to a splendid dinner, in the hotel of Monaghan, which was supplied with everything, and in the most admirable style. A letter from the illustrious Archbishop of Tuam was received, in which his grace stated, that although he had taken his seat in the coach in order to be present on this interesting occasion, yet, when about to depart, the unexpected death of a very dear friend prevented his enjoying that great pleasure.—Tablet Correspondent.

On Sunday last, the Most Rev. Doctor M'Hale, Archbishop of Tuam, held an Ordination in the Cathedral, and conferred the order of priesthood on the Rev. Mr. O'Mahy, and the order of sub-deacon on the Rev. Mr. Waldron. His Grace was assisted in the ceremony by the Rev. Messrs. Flannely, M'Evilly, and O'Regan.—Tuam Herald.

WATERFORD.—The Sisters of Charity, Waterford, administer relief every week to 140 sick and starving families. They distribute 16 tons of coal, 3½ tons of oatmeal, 2½ tons of straw, 1127 cwt. of potatoes, 4630 gallons of broth and bread, 22 pair of blankets, 825 articles of clothing; besides expending in small sums 60l.—Freeman.

The sums expended by Government in support of the Anglo-Irish Church amount annually to 1,749,818l. 11s. 1d.; to Protestant Dissenters, 878,753l. 9s. 2d.; to the Church of Rome, 365,007l. 1s. 2d.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.—It is consoling in the highest degree to find, notwithstanding the great poverty prevalent in Ireland, that the collections, &c., in favour of the Association for the Propagation of the Faith for the month ending Monday last was 700l. The unceasing charity of our impoverished people is unparalleled, and ought to stimulate those of great and prosperous nations to augmented efforts in favour of this thrice-hallowed institution.—Ibid.

THE DUBLIN CATHOLIC INSTITUTION.—This establishment continues to receive the aid which it so eminently deserves. Indeed, we should be surprised, if, when it is generally known, there be one Catholic in Dublin who will not become a member of it. To have the most solid, pleasing, and interesting news daily, the use of a good library and most convenient rooms, for three-halfpence a week, or fourpence a month, is a thing scarcely ever known before. There is another reason why we desire all Catholics in and near the metropolis to aid this institution, and that is, because the clergy who have so kindly promoted its welfare have thereby given a practical proof of the falsehood of the vile Orange charge, that "they wish to keep the people in ignorance."—Ibid.

THE SOVEREIGN PONTIFF.—THE LIBERATOR.—His Holiness the Pope has directed that prayers be offered up every day, in the Pontifical Chapel, for the safety, long life, and success of Ireland's Liberator.—Freeman.

FRANCE.

THE CARDINAL NUNCIO AND O'CONNELL.—A correspondent of the Dublin Pilot at Paris, writes as follows:—"Before I left England, in the latter end of August, I saw in many of the Tory papers attacks made upon the Pope and Catholic religion, on account of the revival, at Ancona, of some old edict against the Jews, but not having seen or heard any thing about it for nearly two months, I was in ignorance as to what had become of it, and being here at the fountain-head of all European intelligence, I was determined not to leave it until I would make inquiries on the subject, and for that purpose I waited upon the Rev. Mr. M'Sweeney, president of the Irish College. That gentleman had only lately returned from Ireland, and was unable to give the desired information; but he advised me to seek an interview with the Pope's Nuncio, whom he thought would receive me most kindly, when he understood my object to be to contradict, through the press, and from the most authentic source, the charge of persecution that was made against the head of the Catholic Church. I accordingly called at the residence of his eminence, in the Rue Saint Grennelle, Saint Germain; and half-past nine on the following morning was appointed for the interview. I was punctual in attendance, and was not kept more than a minute in waiting, till I was ushered into his presence. He is a most benevolent-looking man, and has a resemblance to Father Mathew. He was dressed in a stuff surtan, and had a gold chain about his neck, from which a cross, set with precious stones, was suspended. There was an air of simplicity about the place, in perfect accordance with the meekness and humility of its possessor, and very unlike the noise and bustle at the British embassy, where I had been the previous day getting my passport viséd. I was never more kindly received by any person, high or low, either at home or abroad, and when I explained the object of my visit, he highly applauded the motives which prompted it, and, in language most emphatic, replied that there was no such thing in these days as persecution on account of religious opinions, and that so far from his Holiness having revived the edict in question, he had totally cancelled it, and that I might state so in the newspapers with which I was connected. He then asked me if I had heard any news from Ireland, or was it likely that the prosecution against O'Connell would be followed up. I then replied it was not likely, but certain. Well then, said he, he will never be condemned. All Europe knows that he has violated no law. I said that that was quite evident, but that he had in Ireland a bad species of Protestants, called Orangemen, of which the jury would be composed, inasmuch as the government had the appointment of the sheriff, the sheriff had the selection of the jury, and that when a Catholic came to be tried before such juries, he was sure to be found guilty, no matter how slight the evidence, or how founded the charge might be. His eminence turned up his eyes to heaven, and exclaimed, 'God help the poor Irish! God will protect O'Connell, for he has truth and liberty on his side—he has always been the apostle of peace.'

THE CATHOLIC CLERGY IN SPAIN.—Look at Spain: where is there a population more inclined to cherish its parish ministers, or a spiritual body more indefatigable, exemplary, or successful than the country clergyman of Spain in the discharge of his duties to all parishioners who require his good offices to mind, body, or estate?—Times.

SOUTHERN AFRICA.

CAPE TOWN, Sept. 2, 1843.—You will remember the animadversions upon the Chief Magomo, which gave so much offence to his Missionary Friends. This Man, alternately an Independent and a Wesleyan, they used to praise for coming to Meeting and bringing his Wives with him, as a devout Convert should! It now appears from the Cape Frontier Times, of Wednesday last that this hopeful Christian has been publicly employed, almost under the Guns of Fort Beaufort, in burning to Death a poor Kaffre Wretch by a slow Fire, on a pretended charge of "Witchcraft!" The Fortress where this abominable deed, "to the everlasting Disgrace," as the Editor justly remarks, "of the British Name was committed, is, you will remember, the very same which I have so often mentioned a propos of the sufferings of the hundreds of Catholics in its garrison, to whom the Secretaries of State, Whig and Tory, have determined, for so many years past, to deny the consolations of their own religion, while at the same time they pester and torment them with the Offices of Swaddlers in red Coats and black. There are at this moment nearly Thirty Institutions for "Christian" Instruction, Churches, Chapels, and Schools, according to this day's Commercial Advertiser, all belonging to Protestants, between the Fish River and the Kei, and the numbers of Men, Women, and Children who attend present many thousands." Attend? in what manner? To hear the preaching? Magomo attends, and yet he has wives, and burns Kaffres!—Tablet.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

A letter just received by our Dublin Correspondent from a Catholic at Perth (Swan River) in Western Australia, states that there is a great want of Catholic clergymen in that most distant mission.—Tablet.

THE DOUBLE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES OF PROTESTANT CONTROVERSIALISTS.

Under this head, in a previous number, we directed the attention of our readers to the inconsistency of which Protestants are guilty by adopting, in their disputes with Infidels and Atheists, the very principles of argumentation which they impugn in their controversies with Catholics. The matter well deserves the consideration of every sincere Christian, and we therefore propose, on this occasion, to illustrate our former remarks, by a few additional quotations from an author of very great repute among Protestants.

It ought to be obvious to every Christian, that as Christianity is pure and unsullied truth, it cannot be necessary to rest its defence on false or inconsistent principles; and it is equally clear, that Protestantism is not true Christianity, but an adulteration or mutilation of it, if, in order to support itself, it must lean on contradictory principles.

Were we to affirm that the Scriptures without note or comment should be circulated among all classes of men, even the unstable and unlearned, among Heathens as well as Christians, and that the written word alone is not only a safe and easy, but the only rule of faith and morals for the ignorant as well as the tutored mind, we would be merely repeating the assertions of Protestants. That the letter alone of Scripture, therefore, is sufficient of itself to instruct unto salvation, every one who can read it or hear it, is a Protestant principle, jealousy and constantly insisted on by Protestant writers in their attacks on the Catholic Church. But let us hear the principles which one of their greatest Champions adopts in proving to infidels the inspiration of the apostles. We quote from Horne (Appendix No. 2, vol. 1. p. 477.)

"The Spirit was to assist their memories, in such a manner, that they should have a perfect recollection of whatsoever Christ had said to them. This assistance of the Spirit implied, not merely recalling to the view of their minds the things which Christ had spoken, but also the enabling them to understand those things rightly, without that confusion and misapprehension, which Jewish prejudices had occasioned in their ideas, when they first heard them. Unless they were led into such a perfect understanding of the things they were enabled to remember, the bare recollection of them would be of little use, nor would the Spirit act according to his office of leading them into all truth, unless they were enabled by his influences, properly to understand the truths which Christ himself had taught them." What will our separated brethren say to this! The apostles were instructed by Christ himself, but the recollection of all that Christ had taught them would have been of very little use, had they not been enabled by a particular and special inspiration of the Holy Ghost to understand rightly what they had heard from him; and if this be true of the apostles who lived and conversed with the Redeemer, who spoke the same language and were brought up in the same rank of life with him, how much more necessary is a special inspiration of the Holy Ghost to enable those who speak not the original language of the scriptures, to understand them rightly? Is it not infinitely more difficult for the great mass of Protestants in our days to understand rightly the meaning of the written word of Christ, which descends to them through so many translations, than it was for the Apostles to understand what they recollected to have heard him preach verbally? The various modulations of a speaker's voice, the emphasis laid on particular words, his gesture, and even his looks, enable his hearers to understand many things which would be very obscure to a reader of the same discourse; and yet we are told that the apostles of Christ, with all the advantages of hearers and fellow countrymen, were not half so well able to understand their Master's doctrine, as Pro-testaments are after the lapse of 1800 years, with all the disadvantages of readers and foreigners. Who would believe it?—Credat Judæus Apella, non ego. Is every Protestant, therefore, who reads the Bible, under the special inspiration of the Holy Ghost while he reads it? Are the Presbyterians under that inspiration, and the Church of Englandmen, and the Quakers, and the Socinians, and the rest? If we admit any, we must admit all to be inspired, and yet, strange to say, they cannot agree among themselves, like the apostles in understanding the words of Christ rightly. Such are the conclusions to which we are led by the inconsistent and contradictory principles alternately advocated by Protestant writers. We have still another very valuable quotation to make from the same page of the same Protestant author to prove that the weights and measures of Protestant Controversialists are both false and double.

"The Holy Spirit," says Horne, "under whose teaching they (the apostles) were to be thus instructed, was to abide with them for ever, as the Spirit of truth, guiding them into all truth, teaching them all things respecting the doctrine of Christ which they were to communicate to the world. These important promises of the effusion, assistance, direction and perpetual guidance of the Spirit with the apostles, were most certainly fulfilled in all their extent and meaning. They were promises given by Christ himself, the great and chief Prophet of the Church; and to entertain a doubt of their most complete accomplishment, would be to impeach the veracity and mission of the Son of God, and to admit a supposition, that would strike at the truth of Christianity in general."

This is plain, cool, deliberate language which recommends itself to the mind of every sincere Christian, by its good sense as well as by its accordance with a true notion of the Redeemer's attributes, and we entreat our Protestant friends to reflect on it. Must not all the promises of Christ be alike fulfilled, whether they were made to the apostles, or to the Church founded by them, or to both inclusive? And if to entertain a doubt of the most complete accomplishment of the promises made to the apostles would be to impeach the veracity and mission of the Son of God, are not his veracity and mission equally impeached by doubting of the most complete accomplishment of the promises made by him to his Church? And yet do not Protestants say that the promises of security from error and hell's gates, which Christ made to his Church have not secured her from error nor from hell's gates? Is it not asserted by Luther and in the Protestant Book of Homilies (of the Church of England) that for 800 years and more, all Christendom, the whole Church of Christ, was sunk in idolatry, and is not this alleged fact assigned as a reason for framing a new creed and a new Church, whose duty it would be to protest against the old one?

All this cannot be denied, but neither can it be denied that Christ said to the apostles and their successors (Matthew c. 28, v. 26.) "Behold I am with you all days even to the consummation of the world;" and again (Matthew c. 16, v. 18.) "And I say to thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of Hell shall not prevail against it."

These, like all the promises made to the apostles, are given by Christ himself, the great and chief Prophet of the Church, and in the language of Horne, to entertain a doubt (as Protestants do) of their most complete accomplishment is to impeach the veracity and mission of the Son of God, and to admit a supposition that strikes at the truth of Christianity in general.

PONDICHERRY AND CHINA.

The Bishop, Vicar Apostolic at Pondicherry, writes to His Grace, Dr. Carew, that he convened a Synodal Meeting of the Clergy of His Lordship's Vicariate lately at Pondicherry, at which, besides the Rev. F. Berrand, the Superior of the Jesuit Missionaries of Madura, twenty-five European and three Native Priests assisted. His Lordship also adds that he had lately received a letter from Bishop Perocheau, Vicar Apostolic of Sutchuen in China, dated 1st September, 1843, who states that in the course of that same year, twenty-two thousand two hundred and ninety-two infant children of infidel parents had been baptized, when they (the infants) were dangerously ill. Of this number thirteen thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine died after Baptism, and are now happily in Heaven, praising God and praying for China. A Society called the ANGELIC, has been formed lately in that Vicariate. It consists of persons appointed to baptize, some of whom travel continually from one district to another, and others remain stationary. Divine Providence has deigned to give an abundant blessing to the holy Bishop's labours.

CONVERTS.

Since last week an English woman, a Protestant, was received into the Church. An Englishman of the same persuasion came forward of himself and expressed his determination to embrace Catholicity. He had for some time an opportunity of conversing with a well informed Lay person, and was thus happily gained over to the truth.

MADRAS—MISSIONARY ARRIVALS.

We are happy to announce the safe arrival at Madras, per the "Lady Flora," of the Rev. Messrs. Fennelly and Walsh, with a considerable number of Ecclesiastical Students, Nuns, and Christian Brothers.

This is the third Missionary party which the Lady Flora has conveyed to Madras, and we trust that the services which she has thus rendered to religion, in the way of business, will merit for her the blessing of good fortune and prosperity to the end of her career. The Rev. Mr. Fennelly, we understand, is brother to the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly, Vicar Apostolic of Madras.

We learn from letters just received, that the Rev. C. Murphy has been removed from St. Thomas's Mount to Secunderabad, and that the Rev. P. Gannon, late Officiating Chaplain to H. M.'s 57th Regiment in Fort St. George, Madras, has been appointed to the station of Arcot.

Two more zealous, more efficient and amiable Clergymen, we believe, there are not in India, than the Rev. Mr. Gannon and the Rev. Mr. Murphy, and we hope that their Missionary labours will be no less singularly blessed by Providence, in their present respective localities, than in their late Missions, where the happy fruits of their zeal and unremitting exertions have been so abundant.

Under other circumstances their absence from Madras, St. Thomas's Mount and Poonamallee, would be painfully distressing to religion in these several Missions, but the late arrivals by the Lady Flora will enable the good Bishop to provide, as before, for the Missionary wants of these places, while the Missions at Arcot and Secunderabad will be greatly benefitted by the aid of new or additional resources. Thus does our good God provide in his own good time for the wants of his Church; and thus are its branches daily extended and its growth developed, till like the mustard seed, it becomes a tree in every soil where our holy faith is once sown.

The following letter is from the same pious and talented gentleman, whose letters to his Protestant Friends in Europe, which have appeared in the Herald, have excited the attention and admiration of the Catholic Community in Bengal.

Madras, Feb. 8, 1844.

MY DEAR LORD,—Your Lordship will I am sure experience the feelings expressed by St. Paul, "if one member glory, all the members rejoice with it," for this is only exclusively applicable to the holy Catholic Church, when you learn that we have to 'glory' and to 'rejoice' that the Rev. S.

Fennelly and his religious party of one Priest, two Nuns, 3 Postulants, 8 Monks, and 3 Students arrived safely on Sunday, the 4th instant. We again on this side of India hope soon to have to recapitulate in our turn this Christian fellow-joy, when we hear of the safe landing of your Lordship's Volunteers, the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe and his party of religious, and who are by this time singing the Lord's Hosannas on the high waters. How beautiful indeed and heavenly is this universal sympathy in the Catholic Church, for whether it is a cause of sorrow or of joy, it reverberates through all her wide veins—she feels it in every core. The heavy, and so heavy that it seems to have taken four years to have reached us—tidings of the one hundred martyrs of Corea, has ere this resounded through the far off woody wilds of America; it has been by this time related behind the 'Rocky mountains,' how the aged Patriarch—the holy Bishop Jernbert, and the glorious Priests Chastan and Maubant of Corea commingled their blood with the 25 decapitated confessors, the pure and martyred virgins, and the 4 'innocents' of 12 years of age. So she rejoices in her lamentation, in the glory of these late martyrs, as she does while she counts her thousands of Neophytes in China, in the South Sea Islands, and elsewhere. She alone indeed plays truly upon the Harp of David, and may say with him, "O ye sons of men, how long will you be dull of heart! why do you love vanity, and seek after a lie!" I find, my dear Lord, I must yield the palm to your country, I thought once (as you may remember) my own was the best, but alas! when I view her as the Greenland of Christendom, it makes me mute, yet, thank God, the ice is lately broken, the thick and dark mist, which has so long covered her mountains and rocky shores, is gradually giving way to the bright sun of truth. Oh! may she in this shattered state—in this vapoury and fluctuating form—float towards the congenial south, and return like the prodigal son to the one fold of Christ, but your Lordship's glorious land, Green Erin, sends out her good Missionaries and the devoted handmaids of religion to labour in this far distant portion of the Lord's vineyard, notwithstanding she is writhing under the hand of oppression and persecution. I often wonder how the Protestant can contemplate this, and not be struck, as indeed he must, if not with religious envy, at least with admiration and astonishment, in observing the noble disinterestedness, which actuates these devoted bands of Christ; he sees others come out to better their worldly condition, and Protestant Missionaries under a certainly of a handsome and often lucrative provision, but the good and zealous Catholic Priest alone, with the heroic and heaven-inspired Nun, the devout and humble Monk, and the ardent and talented Catholic Student, braves ocean, climate, and distance, without a thought of profit, but trusting their subsistence to that Christian charity which, like the pure dew-drop falls, upon them as it were imperceptibly, when darkness reigns around—when error, bigotry, calumny, and venality vainly conspire against them. I have been informed that the Rev. Mr. Walsh, one of the new comers, is to be appointed to St. Thomas' Mount. Apropos of the Mount; the wants of the mission in the interior called for the services of the two clergymen who lately occupied that important post, the Rev. Cornelius Murphy, and the Rev. Patrick Gannon; they left about the 20th ultimo; I need hardly remind your Grace that these two young divines received the unction of the Holy Orders through your Apostolical hands, and fruitful indeed has been the blessing, for those young vines of the Church of Christ have produced glorious fruit, and they are now gone to spread the same holy seed in the distant provinces. Mr. Murphy went to the Mount in February 1842, and Mr. Gannon some seven or eight months ago. From that period to their departure they received into the Catholic Church 66 Protestant Converts, Europeans and East Indians, 7 only being under three years of age, and 47 native heathens; this does not include the converts, made at Palaverian and the adjacent villages, so it may be said with safety they have 200 converts in all. No doubt, the greatest number were made by Mr. Murphy, but Mr. G. also justly comes in for his share of the glory, which is reserved for them in heaven; when I write of one, I write of the other; they both seem to have been cast in the same mould of spirit, brothers truly in Christ, humble, pious, zealous and devoted to their people; the envy of the Saints—the pride of their congregations; even honest and sincere Protestants could not but admire their virtue, and the ardour with which they sought the good of their fellow creatures, for in them the good qualities of the Pastors of the people were beautifully developed, and corresponding virtues were edifyingly reflected back by the reciprocal conduct of their flocks. It is true the stimulus was not wanting; petty persecution and unchristian bigotry tended to unite the Pastor and his people more closely, as the appearance of the wolf does the shepherd and his flock, while, at the same time, it helped to open the eyes of honest and truth-seeking Protestants to the beauty of the Catholic Church; when, however, it is considered that the number of European and East Indian Protestants within their range did not exceed 600, according to the statistics taken in June, 1842, and of Catholics of all grades 1128, their success may be considered a glorious triumph of truth over error; a most productive harvest, notwithstanding the barrenness of the soil around, and no doubt the new labourers will cultivate it with equal care and success. Long ago the grateful and pious people presented to each of the Rev. Gentlemen alluded to, a splendid gold chain and medal, and when they left, bestowed upon them a still more valuable gift, their fervent blessings and thankful tears. So may the Pastors of the Catholic Church and their people ever live together and separate—as separate they must, one way or the other. But I have to beg your Lordship's pardon for thus indulging my feelings, at the expense of your precious time. Begging to be remembered by your Grace, I remain, with the deepest veneration and sincerity,

Yours very truly,

C. A. C.

N. B. The enclosed affecting and tender expressions of grateful affection could only emanate from Catholics, and be produced by the soul moving spirit of the Catholic faith—it breathes the genuine warmth of our holy religion. The bold soldier writes to his Pastor, as a dutiful child writes to a loving parent. It has fallen in my way, and I send it for your hebdomadal Journal, the Herald. I understand the Farewell between Mr. Murphy and his people was like the departure of the dearest member in the family for a far distant clime. I saw the good Pastor in tears! so tender and deep rooted is the link which true religion entwines round the minds of her votaries—vox populi, vox Dei!

From the T. A. Society and Roman Catholics of H. M. 57th Regt. To the Revd. Patrick Gannon, St. Mary's Seminary, Madras.

REVD. DEAR SIR,—With sorrow we heard you announce your intended departure from amongst us, you, whom we so long affectionately looked upon as our Spiritual Father and Director; by our tears only could be told what passed within us, on hearing your tender farewell.

We part with you, Rev. Father, with the sincerest and deepest regard, but with the assurance that you will remember in your prayers your spiritual children in the 57th and the Society (of Temperance) you were so instrumental and zealous in forming among us. Go, Revd. Sir, it is God's will, and we trust for his greater Glory, that you are to separate from us, and may the blessing of the Almighty attend your ministry, in the discharge of the duties you are called to perform, in your newly appointed charge. Receive, Rev. Sir, the heartfelt humble thanks of your poor but grateful Countrymen, for the arduous and tiresome duties you performed for them, and be assured, Rev. Father, that the Prayers of your children shall be unceasingly offered, that your portion in the next life may be with those who instructed many unto salvation, and who shall shine like stars in the firmament of Heaven for all Eternity. Farewell.

With the approbation of the T. A. Society and Catholics, we remain, Rev. Dear Father, your very gratefully humble servants.

LETTER No. IX.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.
MY DEAR FRIENDS,

The terms 'Catholic' and, 'Protestant,' are not synonymous, but contraries,—this may be more clearly seen by an illustration or two. Let us suppose that a Roman Catholic stranger were, in one of the large towns in England, to ask a respectable citizen, be he Roman Catholic or Protestant, "which is the Catholic Church, or Chapel", would he not be at once directed to the place of worship of the Church of Rome, and were twenty more such strangers to ask the same question, they would be shewn alike to the Catholic Church. Each might be guided to a different Chapel, but they would all hear the same doctrine, and meet with the same form of worship. Let us, however, change the case, and suppose these strangers to be Protestants; would it not be utterly absurd in them to ask, "which is the Catholic Church," if they were seeking for the Protestant one; for assuredly, they would be directed to the Roman Catholic Church, were they to inquire for theirs by such a name! How, therefore, must they put the query? Is it by asking, "which is the Protestant Church?" Why, if they were to put it in this form, the Presbyterian might be directed to the Lutheran Chapel, the Churchman to the Independent, the Anabaptist to the Methodist, the Quaker to the Unitarian, and so on. The Protestant then must not only in such interrogation exclude the word "Catholic," because it infers one Church, one belief, and one worship, but he must designate his particular Church by its distinguishing Christianity, as a Lutheran, a Wesleyan, a Socinian, a Presbyterian, &c. This is one illustration of the term Catholic and Protestant. Let us have another exposition of it. Suppose a person were to ask twenty different Protestants of what religion they were, the first might answer, I am a Lutheran, the second a Church of Englandman, the third, a Calvinist, the fourth, a Unitarian, the fifth,—but enough, ask the same question of one hundred, ah! were it possible, of a million of the members of the Church of Rome, and one and all would answer you, "I am a Catholic," our Christianity is one. So, St. Pacian beautifully described his religious title, about 1400 years ago, to the Separatists of his day. "Christian is my name, Catholic is my surname." Let us put this question again in another shape. Let a Protestant ask, "which is the house of God?" If the person questioned, happened to be a Calvinist, would he point out the Lutheran Church to him as such? No. Were he a Church of Englandman, would he point out the Baptist Chapel to him as such? No. Were he an Unitarian, would he point out the Methodist Meeting house to him as such? No. Were he a Ranter, would he point out the Quaker's place of worship to him as such? No. For each would of course point out his own particular place of worship to him as the true house of God, and thus the inquirer might put the question to fifty Protestants professing opposite doctrines, and yet not find out what he would consider to be "the house of God," his own special Chapel. The question, however, is perfectly legitimate and conformable to the word of God, but not applicable or suited to Protestantism. Let a Catholic put the same interrogatory to as many Catholics as he may think fit, and he will by all have the Catholic Church pointed out to him as "the house of God." How characteristic of the Church of Christ, then, is the word "Catholic;" how beautiful and striking is this mark of her oneness! Go to America, and the red Indian of the West will point out to you the Church by that universal name. Come to India, and the simple Hindoo will show to you her tabernacle. Travel to Africa, and the poor negro will lead you to her place of worship. Venture to China, and you will find the cross planted there upon her temples: and take a voyage to the islands in the South Pacific Ocean, and you will see the once savage cannibal humbly and penitently bow himself before her Altar. She is as the sun to mankind; each nation and tribe knows Her by its own peculiar language and idiom. She is one in name and one in doctrine. She is, "as a mountain on the top of mountains," that all nations may flow unto her," Isa II. 2. She is, as she is described in the characters of the Apostles, "The light of nations" Matt. V. 14. She is, as the inspired prophet describes her, "a path, a holy way, a straight way, so that fools cannot err therein." She is, by her distinctive mark of being one in faith and one in name, so signalised, that the uncivilized and the savage may easily know her for something more than a human institution, and the presence of Protestant sects only makes the contrast more striking. So sensible, indeed, was the first Protestant, Luther, of the virtue and efficacy of the title of "Catholic," that in translating the Apostles' Creed into Dutch, he substituted the word Christian for that of Catholic; so did the early Lutherans in their Catechism, and which brought upon them the sarcasm of the celebrated Protestant, Fulke. The Protestants of the present day are, in this respect, as industrious as their progenitors in religion, but the attempt was and ever will be futile. The tree is known by its fruit, the Catholic Church by her universality, unity, visibility, &c., and even were mankind to be so absurd as to act contrary to reason and Scripture and bestow upon you the appellation of "Catholic," what would it avail you? What value is the shell without the kernel!—the casket without the jewel? and how would you be benefitted by the title of "Catholic," without the substance, without your having one faith, one form of worship, and without "unity in the bond of peace?" You would be still as virtually Protestant as you are now. It would not truly be one iota more preposterously absurd in the Church of Rome to take the name of Protestant, then it would be in the other to adopt that of Catholic, each would be so totally at variance with their distinct characters and principles. Not more applicable therefore is the word "Catholic" to the Church of Rome, than that of Protestant is to the religion of the Reformers. The term "Protestant," was admirably chosen, though it is a bitter satire upon the maxims of the Christian religion, for not a word in the whole lexicon could be found so appropriate or universal in its signification of "Separatist" as that of Protestant. It signifies not only one who protests from the Church of Rome, but one who may, as you profess, conscientiously separate himself from every other received opinion or doctrine. It has no limit. First Luther protests alone against all Christendom; then his disciple, Calvin, protested against his doctrine, and Zuinglius against both these. Again the framers of the Church of England protested against their continental brethren, then the Baptists, Unitarians, Quakers, Ranters, &c. entered their protest against all these and against each other reciprocally, and this is a practical illustration and definition of the word Protestant. It is an epitome of Protestation, Separation, Disunion and Dissension; the former begets the latter three, and enmities, contentions, strifes and sects spring from all these. The name Protestant, then, implies a principle, which is diametrically opposed to the spirit of Christianity, it is adverse to spiritual authority, it breaks asunder the bonds of unity, it lays the holy ordinances of God prostrate before human and individual reason, it may embrace or reject them at pleasure. When you compare the import, then, of the two words, Catholic and Protestant, you cannot but be sensible of the absurdity of your attempting to shield yourselves under that glorious and exclusive title of the Church of Rome*. The Catholicity of our respective Creeds then, my dear friends, can stand no comparison. Will you place three hundred and thirty years at most in juxtaposition with 1843 years—60 millions or so, of souls, with at least three times the number—a rood with a mile—fragments of contradictory religions, with one universal creed, and say, Catholicity or Universality is on your side? Ridiculous,—preposterous assumption!! You must, then, renounce, my friends, even in name that link of the Christian Church Catholic, and retain your proper and primitive one of Protestant. I invite you, however, to examine with me whether you possess in a greater and in a more perfect degree, than your great rival, other sure and distinctive marks of the Church of Christ, such as Unity, Apostolicity, Visibility &c.

* "Though the word Catholic means universal, and our Church is not universal, yet it is no less the Catholic Church. I know it is called Protestant likewise, that is protesting against every branch, and even the whole stock of the Catholic Church. I own I don't like the term Protestant, and have been long trying to wash the stain away, but I cannot, and therefore I have come to the conclusion that it is sometimes the one, and sometimes the other, and always both together. Yes, your majesty, I am bound as a successor of the Apostles to tell your Majesty, that our Church is both Catholic and Protestant. I hope the Holy Spirit is with me while I thus speak, and with you while you thus hear, that I may not give, and you take offence." Dr. Hook, of Leeds, in his sermon before Queen Victoria.

MADRAS.

THE MADRAS AUXILIARY CATHOLIC INSTITUTE OF GREAT BRITAIN.

We have great pleasure in publishing for general information the annexed report of the Proceedings of the second annual general Meeting of this Auxiliary, held in the Catholic Cathedral Pay School Rooms on Wednesday, January 10th, at 7 o'clock p. m. The Report of the Committee for the past year is, we think, very satisfactory. If the number of Members and Associates be small, it must be remembered that the Madras Auxiliary is but 14 months in existence. We have every hope that the Catholics of this Vicariate will afford their prompt and cordial support to so meritorious an Institution, and co-operate zealously for the attainment of the important objects for which it was established, and which are simply the following:

1st. The exposure of the falsehood of the calumnious charges made against the Catholic Religion.

2nd. The defence of the real doctrines of our holy Faith.

3rd. The circulation of all useful knowledge upon the above mentioned subjects.

4thly. The protection of Catholics in the enjoyments of their religious principles and practices, by the removal of every obstacle which may occur to prevent Catholic soldiers and sailors, their wives and children, and the inmates of Hospitals and Prisons from possessing the full and unfettered freedom of their worship; the vindication of the rights of all classes of Catholics, and particularly those of the poor, to every privilege to which they are legally entitled; and the redress of every grievance to which Catholics, as such, may be subjected.

It is the duty of each Auxiliary to apply itself to remedy the evils of which Catholics have such reason to complain, not only as being injurious to the cause of Religion in general, but inasmuch also as they impede its progress in each particular locality. From this it follows that whilst the Madras Auxiliary, as a branch of a great and fruitful tree, co-operates with the Parent Society in promoting the general good, it behoves it also and in a special manner, to labour with zeal and assiduity for the defence of Catholicity in this Vicariate. Here we have abundance of work, calumnies without end to repel, the ignorant and the misguided to instruct and undeceive, the poor and oppressed to protect and defend. The generous and timely supplies of Tracts sent us by the General Committee, and for which we are happy to find the Meeting has expressed its grateful acknowledgments, will help us in part; for the rest we must mainly look to ourselves. Of this the last year's Committee were fully sensible, when they turned their thoughts to the deplorable condition of their poorer Brethren; and the Meeting bore ample testimony to the truth of our assertion by the public expression of their satisfaction at the little already done, and their earnest recommendation that the important subject should be promptly attended to. It now only remains for the new Committee to do their duty.

These observations on the Report having necessarily involved an allusion to some of the principal Resolutions passed at the Meeting, we have little to say directly concerning them. In moving the adoption of the Report, the Very Rev. Dr. MacAuliffe said a few words in reference chiefly to the 5th paragraph. He animadverted with just severity on the conduct of the miscalled "Friend in Need Society," towards which he declared THAT NO CATHOLIC COULD NOW CONSCIENTIOUSLY GIVE A SINGLE PICE. We have reason to know that the reports abroad concerning this Society, the truth of which has since been established by documentary evidence, first drew the attention of last year's Committee to the condition of their oppressed brethren, this remark was therefore quite in place, as an argument in favour of the adoption of that portion of the Report. At the conclusion of his discourse, the Rev. Gentleman remarked, that, had the Society in question acted as it ought, our worthy Bishop and his clergy would have readily and generously supported it, and that the Laity would doubtless have followed the example with promptitude and perseverance, and without detriment to our other Institutions. But the Society has denied us justice. It therefore becomes matter for consideration what we ought to do with that money. Whatever we intended to give as our subscription or donation, has become, in a manner, the patrimony of the poor. In fixing on what should be our mite, we put our hands to the plough; we should not now look back, because of the injustice of those whom we destined to be the distributors of our charity, particularly when that injustice renders our aims more necessary. At present we cannot give our mite to the Friend in Need Society. Shall we then pocket it? Or shall we not rather continue to collect donations and subscriptions, deposit the money with the Treasurer of the Auxiliary, and leave the Committee to dispense relief to deserving and oppressed objects. How far this suggestion may be yet acted upon, we are not prepared to say, it may be well for the Committee to direct their attention to it.

The Rev. G. Mitchell, in moving the fourth resolution, made also a few observations on the same all-important subject. The Meeting was likewise addressed by Mr. Panaken who dwelt on the necessity of supporting the Institute more extensively, and on the benefits arising from the well-regulated circulation of Catholic Tracts. We regret time does not permit us to enter more at length into these subjects.

Proceedings of the Second Annual General Meeting of the Members and Associates of the Madras Auxiliary Catholic Institute of Great Britain, held at the Catholic Cathedral, Pay School Rooms, on Wednesday the 10th Jan'y. 1844.

The Right Rev. Dr. FENNELLY, President,

In the Chair.

The Secretary having read the Report of the Proceedings of the Committee for the past year, the following resolutions were unanimously passed:

Moved by the Very Rev. Dr. MacAuliffe and seconded by Mr. C. G. Mitchell.

1st. That the Report now read be adopted.

Moved by Mr. A. G. Mitchell and seconded by Mr. A. G. Mitchell.

2nd. That in order to render this Auxiliary fully efficient in all its departments and to enable it to attain the objects for which it was established, a larger amount of subscriptions than yet obtained will be necessary, this Meeting therefore earnestly appeals to their Catholic Brethren throughout the Vicariate for their co-operation and support, so as to enable those to whom the management of the affairs of this Auxiliary is entrusted to perform their duties unfettered by pecuniary restraints.

Moved by Mr. McLaughlin and seconded by Mr. Conroy.

3rd. That this Meeting has heard with great pleasure of the receipt from London of supplies of Catholic Tracts, the circulation of which in this country cannot but prove highly beneficial to Religion, and begs to offer their respectful acknowledgments to the Parent Society for the promptitude with which they have endeavoured to meet the wants of this Auxiliary.

Moved by the Rev. G. Mitchell and seconded by Mr. S. Fanaken.

4th. That this Meeting observes with satisfaction the attention paid by the Committee to the sufferings of their poor Catholic Brethren, and earnestly recommends the immediate adoption of such measures as in their wisdom the Committee hereinafter to be appointed may determine on for their relief.

Moved by Mr. W. Paten and seconded by Mr. R. Brown.

5th. That the thanks of this meeting are due and are hereby given to the Committee for the past year, and that the following Members be requested to form the Committee for managing the affairs of the Institute for the present year, viz.

Captain A. Chisholm,	Mr. C. DeRozario,
Count J. Sherriman,	" J. DeRozario,

" W. Oliver,	" S. Appasawmy
" H. A. Moraes,	" P. C. Valernaden
" C. La Fleur,	" Amatha Appasawmy

Moodelliar.

Moved by Mr. J. W. Cox and seconded by Mr. H. A. Moraes.

6th. That the thanks of this Meeting be also given to Mr. G. R. Mayers for his services as Secretary and Treasurer during the past year, and that he be requested to continue to officiate as such for the current year.

Moved by Mr. J. Temasfield and seconded by Mr. C. D'Rozario.

7th. That the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly do leave the chair and that the Very Rev. Dr. take the same.

Moved by Mr. A. Cammiade and seconded by Mr. T. Rencontre.

8th. That the best thanks of this Meeting be given to the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly for his Lordship's dignified and able conduct in the chair.

REPORT.

The Committee of the Madras Auxiliary Catholic Institute of Great Britain, in presenting their Report to the second annual general Meeting of its Members and Associates, consider that there is great reason for congratulation on the steady progress made during the past year. The number of Members at present amounts to 196 (of whom 80 belong to H. M.'s 57th Regt.) and that of Associates to 118. This does not include the Members and associates at the Military stations of St. Thos. Mount and Bellary, as the Lists which accompanied the remittances from those places were not sufficiently explicit on that head; we believe them to amount to between 40 and 50.

Your Committee report with satisfaction that the receipts of the year just expired amount to Rupees 383 1 10 which, together with Rs. 220. 10 11, the balance in the Treasurer's hands at the last Annual Meeting, makes in all Rs. 603 14 9—Of this sum Rs. 521 15 9 (or £50) were transmitted to the Parent Society in two remittances of £25 each, the former, sent home in January last, was acknowledged by Mr. Secretary Smith in a letter dated London 31st March, the latter, forwarded in October, has, we trust, been already duly received. This sum, together with Rs. 34 11 3 the amount of charges for Postage, Peon's hire and other incidental expences, forms a total of Rupees 556 11 0 disbursed during the past year, leaving a balance of Rupees 47 3 9 in your Treasurer's hands on the 31st December 1843.

Your Committee have great pleasure in announcing the receipt of two cases of Catholic Institute Tracts: of the first supply the greater part have been already distributed; the second supply is but just landed, and will be in course of delivery immediately. We beg to add that we have also authorised the sale of a few numbers at exceedingly moderate prices.

In the fulfilment of the important trust confided to them, your Committee directed their attention to the extension of the Institute by the formation of Branch Committees at the Military Stations and in other localities. The answers received to your Secretary's circular on this subject are calculated to inspire a hope that at no very distant period this all-important object will be attained. The Catholic Chaplains have promised to use their best endeavours for the establishment of a well organized plan of cooperation with us.

The serious attention of your Committee has been also directed to the present state of the Catholic Poor, with a view to the adoption of such measures as may tend to preserve the integrity of Catholic faith among them. It is but too true that their state is most deplorable, exposed as they are to the innumerable temptations which bigotry with all its terrors and proselytism with all its allurements throw in their way. As Catholics we must do something in behalf of our brethren, remembering that the danger which presents itself to them to-day may prove our own ruin to-morrow. As a Public Body it is our duty to guard, according to our means, every Catholic from insult and oppression on account of his faith. We have entered on the consideration of this important subject with a full sense of the difficulties which stand in our way, but yet with a firm confidence in the sanctity of our cause and the co-operation of our Brethren.

In conclusion your Committee beg to express an earnest hope, that through the exertions of this Auxiliary, Catholicity may yet more and more advance throughout this Vicariate; that the zeal and energy of the Catholic Community may be concentrated as one Body; that the Unity which distinguishes our Creed may also mark our exertions in the attainment and maintenance of our Religious Rights; and that, as branches of a common stock, we may know no object, but the good of Religion and the protection of liberty of conscience.

By order of the Committee,
G. R. MAYERS,
Secretary and Treasurer.

Madras, 10th Jan'y. 1844.

BOMBAY.

It will give pleasure to many Friends of freedom and of advanced civilization to learn the following acts of liberality and generosity on the part of the highest British Authorities in Bombay, and in Scinde, and India.

An application was some time ago made by Sir C. Napier for Chaplains to the Army in Scinde. Sir George Arthur in reply stated that he supposed that Chaplains of the Roman Catholic as well as other religions were required for the consolation of the Soldiers. The reply of Sir Charles J. Napier being in the affirmative; the orders of the Hon'ble the Governor have been issued to have Catholic Clergymen sent for to Europe to afford spiritual aid to the sick soldiers of that Faith during their residence on the banks of the Indus. This is a measure, which has been taken with the full concurrence of Lord Ellenborough, and will be looked upon by the soldiers, especially the Irishmen, as a proof of the sincere wishes of the Government to meet their most urgent wants. The presence of Clergymen of every persuasion in such a place as Scinde is calculated to produce the best effects on the Soldiers, Christian Camp followers &c. for many men brave as lions on the field of battle are unnerved by long sickness and require the consolations of the Clergyman as much as the aid of the Medical Attendant.

The regulation of this matter reflects great credit on the Authorities; and as the merit of having originated it belongs exclusively to His Excellency the Governor, we give it publicity as a proof of his refined ideas of general improvement.

The appointment of a Head R. C. Chaplain to the Bombay Army, in the person of the R. R. Doctor Whelan is also a measure due to the present Governor of Bombay. The nomination of this British Prelate to that position is regarded by the Native Christians as an evident proof of the desire of the Government to make such arrangements amongst Roman-Catholic Christians of Bombay, as will introduce union and peace.

It is not requisite to mention that there are thousands among the Inhabitants of this island, who long for that event.—Gentleman's Gazette, Feb. 8.

On Tuesday evening the Hon'ble the Governor gave a large Dinner party at Parell in honor of the Archbishop of Goa. His Grace was attended there by the Canons of his Cathedral and by Sir Roger de Faria, and by the Chief Physician of the Goa Establishment, Doctor Francisco Maria Torres &c. The R. R. Doctor Whelan was also one of the guests.

The Archbishop on the occasion, expressed personally his great obligations to the Honorable the Governor, and to the various authorities of Salsette for the kindness invariably exhibited towards him during his late visitation to the Churches of that island. To Mr. Jackson, the Collector of Continental Customs at Tannah, the Archbishop declared himself very much indebted for various acts of the most courteous attention.

The Archbishop who returned on Tuesday from Salsette, is making preparations for proceeding on Sunday next to Caranah to visit the Roman Catholic Church at that place.—Gentleman's Gazette.

In the first three centuries of the Church, the Christians enjoyed but short intervals of peace, and were frequently under the necessity of hiding themselves in caves, and subterraneous places, called catacombs, to celebrate, with some degree of safety, their holy mysteries. But when peace was restored to the Church, in the beginning of the fourth century, convents of women were founded all over the extent of the Roman empire, where the Christian faith was established. St. Athanasius relates, in the life of St. Anthony, that this holy man placed his sister in a house of virgins; and that a long time after, he paid her a visit, when she was very old, and superior or mistress of many virgins. St. Pachomius seeing his sister desirous to embrace a religious state, built for her a nunnery on the other side of the Nile, which was soon filled with holy virgins. There were also pious women, who either lived with their relations or in communities, observed continency, and followed some particular rules and religious customs, without taking any irrevocable engagement, and who, consequently, could return to the world whenever they pleased; as we have seen in our days the daughters of St. Vincent of Paula, and many other societies and congregations of pious women, in France, Flanders, Italy, and other Catholic countries.

After such authorities as these, who shall assert that perpetual chastity is an impracticable virtue; and that it is absurd and immoral to attempt it?

The poverty of which nuns make profession does not consist in actual want of the necessaries of life, but in a voluntary privation of its superfluities. They give up their right of disposing of what they bring with them on their entering the convent; but it is to be deposited in the hands of their superior, to be joined to the common stock, and employed for the general use and advantage of the community, there being no distinction of the members who compose it, whether they were rich or poor at the time of their admission: so that the nun who had a large fortune, has not a greater allowance, enjoys no greater comforts, than her companion who had no portion at all; everything is distributed according to the actual wants of the religious, and not according to their former situation in the world. In short, their poverty is an exact imitation of that poverty, or rather community of goods, practised by the first Christians, at Jerusalem; who, though very numerous, as it is related in the Acts of the Apostles, "Had but one heart and one soul; neither did any one say that ought of the things which he possessed was his own, but all things were common to all; neither was any one among them that wanted; for as many as were owners of lands or houses, sold them and brought the price of the things which they sold and laid it down before the feet of the apostles, and distribution was made to every man according as he had need."—(iv. 32, 34, 35.)

These institutes never were a burden to the state which protected them. Possessing but little, they were always content with little. Rich by their sobriety and abstemiousness, joined to their labour, which Divine Providence constantly blessed, they astonished the world by their abundant charities; Almighty God renewing, as it were, the miracle of the multiplied loaves, in order to satisfy their tender solicitude, and eagerness to relieve the poor, the widows and the orphans. The writer of these reflections was an eye-witness of it. He lived for several years in the country, near the habitation of a community of these exiled nuns. They were far from being rich, as was obvious from the state of the house which they occupied, and its scanty furniture. Nevertheless, with their little income and the produce of their garden and four or five cows, they found the means never to refuse any of the numberless poor who came to the convent to beg some assistance. They received them all with unwearied patience, heard with sympathy their long tales of woe, shed tears of compassion on their distress and misery; addressed them with soothing and consolatory words, which revived their drooping spirits, and with a simplicity which greatly enhanced their merit, and shared cheerfully with them the homely fare of the community. Thus exemplifying, in the whole tenor of their conduct, this advice of the wise man: "Bow down cheerfully thy ear to the poor, and pay what thou owest, and answer him peaceable words with mildness."

Our hospitals and asylums are supported with a liberality and munificence, perhaps not equalled in any country. The buildings are spacious and airy; the accommodations for the sick wisely ordained, the food wholesome and abundant; the remedies of the best quality: the physicians and surgeons of eminent skill; the directors men of merit, and servants of an unimpeachable character. But tender solicitude, ingenious inventions to give ease and relief to the sick, visible sympathy with their sufferings, unremitting attention to watch over all the accidental changes of their disease, to save them unnecessary pain, and procure them the least momentary comfort, religious zeal to alleviate by all possible means the agonies of death, and by seasonable and affectionate exhortations prepare their souls to appear before the Sovereign Judge: all these little helps, both spiritual and corporal, which religion alone suggests to the feelings, and compassionate alone can give her courage to persevere with unwearied patience and alacrity: all this is wanting in our charitable establishments, and the largest subscriptions, the conveniences of the buildings, and the highest salaries given to servants will never be able to supply the deficiency. A Protestant author, speaking of hospitals in Catholic countries, says, "Whatever objection might be made to the Catholic religion, certain it is, that on this head, it has at all times had a great and beneficial influence. The arguments of philanthropists would perhaps have never effected that which religious sentiments have done for suffering humanity."—Bath Chronicle, December 13th, 1808.

Let us consider the motives and inducements which have led such numbers into the monastic state. What must be their delights who from a pious inclination embrace it! No sooner has a young woman, with such a determination, stepped out of the world, than it seems to her that she breathes in a purer atmosphere; delivered from the yoke under which she groaned, she no longer walks, but runs in the way of the commandments of God: her heart burns with devotion, swells with hope, and triumphs in the consciousness of being for ever united to Him, who has chosen her among a thousand, and whom she loves above all things. Under an habitual sense of the divine presence, she keeps up a perpetual cheerfulness of temper, and enjoys at every moment the satisfaction of thinking herself in company with her dearest and best of friends. The time never lies heavy upon her; it is impossible for her to be alone; her thoughts are the most busied and delightfully occupied at such hours, when those of other people are the most inactive. Solitude is the hallowed ground which religion has chosen in every age for her own: there falls the tear of contrition,—there rises towards heaven the sigh of the penitent and grateful heart,—there melts the soul with all the tenderness of piety, and pours itself forth with all its fears, its desires, its apprehensions, and its hopes, before the great supporter of its existence, and the amiable Saviour who has loved it the first, redeemed it, and destined for it an endless felicity, in the full possession of himself. "Hope," says the author of the Spectator, "Hope in the recluse makes his austerities comfortable, while the luxurious man gains nothing but uneasiness from his enjoyments. He who resigns the world has no temptation to envy, hatred, malice, anger, but is in constant possession of a serene mind; he who follows the pleasures of it, which are in their very nature disappointing, is in constant search of care, solitude, remorse, and confusion."—Spectator, vol. iv. p. 123. However, it was not by laying before the eyes of the pious novice the rich fruits of the land of promise, and representing to her its hills and dales flowing with milk and honey, that she was persuaded to enter it without fear. Of all the mortifications, austerities, and self-denials of a conventual life, she was informed without reserve, and she was obliged to practise them all, in order to assure herself and the community, that her desire to be a nun did not proceed from a momentary fit of devotion, but was the result of a solid and tried vocation. In some communities a trial of two years, of eighteen months in others, and in no one of less than one whole year, is required of the persons who present themselves to enter into a religious life; and the rule is so strict in that regard, that a few hours wanting to complete the year of the noviciate are sufficient to render the vows null and invalid. During this trial of a whole year, there is certainly full time for the overflowing of fervour and devotion to abate,—for the first impression of grief to be worn off,—for the heated imagination to cool, and reason to speak the sober language of prudence and discretion. During a whole year, the duties which at a distance might not have been duly considered,—the yoke which might have appeared sweet, and the burden light, are then appreciated and felt, such as they are in reality, and not merely by speculative reflections, but by daily practice. The inclinations and secret propensities of the postulant are rigorously scrutinized, both by her superiors and by her own companions, and her dispositions continually put to the test. All the mortifications, self-denials, austerities, corporal or spiritual, which are either of obligation or counsel, she must practise during a whole year, in order to know whether her health and courage are equal to them; her rule and constitutions are repeatedly read to her; she receives from her ecclesiastical and local superiors the most impressive admonitions of the indispensable necessity of sounding her heart in the silence of the passions, and of considering at the foot of the altar the high importance and irrevocability of her intended sacrifice. Before the six months of her noviciate are elapsed, the postulant is obliged herself to ask the community as a favour, to be admitted to the habit, and before it can be granted her, the superior is bound by the rule, to assemble and consult the chief members of the community. Every one is at full liberty to speak her mind for or against the postulant: nay it is an obligation of conscience in them to do it with impartiality and the most disinterested motives; however, for fear of their opinion being influenced by that of their superior, they give it by secret votes. If the novice be admitted, the whole community is assembled, the petition is laid before them, suitable prayers are addressed to the Holy Ghost, to implore his light and assistance in the decision which is to take place, and her admission or dismissal is decided by the majority of the secret votes of all the nuns who compose the convent. Towards the end of the year the same measures and precautions are resorted to, before her profession. Therefore, is it not evident that her admission has absolutely depended on her perseverance in asking it as a singular favour: and on the judgment of the majority of the nuns that she was deserving and well qualified to become a member of their society? However, this is not all. Before the final engagement is contracted, the bishop of the diocese comes himself; or sends a venerable priest to represent him. The novice is taken out of the enclosure, and introduced to the bishop in the out parlour, to be examined by him privately, on the motives of her vocation; and after being admonished to speak freely her mind, and declare her real sentiments, as in the presence of the Almighty, the questions and answers are put down in writing by the bishop's secretary; and signed by both, and by the novice herself. O'CONNELL AS A COUNSELLOR.

O'Connell was born in the wilds of Kerry, in 1775. His father was (for those days) a wealthy Catholic; his family, though making great pretensions to antiquity, had never been eminent in Irish history. Young Daniel was sent to St. Omer, to obtain a University education; it was not, as might be supposed, a place likely to expand the mind, or fill it with inspiring ideas, but some good professors were there, and pupils of no despicable attainments in classical learning had often left its walls. At that time the French revolution had fixed the attention of all mankind. It had not then reached its full height, but it had shown its hatred to priestcraft, and its aversion to religious sentiment. Young O'Connell was an ardent Catholic. He was not seduced by the revolution of France, which he regarded as a blasphemous eruption in the face of God. He left France a little after the cruel and needless execution of Louis XVI. He crossed the Channel on his return homeward in company with a young Corkman, who was a zealous propagandist of levelling principles, and who enthusiastically dilated on the glories of French freedom. O'Connell had, from the first, little sympathy with his fellow-traveller, who was so violent in the cause of the rights of man, but he did not feel thoroughly disgusted until his companion (who had many noble, gallant, and amiable traits of character), taking a bloody handkerchief from his pocket, exultingly boasted that he had dipped it in the blood of the French King. In five years afterwards the young enthusiast was himself executed for his principles. He was John, the youngest of the unfortunate brothers, Sheares.

O'Connell was called to the bar in 1798. He made his first entrée into public life on the question of the union being discussed. O'Connell zealously opposed the union and publicly declared that he preferred an Irish Parliament, and the chance of emancipation to an English Legislature with the certainty of religious liberty. This declaration, when taken into account with his subsequent career, is certainly very remarkable. His maiden speech is still preserved, but beyond that declaration there is no particular objects for notice in its matter.

His success at the bar was very rapid. He soon became the rising young Catholic lawyer. His practice at first lay in defending prisoners, and in a subsequent period of his life he was admitted to be the best criminal lawyer at the bar. At that time a Catholic Irishman had only one road for ambition, by the bar; and an eminent "counselor" was looked up to with the greatest respect. The superiority of his forensic powers so soon became manifest, that he took up a leading position in the profession, and as soon as he acquired some legal distinction he plunged into Catholic agitation.

It must be admitted that when O'Connell first joined the Catholic Committee the affairs of the Catholics were in a very bad state. For the first few years after he entered public life he did not obtain much power except amongst the lower classes. His language was violent, and he quarrelled with the Whig leaders, and laboured to make the venerable Grattan as unpopular as possible; for which however, he was severely taken to task in a letter called "Faction Unmasked," a political pamphlet, written with great power, of which the authorship is still unavowed. In 1816, or thereabouts, he had reached the eminence of being looked on as the most powerful man in the Catholic body, a station that he reached as much by his forensic powers at the bar, and his brilliant professional success, as by his political talents, or the popularity of his character. He went the Munster circuit, which, in those days, was thronged by men of great professional ability. But O'Connell ranked first amongst the first. His qualities as a professional man, have perhaps, never been sufficiently noticed.

Caution in conducting a case was his most prominent characteristic. He affected to be careless, but a more wary advocate never stood in a court of justice. Perhaps no great advocate ever had the same relish for the legal profession. O'Connell hunted down a cause with the gusto of a Kerry foxhunter in pursuit of Reynard. He keenly enjoyed baffling the Crown counsel, and bullying the witnesses against some trembling culprit in the dock. In those times counsel for prisoners were not allowed to address the jury, but O'Connell had a great art of putting illegal questions to a witness, and, in arguing for their legality, made "aside" short interjectional speeches to the jury.

"You see, my lud, the reason why I put the question was; because, if the witness were to answer in the affirmative, it would then be a manifest impossibility that my client would have been present at the murder, whereas, on the other hand, if the answer be in the negative, then the credibility of the whole statement of the Crown counsel would be impugned by that very answer: so then, my lud, the jury would be obliged," &c. He would then tease the judge by putting his questions in three or four different forms, and overwhelm the Crown counsel with derisive exposure of their legal ignorance. "Good God! my lud, did any one ever hear a Crown lawyer propound such monstrous law?" He acted the part of an indignant lawyer to perfection; caught up his brief-bag in a seeming fury, and dashed it against the witness-table—frowned—muttered fearfully to himself—sat down in a rage, with a horrid scowl on his face; bounced up again, in a fit of boiling passion, and solemnly protested in the face of Heaven against such injustice—threw his brief away—swaggered out of the Court-house—then swaggered back again, and wound up by browbeating and abusing half a dozen more witnesses, and, without any real grounds whatever, finally succeeded in making half the jury refuse to bring in a verdict of "Guilty."

In civil cases he was equally successful. In will causes, disputed estates, and questions originating in family quarrels, he was unrivalled for his tact, presence of mind, and, above all, for his understanding the details of business. He was the best man of business that ever appeared at the Irish bar, and was rather vain of his skill in arithmetical calculations. He had great knowledge of character, and directed the motives of a plaintiff or defendant with inimitable skill. His combination of worldly knowledge and professional information—his aptness and ingenuity—his ex-haustless supply of humour—his torrents of caustic ridicule—his zeal for his client, and untiring physical energies rendered him altogether matchless at the Irish bar.

Perhaps his greatest quality in a court of justice was his oblivion of himself. When addressing a jury he forgot every thing around him, and thought only of bringing off his client victorious. No lust for oratorical display ever tempted him to make a speech dangerous to the party by whom he was retained. Sooner than have made such a speech as Brougham delivered in the case of Ambrose Williams, O'Connell would have thrown up his brief. He was par excellence the safest advocate ever entrusted with a case. For the union of great general powers he stands without a rival in the history of the legal profession. Curran and Erskine were finer orators, but they were shallower lawyers; Plunket had a more powerful understanding, and was superior to all contemporary advocates in sustained reasoning powers, but he had little of O'Connell's versatility. If Sir Thomas Wilde had pathos and humour he would be a sort of English O'Connell. Redoubtable as was Garrow at cross-examination, he was inferior to the great Irish advocate in the art of putting a prepared witness off his guard. Besides, Garrow had a set plan for approaching a witness, and seldom made those wonderful guesses at character by which O'Connell gained many a verdict.

The circuit took him from Dublin twice a-year, and he almost invariably got a public dinner at the assize town. Besides, there was a public meeting to petition for emancipation and pass resolutions. At these reunions he always was the most applauded speaker, though it must be readily acknowledged that the palm of superior eloquence was vigorously contended for by other popular declaimers. No quality stood him in more use than his unruffled good spirits, and his perennial fountain of Irish humour, that never failed to delight an audience of his countrymen, who are always thirsty for fun. His jocund smile and insinuating manners—his coaxing ways—his jovial appearance, with his manly, athletic person, enabled him to win his ways to all hearts. He made everybody almost his friend, and by his great professional eminence extorted respect from those who doubted his integrity—disliked his frequent employment of tribunitian artifices, and his disgusting proneness to scurrility.

When George the Fourth visited Ireland O'Connell blarneyed the monarch in the most fulsome manner, and disgusted all those who were not carried away by the excessive folly of the people, who with delirious joy shouted for one who had never done a single thing to deserve the admiration of any country. They who believe in the "vox populi, vox Dei," would certainly find it difficult to defend the delirium of frantic joy into which Ireland fell at a King visiting its shores. —Ireland and its Rulers.—Britannia, Nov. 23

DRESS OF THE POPE—HIS COURT—HIS AUTHORITY.

(From Baron Gamba's Visit to Rome.)

In the interior of his palace the pope wears a soutane of white cloth, and a rochet of fine linen; a mozetta of red velvet, lined with ermine, and a large cap of the same material and colour. The cross is embroidered in gold, on the middle of the upper part of the shoe. He always wears the same dress except during Advent, Lent, and on fast days, when he puts on a soutane of white serge. From the Saturday of Holy Week to the following Saturday he wears a mozetta and cap of white damask. When he goes out he wears a stole.

The household of the pope has the magnificence which becomes his rank as a sovereign prince. His dignity as head of the church is indicated by the cardinals, prelates, and other officers which form his court, some of whom always accompany him in public. The cardinals are his counsellors; the regular ambassadors are called Nuncios, and the governors of provinces and extraordinary ambassadors are styled "Legates." The councils, in which questions regarding the church or the state are discussed, are called "Congregationes." The tribunal, della Rota, is that in which the most important civil causes are decided without appeal; and the Dataria, that whence bulls are issued. The term "Pope" was formerly common to all bishops, but is now confined to the successors of St. Peter; it is of Greek origin, and signifies "father." The tiara, which the pope wears in his coronation ceremony, resembles, somewhat, the head dress of the Chaldeans, which was round, rising in a conical form, and encircled with a crown when worn by monarchs. Boniface VIII. added a second crown, to show the union of the spiritual and temporal powers; and, in 1334, Benedict XI. added a third crown, to indicate the paternal power which should be united with those before named. This triple crown is, in reality, a crown of thorns, for this elevated station demands a reserve and self-abnegation, which its dignity scarcely compensates for. The pope enjoys no public amusement; he eats always alone, and his table is served in the most simple manner. The morning is entirely spent in the divine service and the administration of public affairs; and a visit to a church, or to an hospital, constitutes his only recreation. In a word, the practices of devotion, and cares of government, fill up all the hours of the pontiff's life. Are there many men who would submit to such a life, even at the recompense of the throne?

The custom of kissing the cross, embroidered on the pope's shoe, is a consequence of his elevation above all other powers. The Emperor Constantine kissed the foot of St. Sylvester; the Emperor Justin I. that of Pope John. Justinian exhibited to Pope Constantine, and Charles V. to Clement VIII. the same mark of their subjection to him as head of the church. This homage is rendered to Jesus Christ in the person of his vicar; and this ceremony is observed by all kings and their ambassadors.

The cardinals are the most distinguished members of the Roman court; they form the ordinary council of the pope, and are the depositories and ministers of authority. It belongs to them to elect the pope, who must be one of their own body; a privilege that gives them a preponderance over all that is not cardinal.

The word cardinal, in its original and natural sense, expresses the idea of "first," "principal," or "most considerable." It is derived from the Latin word cardo, which signifies hinge, because it appears that all things of the same nature depend, and as it were turn on the principal points. It is not, then, without reason that the priests, who compose the council of the sovereign pontiff, have been always called cardinals. In the Vatican is preserved a constitution of pope John, which says, that, as the pope represents Moses, so the cardinals represent the seventy ancients, who, under the supreme power of the Hebrew legislator, took cognizance, and decided the differences of the people.

The cardinals were not, however, always superior to the bishops; but, at the end of the eleventh century, the election of the pope having been confined to them, they easily acquired pre-eminence above bishops, archbishops, and patriarchs.

As the cardinals alone can elect the pope, so the pope is the only one that can create cardinals.

In the college of cardinals are seventy members—six cardinal bishops, fifty cardinal priests, and fourteen cardinal deacons. The cardinals wear a red soutane, except in certain penitential seasons of the year, when they are clad in violet. Innocent IV., at the Council of Lyons, 1265, gave them the red hat, as a sign that they should be ready to shed their blood for the service of God and the defence of the church. The most important stations in the Roman court are filled by cardinals, the others are occupied by prelates.

The cardinal Camerlingo is so called, because he has the administration of the goods of the camera apostolica: it is he who is charged with the care of the finances.—This is the most eminent dignity of the Roman court. The treasurer-general is subordinate to, but entirely independent of him. The cardinal secretary of state is at the head of the administration, and renders to the pope an account of all affairs, whether ecclesiastical or civil. The cardinal of the Dataria presides over the nomination to benefices. He is so called, because, formerly, his principal duty was to put the dute to the provisions for benefices. He is charged with the matrimonial dispensations, and with all that regards the annates, or first fruits. The cardinal vicar exercises in Rome the episcopal functions—i.e., he administers confirmation, and confers orders. The consistory is an assembly of the cardinals, held in the presence of the pope. It is twofold; the extraordinary consistory, in which important questions are discussed, and to which only a few of the cardinals are summoned; and the ordinary one, held every two months, to deliberate on the favours or graces solicited from the holy see. The Congregation of the Index has for its object the censure of books, which contain dangerous principles. It is composed of many cardinals, and several consulting divines, among whom is always the theologian, called the master of the sacred palace, who is the censor of the press. The index is the catalogue of the books censured by the Congregation. The first edition of it was published in 1559, under Paul IV. That published a few years since must be considerably increased, as, in the last century, an impious and audacious sect arose, which dignified its errors with the name of philosophy, and affected to possess universal knowledge.

STATE ENDOWMENT FOR THE IRISH CATHOLIC CLERGY.

If the bombardier in charge of the monster mortar at the siege of the citadel of Antwerp had suddenly wheeled round his piece and discharged a shell into the middle of his own camp, the consternation could not have been greater than that which was produced the other day by the discharge of a volley from the Times newspaper, double-shotted with leading articles, one in favour of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and the other in support of a State endowment for the Catholic clergy in Ireland. Whatever may be thought of the Times in other respects, it cannot be denied, that by the singular fact and ability with which it has for many years preceded and predicted the changes of public opinion, it has come to be universally considered as a sort of huge gilded weathercock, placed aloft on a conspicuous steeple, by whose indications he who runs may read the set and direction of the political atmosphere; or say, rather, like one of those Dutch barometers, where a fair or foul weather figure pops in or out of a little red house, according as the sensitive mercury in the tube shrinks or expands under the presentiment of approaching change.

Assuming this as a well-recognised fact, what can we think of the sudden and surprising change which took place on Saturday last? What tornado or atmospheric convulsion in the political world does it predict? Has the howling monsoon of pseudo-Protestant bigotry blown itself out? Have the stagnant mists of monopoly been scattered by the clear searching north wind of reason?

Certainly, some great silent change in public opinion has taken place within the last two years, which is, in all probability, on the eve of speaking itself out in important political measures. Two years ago, the weathercock of which we spoke pointed due "No Popery," and the figure visible at the door of the barometer-house was a distorted caricature of a Roman Catholic priest, with the motto over his head "surpliced ruffian." The chief engine relied upon by the political Conservatives for getting up the steam against Lord Melbourne's Government before the late general election was the imputation against the Whigs of betraying the cause of Protestantism, by not opposing a sufficiently stern resistance to the demands of the Irish Catholics. The appointment of Mr. Stiel and Mr. Wise to the office of Privy Councillors was arraigned as a high crime and misdemeanour against Protestant ascendancy, and the M'Nelles, Sullivans, and Bradshaws rolled the drum-ecclesiastic, and thundered at political dinners to call the true to arms against a semi-Popish, semi-and latitudinarian Ministry.

Must the sincere bigots, if there were any among them, think now of their political alliance? The very measure—a mere approach to which in the Whig appropriation clause was enough to make each particular hair on their head stand erect with holy horror—is now proposed by the leading political organs of the Tory party as a panacea for the ills of Ireland, and the overflowing zeal of the Exeter-hall fanatics against the Romish beast, and the national sin of tampering with idol-worship, is dismissed with a contemptuous sneer as ridiculous and out of date.

Such is the course of events when a party take their stand on hollow cant and insincere prejudice against the demands of justice and reason. Fifteen years ago, when Catholic emancipation was granted, why was not the endowment of the Catholic clergy made a part of the measure? To tell the honest truth, because the ministry of the day were afraid of the cant-interest in England. No reasonable unprejudiced politician doubted then, any more than he does now, that it was in every respect most important for the success of the experiment of Catholic emancipation that the Catholic clergy of Ireland should be paid by the State, nor did he feel less convinced then than he does now, that the religious prejudice which opposed itself to such a step was alike opposed to the dictates of common sense and reason, and the true principles of Christian charity. But the leaders of the Tory party felt that this religious prejudice was strong, and that it constituted a most important and available element of the political strength of Toryism; and therefore they shrank from grappling with it.

And now what is the result? Is there any sensible Conservative who will dispute that it was a great and most fatal error, not merely for the true interests of the country, but more especially for the Conservative interests of England and Ireland not to have made a provision for the Catholic clergy part of the measure of Catholic emancipation? We believe there is not one who in the frank and unreserved intercourse of private society, could deny this for a single moment. But now the mischief is done, and according to all appearance, it is too late to repair it. The Catholic clergy of Ireland have been forced into the position of popular agitators, tribunes of the people; and they cannot and will not sell themselves to the Government. At bottom, the idea of political Toryism is, not to endow the Catholic clergy in Ireland because it is a measure right in itself—because it is a measure dictated by the true spirit of Christian charity, and calculated to remove a world of heart-burnings and jealousies between brethren of a common faith and nation—but because the Catholic priest is a formidable political adversary whom it is desirable to buy over and neutralise by bribery. A measure brought forward on these low worldly grounds of Machiavellian morality will fail, as it ought to fail. The Catholic clergy of Ireland, as a body, will, to a certainty, spurn the provision which is offered to them avowedly and notoriously as a bribe. They might, and probably would, accept it if offered in a proper part of a general measure of justice and equity to Ireland proceeding from a Government which had the confidence and respect of the Irish nation. But to suppose that the priest will desert his flock, and sell the cause in which, whether right or wrong, he has embarked, and to which he is attached by all the strongest ties of human nature, for a mess of pottage to the hated Tory Government, is an idea which to every one who has the slightest acquaintance with the actual situation of Ireland, must appear utterly preposterous.—Atlas, Nov. 25.

CAN I CONTINUE A MEMBER OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?

Calcutta: Printed by J. A. Gibbons, Asiatic Press.

Under this Title, a small pamphlet, containing 12 pages, has lately made its appearance amongst us, and as it will probably create no slight sensation among the various classes of religionists in Calcutta, we avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity to give our readers an idea of its character and contents. The writer of the pamphlet appears to be a conscientious person, of liberal education, who looks for consistency in religion, and reprobates one of the chief reformed Churches on purely Protestant principles.

It would appear, that he was born in the Church of England, that he continued to be a faithful Son of the State Church up to the date of his undated pamphlet, and that he is now resolved, for the several reasons assigned by him, to enter into the communion of some one of the innumerable dissenting Congregations to which the interminable labours of Protestant reformation has given birth.

The character of the pamphlet is rather historical or descriptive than argumentative; the style is perspicuous and easy; and although the arrangement of the subject matter does not appear to us to be the most judicious, no one will read one page without reading the twelve.

The reasons which the writer assigns for breaking communion with the Establishment, are these, as well as we can understand from the pamphlet—

1st. The present state of the morality of the Church of England and its contradictory doctrines.

2nd. The fundamental doctrinal errors, contradictions, and scandalous services contained in the Book of Common Prayer.

3rd. The connexion between Church and State, and the utter improbability of any reformation, doctrinal or practical, in the Anglican Church as by Law Established.

The writer's 1st and 3rd reasons which we, not he, have numbered, are so nearly allied, that we shall consider them as one, though they occupy the first and last pages of the pamphlet, and this one, we trust, the annexed extracts will sufficiently explain.

"What is the present state of the Church of England? I desire to bear no false witness; I desire to speak the truth, and to speak it in love. And what, then, must I reply to the serious question, 'What is the present state of the Church of England?' There are pluralists, non-residents, sinecurists, and preachers of false doctrine in her; and these are not restrained. There are some clergymen with three, some with four, some with more livings; and the system of pluralities, though it has, of late years, been modified by act of Parliament, has not been abolished. Far from it. The present generation of pluralists remains undisturbed; and provision has been made for mitigating only, not for preventing the evils of pluralities, for the future. Still less has the non-residence of ministers in their livings been prevented. These old evils, therefore, still remain, as matters of just complaint, and of deep sorrow.

"Other evils of great magnitude exist in all their ancient force. This is especially the case with Church Patronage. More than a thousand livings are in the gift of the Crown; that is, of the Prime Minister and Lord Chancellor for the time being; either of whom may be, as the Duke of Grafton was, when he was Prime Minister, an avowed Socinian, or like Lord Thurlow, a man of known dissoluteness of character. Among whom are the Crown livings dispensed? Chiefly among those who have political influence, or have rendered political services.

"A large number of livings are in the gift of the Bishops. Who appoints the Bishops? The Crown; and let the fact of such men as Lords Bristol, Bridgewater, Cornwallis, Decies, Rokeby, Normanton, having been Bishops, and the long list of sons of peers who, in the last century and a half, have been made Bishops, speak to the truth, that a very common road to Bishopricks, is political influence. And here I must observe, that there has been little or no improvement of late years, in the system of appointing Bishops. Within the last few years, brothers of Lord Stanley of Alderly, Cottenham, Riversdale, Ponsonby, and Ranfurley, and of Earl Grey, the brother of Mr. Evelyn Denson (then the influential member for Nottinghamshire), and the son-in-law of Lord Congleton, and the cousin of the Earl of Courtown (very recently) have been made Bishops. Besides these, there are now on the bench, uncles of the Marquis of Waterford, and Lord Ellenborough, cousins of the Marquis of Waterford, Lord Vernon, and the Duke of Atholl, and brothers of the Marquis of Ely, Lord Bagot, the Earl of Beverley, and other persons of interest. Of the evangelical Bishops, the late excellent Bishop Ryder owed his preferment to the exertions of his brother Lord Harrowby, who, as Mr. Wilberforce narrates, threatened to resign, if he were not appointed; and the Bishop of Winchester was appointed through the interest of the Marquis of Conyngham's family, in which he was tutor. Of the Bishops who have died since 1800, I may add that the names, Manners Sutton, Jenkinson, Barrington, Legge, Yorke, Courtenay, Pelham, Brownlow North, and Lord George Murray, will be recognized as the names of near relatives of noble families; and among the Irish Bishops who have died in the same time, many similar names might be found. Of the present Bishops the Bishop of Ely was Lord Spencer's tutor; the Archbishop of Canterbury was tutor in the Marquis of Abercorn's family; the Archbishop of Dublin was Lord Stanley's tutor; and of late Bishops, the late Archbishop of Cashel was Sir Robert Peel's tutor; very many other facts of this kind might be here mentioned, but enough has been said.

"Then among whom is the patronage of the Bishops dispensed? I answer, principally among their own relations and personal friends. To them, have favourable leases of Church lands, and wealthy livings, and Prebendal stalls, been granted, to a degree that has often-times excited shame.

"Turn, then, to private patrons. A very great proportion of all the livings in England, is in the hands of private persons. And is it not a fact undeniable, that these livings are generally treated as family provisions? and is it not also true, that they are very commonly sold to the highest bidders, at public auctions? It may be averred without hesitation, that few, very few, of the nobility and landed gentry, fail to provide for one or more of their sons in the Church, as a matter of course, and with little or no reference to the question of fitness for such employment.

"It may be said, however, that none can be presented to livings, except men who have previously been regularly examined and ordained. That is true. But what security is hereby afforded?

"Look even to the Diocese of Calcutta, with an evangelical Bishop, and there see and hear what I have seen and heard, a man ordained by an evangelical Bishop Wilson, (after a sermon in which the Bishop lauded Bishop's College, and boasted of the fact that all the candidates for ordination then before him, were its students:) and then see the minister of whose ordination I am now speaking, just two weeks after, rise up and preach plainly those doctrines, respecting baptism and apostolical succession, which the Bishop is known to condemn. I say, then, what security is there? None or next to none in ordinations and examinations. And if so, is there any in the character of the patrons? Alas! a patron of livings in England, may be a jockey nobleman; or a gambling gentleman; an infidel; a socinian; a concealed Papist; or a mere idle jester. There is nothing to prevent these men being patrons.

"It is simple truth, that there are now men in the Church of England, who are scarcely short of actual Papists; and yet these men preach and teach without restraint. Their organ, the British Critic declares, that its object is to 'unprotestantize' the Church of England. Not only do these men hold Dr. Pusey's views on baptismal regeneration, apostolical succession, reserve in communicating religious knowledge, and the like; but further, they publish and use Popish books of devotion; they slander and revile the great reformers; they speak highly of prayers for the dead and intercession of saints; they hold a doctrine scarcely distinguishable from transubstantiation; they use and they recommend the use of crucifixes, and of many popish mortifications; they 'sigh for union with Rome.' Such men may be, such have been, such men constantly now are, presented to livings, and where is the necessary discipline to prevent their induction?

"I answer to the question, what is the present state of the Church of England? by saying, that in fact, ministers like these, and ministers who are not far removed from these, (like Mr. Newman); ministers also, who are fox-hunters; card-players; fashionable dancers; novel writers (like Mr. Maxwell, Mr. Gleig, Mr. Paget, &c.) ARE NOW ACCREDITED BY CHURCH AND STATE, AS INSTRUCTORS OF THE PEOPLE. Oh! what is the value of a human soul; and what must be the danger of of such men's teaching? If the blind lead the blind, they must both fall into the ditch. Our Lord says to his people "take heed what ye hear;" but in how many hundreds of parishes of England there is nothing at all to hear, from the Church of England, but error! "The leaders of this people cause them to err, and they that are led of them are destroyed." (Isaiah ix. 16.) ***

The present evils of the Church of England are indeed immense; Missionaries are sent out by her who preach "another gospel," and disturb, as among the Nestorians, and here in India, other Protestant Missionaries; there is a spirit of pride, and sectarian exclusiveness in her Bishops and Clergy; too much wealth; too much pomp; no effectual, no sufficient discipline; the extremes of differences among her Clergy, from the highest Calvinism to the next thing to Popery; and in her Cathedrals and College services, the form of religion without the power, regulated attendances of hired singers, and compulsory attendances of disorderly students."

"Is the present alliance between the Church and

State of England benefical? The results of it are, that if a Bishop wish to suspend a clergyman for preaching false doctrine, he must proceed with his case in an 'Ecclesiastical Court,' before a lay judge; that Bishops and Deans and others are appointed by political Ministers of the Crown, that the Church has acquired great wealth,—so much so, that the clergy have been unduly exalted and much worldliness has been introduced; and that the Church cannot now meet in convocation, to make any effort to procure necessary reforms, without the consent of the Crown; and above all, that all spiritual independence is reduced to a mere empty name. Look too, at the working of the establishment. With too many of the clergy the sacred ministry becomes a 'profession'—a trade; with too many of the laity, religion is made a fashion and a form. Men in general, are led to think that their loyalty should lead them to the Parish Church; they accordingly go to hear the State's accredited ministry. But in how many hundreds of parishes do they hear 'another gospel?' Then, if they are warned to take heed what they hear and to go where the gospel really is preached, their old prejudices and habits are used by Satan, as means of deluding them, and they are led to fancy that it is a duty and a merit to attend still their Parish Church, even though mere cold morality or even false doctrine, be preached in it. * * *

"I recur to my practical question, can I continue a member of the Church of England? No, I cannot, unless there be a reasonable prospect of speedy and satisfactory reforms. Where is this prospect? Is it at all likely that the Prayer Book will be altered in one word? Certainly not. It is not even likely that a convocation will be summoned to alter it, or for any other purpose. What other reform then, can we expect. A practical one? Alas! how long have we waited for this! Had I been considering this question twenty years ago, when Evangelical religion was making way in the Church of England, I think that I should then have said; 'True there are many things to be remedied, but gradual advances are being made, there is every encouragement to hope; this is the time to stay in, and expect better things to come.' But now, all is changed. Evangelical ministers are in many cases becoming Puseyites:—I could name some who once ran well: (how is the fine gold become dim!)—and a new class is growing in the Church, which teaches and publishes Semipopery. Things that are wrong are not reformed, and exposed; but, in many cases are excused or 'hushed up.' Too many of the clergy who see the evils of the present state of things, fear to move in England, for political reasons; this or that administration, or this or that political party would be helped or injured. And amidst all that is distressing, what is there to encourage us? I see no body of clergymen preparing to act with faithfulness in concert; I cannot discover any body of laymen to whom I can join myself to make one bold honest protest, and one sincere earnest effort, to procure the reform which we require. No, I see a tendency to worse things, not to better. I see the young students for the ministry tainted at the tests of learning; and no one, no one at all, raised up as a leader, to proclaim the evils and to procure the reforms to which I have alluded. Well, then, I cannot continue a member of this Church. I have been her zealous son; I have done what I could for her; but now, I must choose between remaining in her, a party to evils which I cannot hope to see amended and—separating myself altogether! I must leave her communion. I must not deceive myself, and wait to move with a large body; God looks to each man for personal faithfulness and sincerity. If I wait on man I may be deceived after all: and I may be misled by pride, and by a wish to be a party to an effective movement, instead of simply discharging the obligation of my own conscience. But then, if I separate, old friends will look cold; misrepresentations or misapprehensions respecting motives will be circulated; and the Cross must be taken up and borne. Yes! but the Lord is the same. Him I must follow, whithersoever He goeth; His will I must faithfully obey. My course, therefore, and my duty, are made clear."

This is the language of religious earnestness;—what a pity the writer has not told us which of the Sects of Dissenters he is about to join, while he makes it a matter of conscientious duty to publish to the world his good reasons for renouncing the faith and communion of the Church of England. Was he ashamed of the name of the chosen Sect? But then he speaks of his readiness to carry the cross and to follow the Lord whithersoever he goeth, and if he be so ready, why conceal from us the way of the Lord in which he proposes to walk?

Let us suppose, for a moment, that the writer of the pamphlet proposes to cast his lot with the Baptists, is it not as incumbent on him to prove the truth of his second creed, as the falsehood and danger of his first belief? So it appears to us; but this is not the way with Protestants, and the pamphleteer is a real Prottestant. We recommend him to reflect seriously on this matter, and to read Gilbert's excellent Treatise on Baptism before he subscribes to a pernicious doctrinal system which would allow the infantile portion of the human race to die redeemed in vain.

In our next, we propose to return to the subject, and give a sample of the writer's strictures on the Book of Common Prayer

CONVERSIONS OF MR. JAMES JACKSON AND FAMILY, AND OF A LADY.

To His GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP,
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal

MR LORD ARCHBISHOP,

Being informed a long time ago that Mr. James Jackson, a judicial officer with in this zillah, a gentleman of unimpeachable character for integrity, was anxious to know which is the true religion of our blessed Saviour Jesus Christ, I though it necessary to leave my parish on the 13th of this month, accompanied by two of my laymen, Messrs. John Benjamin Lewis and David DeSilva, and the Clerk of my Church, and a faithful Christian servant, in the same boat that Mr. Loughnan lent me to go to Calcutta. On reaching the place of Mr. Jackson's residence, Muddunpoora, on the morning of the 14th, I received a welcome reception from him, and my first care was to instruct him in the articles of our faith, and explain to him the nature of the blessed sacraments, and remove from his mind the few doubts he still entertained on some points. I derived infinite pleasure indeed in hearing him declare that he was perfectly satisfied of the truth of our Holy Religion, and that he was anxious with his family to be numbered with the flock of Christ. I did not hesitate to hear his and his son's confession, and according to the ritual baptized them; three other children and their mother sub-conditione. In the evening we had the pleasure of partaking a dinner together, all as Catholics and as members of the true Church. This morning I offered the sacrifice of the Mass, and administered the blessed sacrament to Mr. Jackson and his eldest son. I made a gift of "The Catholic Piety," twelve Rozarios, two Holy Crosses, and a picture of our blessed Virgin, and one of St. Rosa da Lima. This has been, my Lord, the result by the grace of God of my journey.

Had I come home earlier I would have received two other Protestants within our Church, but unfortunately they proceeded to Calcutta only on Sunday last, and how anxious they were to be converted, and how convinced they were of the truth of our holy religion, your Lordship will be aware from the perusal of the enclosed extracts from the original letters.

There are some Christians here who are desirous of confessing and performing their duties, but, from an ignorance of their prayers, I have not been able to comply with their wishes. Mr. Jackson has told me that if your Grace would be pleased to send some Bengallee Catechisms in Roman characters, he would derive a pleasure in instructing them.

I have been informed of there being within this district some Catholics of advanced age, who have for a length of period not received any spiritual comfort—for forty years almost. I intend to pay them a visit, and for this purpose will leave this station to-day. The name of the village is Modeepoor; from thence I intend to go to another part of the district, as I have understood that several heathens are desirous of being converted. I then will proceed to Noahkhallee, where you had appointed me before.

My visit to the Mugs I defer to another opportunity. Mr. Jackson has promised to make the necessary enquiries of them, and who are desirous to embrace our faith, and to accompany me likewise, which will prove of much benefit, as he is proficient in the language of these people.

Mr. Jackson takes the liberty of addressing your Grace separately on the matter of his conversion. Your Grace may make any use of his and my letter, and of the enclosed extract, as your Grace may deem fit.

I have the honor to be

Your Lordship's

Obedient and humble servt.

THOMAS ZUBIBURN,
Chaplain.

P. S. From a perusal of the enclosed extract, your Grace will perceive the anxiety of the writer to be converted. Her determination of seeking means at Calcutta has induced her friend to solicit from me a letter of introduction, that in her conversion she may meet with no difficulties. I have addressed the Rev. Dr. Kennedy to do all he can to aid the poor lady in her conversion.

I will send some boys to Serampore very soon.

Extract of a letter from a Protestant Lady to Mr. John B. Lewis, of Seebpore.

Dated the 19th January, 1844.

"I have now to tender you my best thanks for your extreme kindness in sending for my perusal, 'The Whole Duty of Man.' It has, indeed, relieved my mind of a load of anxiety, and made me sensible of my past follies. On my perusing some parts of it, particularly those marked by you, in order to banish all doubts from my mind, I attentively perused those works you allude to in your letter, and have had ample proofs of the Catholic being the only true religion. It is, therefore, to be hoped you will not be surprised when I say, that it is my firm resolution of being converted into that faith, and I pray to my God, that, by the help of his grace, I may be numbered with the flock of his fold. I would feel happy if my Papa and family conjointly participate with me in the intended conversion. I shall esteem it a particular favor if you will obligingly speak to the priest respecting my intentions, and inform me of the result of your communication to him at your earliest convenience, as I wish no time to be lost, delays being dangerous. Were I to ask him for a prayer and other religious books, do you think he would comply with my request? Kindly let me know particulars when you write."

*Extract of another letter from the same Lady.
Dated, the 24th February, 1844.*

"I have just this moment been favored with your letter, and am thankful for the good advice it conveys. I have also to return you my best of thanks for the prayer-book and "Catholic Expositor,"—they shall now be my constant companions.

"I indeed regret much that I have not had an opportunity of seeing Father Zubiburn, (for so I shall now style all Catholic ministers). I was very anxious to have some conversation with him on religion, and on my arrival at Calcutta I must not lose a moment in obtaining means of being converted. I have drank too deep of the cup of bitterness to attend to any pleasures, or mingle with the gay, and dissipated. The only source of happiness now left me is to seek religion, which I am sure will tend to soothe the recent sorrows of my heart."

True extracts,

THOMAS ZUBIBURN.

MY LORD.—As superior of the Church in which it has pleased Providence to admit me, I consider it an imperative duty to solicit your Grace's prayers, that I may be strengthened in the faith I have embraced.

Born and educated as a Protestant, my aversion to the Catholic Religion was indeed great from infancy, and so prejudiced was I in my opinion of Catholics that whenever I heard the name of a Catholic, I regretted, and prayed for his conversion to the Protestant faith. Surrounded and caressed by Protestant relatives, friends, and connections, and taught to believe from infancy the truth of their faith, I did not harbour a doubt nor attempt to contradict any of them till lately, when my eldest son Charles remarked to me in a conversation of the disunity existing amongst the Protestants. He had found among some old papers a few pages of a Catholic Catechism, and the truth of several matters in it attracted both his and my attention and that of my family. To remove the doubts we still entertained of other points, I had recourse to a dear friend, Mr. J. B. Lewis, of Seeshpoor, whose elucidation of the truth of the Catholic doctrines and the falsity of those professed by my separated brethren, though clear and sufficient to have removed the doubts from the minds of all the members of my family, I still entertained a fear to forsake the religion of my forefathers. The dreadful anxiety of mind I endured in not being able to be resolved upon one point, obliged me to have recourse to incessant prayers, and daily I revered several doctrines of the Catholic Church which I had derided and scorned at first. By the perusal of some valuable tracts lent to me by Mr. Lewis and Mr. R. J. Loughnan, the doubts of my mind and the fear I entertained of embracing the true faith were greatly removed—and the exposition of matters of Faith, Confession, Eucharist, Purgatory, Divorce, and Ecclesiastical Discipline, by the esteemed Rev. Thomas Zubiburn, were so clear and concise, and so impressive, that I considered dangerous to my salvation to continue in my infidelity any longer, and, disregarding human respect and the feelings of those dearest to me, I solicited my reception and that of my family into the bosom of the Catholic Church, and was baptised and admitted, by the grace of God, by the instrumentality of the Rev. Father, since which the peace of mind we have enjoyed is indeed inexpressible.

I humbly implore your Grace's prayers that we may be strengthened in our faith, and that my conversion may serve as an example to rescue my other dear relatives and friends from the errors they yet profess.

I have honor to be,

Your Grace's most Obedt. and humble Servt.

J. JACKSON.

MADRAS MISSION.

We regret much, that through some mistake the publication of this very interesting letter was deferred till now.

On Board the Hindostan,

October 12th, 1843.

TO HIS GRACE THE MOST REV. DR.
CAREW,

Archbishop of Edessa, and V. A. B.

It has been long our most anxious desire to testify to your Grace the deep sense of veneration and gratitude with which our minds were impressed. Now that we have reached the shores of Madras, we cannot restrain the superabundant joy which fills our hearts. We return our most grateful thanks to your Grace for the benefits which you have conferred on us, now that it has fallen to our lot to enlighten those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, are we not indebted to your Grace for such a blessing? Who, by your kind and earnest entreaties, has solicited our superior to send some of our order to Madras, and thus afforded us an opportunity of walking in the footsteps of the Apostles? Though perhaps it is to be regretted that we are not able to realise your Grace's expectations, you have a right to expect to find in us all those qualities which become an Apostle. If such qualities are not wanting in my companions, as I hope they are not, at least I fear they are in a great measure wanting in me. But as we place all our confidence in God, who gives to all and reproaches none, I trust that I may be of some assistance to the Mission of Madras, in the discharge of offices and duties of minor importance, (whilst thus engaged) others who now serve on the Madras Mission may devote themselves more freely, to the exercise of more important and difficult ones. This reflection consoles me and my companions, and at the same time furnishes us all with a well grounded hope of finding in Dr. Fennelly, our Bishop, a superior and a Father, who will cherish, protect, and love us as his children, as we most steadfastly believed to have found in your Grace, if you still presided over the vicariate of Madras. We beseech your Grace, though separated from us, and transferred to the government of another vicariate, that you will still consider and look upon us as your children; this is our most unanimous resolution always to look up to your Grace as to a benefactor, protector, and father.

I remain, my most Dear Lord,

Your Grace's most humble & obdt. child,

VIZAGAPATAM MISSION.

We are happy to be able to announce the safe arrival of the Rev. Mr. Egan at Vizagapatam, where he has been appointed to do duty as the Catholic Chaplain of the station.

The Rev. Gentleman's ministry was blessed with many conversions to our holy faith both at Kamptee and Secunderabad, and we hope that he will not be less successful at Vizagapatam. The Native Christians at Secunderabad very justly and deeply lament his loss, and the following address to him from the Catholics of H. M. 4th Regt. will show how he was beloved and his departure regretted by them.

THE REV. D. EGAN, &c. &c. &c.
Secunderabad.

REV. SIR,—We, the Roman Catholics of H. M. 4th, "the King's own" Regiment, stationed at Secunderabad, beg most respectfully to present you with the sum of Hyderabad Rupees 257-3-9, and earnestly hope and trust you will be pleased to accept the same, as a small token of gratitude for the many signal benefits we in general have experienced from your untiring exertions in the discharge of your sacred office—combined with those of our beloved pastor, the Rev. D. Murphy, since your arrival at Secunderabad.

The Teetotalers of the regiment in particular beg further to congratulate you, and the Rev. D. Murphy on the wonderful change which has taken place amongst the Catholics of the Regiment, since its arrival at this station (men substituting religion for vice) and may God in his infinite mercy grant that your life may be prolonged successfully to co-operate with our zealous pastor, the Rev. Dr. Murphy; and hereafter that you may receive the just reward of your labours in the kingdom of everlasting bliss, which is the sincere prayer of your

SECUNDERABAD MISSION.

We understand, from letters just received from Secunderabad, that the Rev. C. Murphy arrived in good health at that station from St. Thomas's Mount on the 4th instant, and that the Rev. D. Egan, the zealous assistant chaplain, late of Secunderabad, set out the day following for Vizagapatam, to which mission he has been just appointed by the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly.

The Catholic Temperance Hall at Secunderabad, though 60 feet long, is not sufficiently spacious to contain one half the number of Teetotalers. They very hospitably entertained their brother Teetotalers of the 21st Fusiliers, a short time ago, as the latter were passing through that Station on their way to Kamptee. The Rev. D. Murphy, Catholic Chaplain of the Station, presided; the best order, good humour and cheerfulness universally prevailed on the occasion which was honored by the presence of two other clergymen, Rev. C. Murphy and Rev. D. Egan. The Teetotallers were never before so glad that they had taken the pledge of Total Abstinence. The Rev. D. Murphy lately received into the Church 6 converts from Protestantism and Heathenism, and 4 others are under instruction.

THE REV. P. GANNON.

The following is the answer of the Rev. P. Gannon, to the T. A. Members of H. M. 57th Regt.

Arcot, February 9, 1844.

MY VERY DEAR FRIENDS AND BRETHREN,

What gratitude I owe you, and how I ought to acknowledge it, I leave unmentioned, because I cannot, as I desire. Your unexpected letter, delivered to me the evening I left Madras, aroused many feelings and many affections within me, for I was then leaving my attached Mission, going amongst strangers, and I may say from my home; I called to mind, can I ever forget it? your unexpected, unnecessary, and too great anxiety on a former occasion, to leave me a mark of your kindness and esteem; profusely, indeed, have you done so, and your beautiful present shall be always my honor, as well as a memorial of you, my dear friends of H. M. 67th Regt. I thought with joy on the solicitude of many of you for your brother's welfare, and on the religious zeal with which you have co-operated, to have a wandering brother converted from an evil course; may the like zeal, and the like charity continually increase amongst you; as such is the will of God I am content to resign you to another who, assuredly, will be more worthy of you, by whom, with God's blessing, and your religious co-operation, may you abound in every good work.

Believe me ever,

Your faithfully attached servant,

PATRICK GANNON.

I forward this letter to my kind friend and fellow labourer the Rev. Mr. Mitchell, who will deliver it to you.—P. G.

LENT LECTURES.—On last Wednesday evening His Grace, the Archbishop, delivered the first of his Lent Lectures at the Cathedral to a full congregation, taking his text from St. John:—You adore that which you know not: we adore that which we know, for salvation is of the Jews.—Chap. 4. v. 22. His Grace will continue the Lectures every Wednesday evening during the present holy season.

At St. Thomas Church the Rev. Mr.

Havers, S. J., gave the first of a series of Lectures on last Tuesday evening, and the second on Thursday following. These Lectures will be continued every Tuesday and Thursday during Lent.

THE REV. R. SUMNER, S. J.

DIRECTOR OF SEAL'S COLLEGE, AND PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT ST. FRANCIS XAVIER'S.

The Catholics of Bengal will, we are sure, learn with feelings of much regret that extreme ill health has compelled the Rev. Mr. Sumner to take his passage on the Prince of Wales for England, which vessel left town on last Thursday morning.

In quitting a scene where he has been the means of effecting so much good to the cause of education and of religion, we are certain that the Rev. Father carries with him the affectionate regards of all those who have had the pleasure of his acquaintance or opportunity of appreciating his sterling worth. To them it will be nothing new when we say that Father Sumner was a truly pious, exemplary and zealous Missionary; a more disinterested man in worldly affairs or a more indefatigable priest the Bengal Mission could not wish for. He was always ready and willing, day or night, when called on, to visit the sick, and to administer consolation and spiritual comfort to the afflicted.

As a preacher Father Sumner was very popular. His eloquence and energetic delivery, aided by a powerful but well modulated voice, commanded the attention of his hearers. So prepared was he at all times that we have known him to preach three Sermons on the same day at different Churches, and frequently at a short notice. His powers of oratory are great. As a writer, especially on points of doctrinal controversy, he is terse, powerful and unanswerable.

It will perhaps be an act of supererogation to enumerate the good works which Father Sumner has left behind him, but we cannot restrain our feelings from placing before our readers a brief outline of his career since his arrival in this country. The Rev. Gentleman was one of those who came out with our first Vicar Apostolic, the Right Rev. Dr. St. Leger, in 1834. Immediately on his arrival he devoted himself to the study of the Bengalee language, and in less than six months from his coming amongst us, he preached his first Sermon in Bengalee, to the astonishment and admiration of the congregation at the Cathedral. He gave his strenuous aid to Father Chadwick on the establishment of St. Xavier's College, and on that Rev. Gentleman's leaving India the first time, the Rev. Father Sumner was appointed Rector of the College. Education was Father Sumner's chief object, and to impart knowledge was his great delight. Those who had the opportunity of observing the untiring zeal and labor which he evinced in the discharge of his arduous and almost unassisted duties as Rector, must necessarily attribute the success, which has since attended that noble institution, to his assiduous exertions. On the departure of the Rev. Mr. John St. Leger for Europe, Father Sumner was appointed his successor as Chaplain to the Soldiers at Dum Dum and Fort William. The amount of good that he has done among the soldiery is deeply inscribed on their hearts, for Father Sumner is always spoken of by them with respect, reverence and affection. At Dum Dum, Father Sumner established a Library, and induced the Subscribers to allow its free use to the congregation at large. He embellished St. Patrick's Chapel and raised and enlarged the Altar. He presented to it at his own cost, a very handsome Tabernacle, and, aided by contributions, he commissioned out from France, a beautiful large bronze Crucifix and a splendid set of Candlesticks for the Altar, besides a pair of bronze Chandeliers which now ornament the Chapel.

On Father Chadwick's resuming charge of the Rectorship of St. Xavier's on his return to Bengal, we find Father Sumner in 1842 at Dacca, at the bed-side of his dying friend, our ever-to-be-lamented Vicar General, Dr. Kelly, at whose request, we believe, His Grace the Vicar Apostolic, Dr. Carew, entrusted Father Sumner with the Mission at Hossienabad, where for nearly two years he labored among the Native Christians with unwearied zeal, and accomplished as much good as could be expected in a district long in the undisturbed possession of schismatics. Schism and discord were the greatest drawback to his endeavours,—in fact, they were like a canker in the very heart of the Mission, which unhappily drooped in spite of his watering.

On the opening of Seal's College in 1843, Father Sumner was summoned back from Hossienabad, and the Direction of that College was assigned to him, not only on account of his knowledge of the vernacular language, but for his very patient and happy method of instructing the youthful mind. Besides this office at Seal's College, Father Sumner held a very important post at St. Xavier's as Professor of Theology.

We are inclined to believe that Father Sumner has been a martyr to his zeal for the public. His incessant labor in the College, his unremitting attention to his clerical duties, hardly allowed time for sufficient repose either to his body or mind. Although blessed with a strong constitution, yet, the labor was evidently too much in a climate like this.

We may mention, by way of grateful acknowledgement, that since the commencement of our editorial career in 1839, Father Sumner rendered us, notwithstanding his other avocations, invaluable assistance. In fact, had it not been for his aid when we first started into existence, it is doubtful whether we could now boast of the continuance of this publication.

The suddenness of Father Sumner's departure, forced upon him by his medical attendant only three or four days before, admitted of no time for any demonstration of feeling on the part of his friends and admirers, some of whom however are raising a subscription to present him with a Gold Chalice, as a small token of respect and esteem for his apostolic labors.* It is some consolation to think, and this in a great measure tends to mitigate our present sorrow in parting with so excellent a pastor, that, with God's blessing, he intends to return to us so soon as his health is re-established. Although he is returning to his native land, and, welcomed as he will be by his relatives and friends after an absence of ten years, yet, we know his heart will remain fixed in Bengal—the country of his adoption.

We are confident Father Sumner carries with him the unfeigned good wishes of the entire Catholic Community, and that our readers will earnestly pray to Almighty God for the restoration of his health and for his speedy return to India.

Father Sumner is accompanied by Mr. E. Cantopher, a promising young East Indian, and a student of St. Xavier's, who is to enter Stonyhurst College and study for Priest's order.

We are indebted to the kindness of a lady, a convert, for the following extracts of letters which will be found interesting.

Extracts of a letter from Ensign —, a convert to Catholicity.

11th February, 1844.

I left Gwalior on the 28th December, the Army having been broken up some days before; we passed over the battle field on the 29th, and saw heaps of wretched blackened corpses, both shot and burnt, in the village of Maharajpore. I have heard that there were at least twelve hundred dead and unburied. Both the Governor General and the Commander-in-Chief are very much liked by the troops, they frequently visited all the hospitals in Camp, and sent quantities of fruit for the sick. We arrived here on the 4th, and right glad am I to be in cantonments again. I have had capital shooting during the last 5 days of the march—killing lots of partridges, rock pigeons, an antelope and hyena. My dear father Francis dined at our mess the night before last; he is such a holy father, I only wish you knew him. I feel so comfortable at being in a place where I can worship my God in his own sacred temple again; there is one chapel about two miles from our residence which I frequent, the other is further off on the other side of the city. * * *

I received a letter by the last mail from my eldest brother; I thought he had completely cut me. He says "he cannot help laughing at my credulity in being so easily gulled, and by a Catholic too: for (he adds) the Priests are well known all over the world to be the most artful, deceitful, designing creatures possible." So I once thought, but, thanks be to God, my eyes have been opened into admiration for everything relating to our holy faith. The more my religion is abused and contemned, and our clergy denounced and persecuted, the stronger and more confident becomes my faith—for it makes me look round to see where else I can find these words of our divine Redeemer verified; and which he left as an inheritance to his chosen people.

"And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake."

"But he that endureth to the end shall be saved."

Extracts from a letter of Captain —.

I heard from Chittagong a few days ago, from a brother officer, who mentioned that the good Padree was seriously thinking of paying us Papists a visit, and he hoped I would give the padree house-room, and be attentive to him—he little knows the love and respect we Catholics bear to our Clergy. * * * I most sincerely hope the worthy man will come and see us; we must rather strong—Dr. —, Mr. —, myself and two European Sergeants—there are other two officers as Catholics. I think you know the T. family in Edinburgh? The brother is a Protestant, poor fellow; he left — in a sad state of health. His poor sister, the nun, who is herself a convert, dotes on him, and as she has devoted herself to God, perhaps He will graciously hear her prayers, and bring him yet into the true fold. I beg you to present my kind and respectful regards to his Grace,

And believe me, &c.

Extracts from a letter of Lieut. —, a convert to our holy Faith.

1st February, 1844.

Your letter reached me just as I was on the point of embarking for this place, where I have been detached to command the troops of this district; in this part of the country everything is done by boats or ships, there are no roads except the streams, with which the whole country is intersected; I had a four days trip by sea to reach this place. It is indeed very beautiful, and from the mountains which close in a circle round our small station, you would think it a view in the Highlands of Scotland. I have at present no one to speak to, the only European gentleman attached to this place is now absent on some duty in the interior, and will not be back for a month. I wonder that no Roman Catholic Missionary has as yet been sent down here; he would, beyond all doubt, make many converts, for there is so great a similarity in the outward observance of the Roman Catholic and Buddhist priests that the conversions would be easy; the Buddhist priest takes vows of celibacy, he possesses no property of his own, and lives on charity; he cuts his hair quite close to the head, and wears a peculiar robe. The Buddhist priests live in monasteries and occupy their time in instructing youth; they do not allow any female to reside within their houses. They believe in one God, but have some obscure notions of a Trinity. In the whole I should think that a Catholic Missionary would succeed wonderfully if he came here. There is a Protestant Missionary here who travels now and then into the hills, and, I hear, has a community of friars, but he has a wife and family which is a startling point with the people of this place, and I think the fact of our priest not marrying would have great effect. I am at present living about eighteen or twenty miles from the sea, but by foot paths and through the hills it might be eight or nine miles. The appearance of the people is decidedly Chinese, the dress of the women in particular, only they do not bandage the feet; the men seem to be more like the Tartar race, they are generally short with wrinkled faces, very much bearing the resemblance of a monkey; they are very proud of long hair both men and women, and those who can afford it wear false hair. They are so totally different in their language, dress, and appearance, from what I have hitherto seen that I cannot help fancying myself in China. Owing to the damp climate, every house is raised upon posts; the poorest man will not sleep on the ground, as in India. When I next see Lomatto House and St. Thomas's Church, I suppose there will be great alterations in them, owing to the erection of the new buildings. The house for His Grace will be much more conveniently situated than before, for the house in Moorgyhuttah was so difficult to get at, that many could not find it out, and a single cart could block up the way. He will now have a more healthy residence, and in a more convenient part of the town. You have never I believe been up the country, if you had, you would have seen that the Hindoos are suffering their finest temples to go to ruin and never think of repairing them, while those they now build are of common and perishable materials; these things are evidences of a great change. I have seen a Bramin laugh at the idea of benefit being derived from a pilgrimage to an idol, and when it has come to that, we may reasonably hope for a change for the better, as it was necessary for them first to become satisfied of the inefficacy of their idols, before they could be at all likely to listen to a Christian practice. I must now conclude, hoping that Mr. — and yourself still continue in good health,

Believe me, yours very truly,

The following is a copy of a letter from his Eminence Cardinal Acton to the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe.

MY LORD,—The return of the Rev. Father Mullock affords me an opportunity of writing to your Lordship, and I gladly avail myself of it to offer my sincere congratulations upon your election to the Episcopal dignity, and your promotion to the Coadjutorship of Calcutta. I feel assured that the appointment will be hailed with delight by all of those who have so long admired your apostolic zeal, and your activity in the discharge of the duties of the Mission, and whilst the Catholics of Ireland rejoice at beholding another of their Ecclesiastics so highly honored by the Holy See, our brethren in India will be glad to know that the choice has fallen upon one so wholly and so affectionately devoted to their welfare. It was peculiarly pleasing to my feelings to hear the praises ascribed upon your merits by my venerable colleagues in the Sacred Congregation, and pray that in your consecration the Holy Spirit will bestow His choicest graces upon you, and will perfect, in the plenitude of the Priesthood, the virtues which have distinguished your earlier years. I commend myself to your prayers, and fervently hope that in the Sacred Mysteries you will make a memento of Your fellow labourer, and brother in Xt.

PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE IN BENGAL.

We announced, on a late occasion, that besides several individuals in Calcutta, about thirty of the Artillerymen at Dum Dum had taken the pledge of total abstinence; and we are now happy to add, that since that time, the very Rev. Dr. Kennedy administered the pledge to forty-seven others at that station, and to four others in Calcutta. We understand that many of the soldiers, who had been enrolled as Teetotalers by Father Matthew in Ireland, and who, when leaving home expected perhaps never to hear of the pledge, or of Teetotalism again, are overjoyed to find themselves once more in the midst of water-drinkers; and others who had forgotten their promise expressed a wish to renew it.

If the officers whose duty it is to attend to the wants and rations of the soldiers on march, would provide coffee or tea, for such as might choose it, instead of Arrack and other intoxicating drinks, there is no doubt but the cause of temperance would be greatly promoted in the Indian Army, and we think the advantages of such a very reasonable provision, are too obvious to be overlooked. We beg the attention of the influential Press of Calcutta to this subject.

Selections.

THE FAST OF LENT.

That fasting is profitable and advantageous, cannot be denied without contradicting the holy scriptures, which frequently mention it as practised by the patriarchs, prophets, and holy men, in the old law. It is also recommended in the gospel by the example of Christ himself, who, immediately after his baptism, retired into the desert, where he remained fasting forty days and forty nights, (Matt. iv.) and in his divine sermon on the mount, he gives us instructions in what manner we should fast. He further speaks in favour of fasting, when, in answer to a question, why his disciples did not fast as well as the Pharisees and the disciples of St. John the Baptist, he replied, because he, the bridegroom, was then with them; but that when he should be taken from them, then they should fast. (Matt. ix.)

If we look for particular instances of the advantages of fasting in scripture, we shall ing about Guy Fawkes's effigy. It is a Guy exhibited in church by the clergyman, in rivalry of the Guy exhibited by the schoolboys out of doors. Five years the schoolboys have the better of the clergyman; for parading their Guy through the streets, it is more seen than his Guy, which must keep within doors. But on the sixth year the clergyman has ample amends; for then, not only is his church crowded on the day his Guy is exhibited, but the little boys are not allowed to show theirs till the day after. The splendour of the rival Guis is in our day materially abated: the Police prevent the little boys from indulging in their former liberal allowance of squibs and crackers; and the apologetic tone of Fifth of November sermons shows that some power or another has put down the oratorical squibs and crackers with which they used to be stuffed.

It is true that the church exhibitions of Guy were dispensed with altogether. There are some so Puritanically-minded as to disapprove of Kings, Queens, and Lord Mayors going to church in state. They allege that such parade distracts the congregation—unduly divides the worshippers' attention between the Creator and the creature. This may be to consider too curiously. Yet no one, we suspect, could fail to be shocked were Punch to be carried in solemn procession to all our churches of a Sunday once in every six years. And nothing but old custom could reconcile us to a similar exhibition of his brother effigy. "A sermon preached before the Lord Mayor" may be endured, even though a little glorification of his Lordship be introduced; and the Ordinary of Newgate has the warrant of use and wont for preaching at living criminals before their execution: but "a sermon preached before Guy Fawkes" is rather too much.—Spectator, Nov. 14.

MISCELLANEA.

THE REV. MR. SIBTHORP.—It has been sufficiently amusing to read, within the last few weeks, the speculations of the public press, Romanist and Evangelical, on the presumed return of the Rev. Mr. Sibthorp to the Anglican communion. By the one he was lamented as a lost sheep, a relapsed heretic, who could never again be received as a privileged member of the Church; by the other, hailed as a repentant deserter, who, having been admitted to view the secret enormities, the hidden abominations of the enemy's camp, revlpt and disgusted with what he witnessed, had rushed back in sorrow and repentance to his ancient standard. And, to complete the triumph, a letter is read with great zest at a public meeting at Bath, by a well-known supporter of (so-called) Evangelical principles, and stated to have been received by him from the individual in question, wherein, with all the Pharisaic bigotry and spiritual conceit of Exeter Hall, he is made (O quantum mutatus!) furiously to denounce Rome as the great harlot, the mother of abominations, and her worship as idolatry. Although we must apologise to our readers for occupying so much of their time with what concerns a very eccentric and insignificant individual, yet we cannot refrain from informing them that the Rev. Mr. Sibthorp has returned to the Roman communion, that he is no longer a deserter, and that he is now undergoing a course of penitential discipline under the superintendence of Dr. Wiseman, preparatory to re-admission to its full privileges. True he has several times received the Eucharist at the hands of priests of the Anglican Church, but that it seems was because he was temporarily, and by way of punishment for certain irregularities, shut out from the Sacraments in his own, not because he ever intended again to profess obedience to his former spiritual mother. We fear the well-pleased orator and his excited auditors, who so loudly and charitably applauded the denunciation of their fellow-christians which was lately recited at Bath, must consider themselves in vulgar language as completely "hoaxed." We advise them, in future, neither to go and listen to, nor to believe, such "Church Pastorals."—The English Churchman.

FRANCE.

MONASTERY OF MOUNT CARMEL.—We have often, says the Univers of 25th Nov. called the attention of our readers to the mission which Brother Charles is discharging in favour of the church of the Hospital of Mount Carmel. Formerly France sent her generous children to battle for the deliverance of the holy places. Her name remains inseparably united in the hearts of the Eastern populations with their remembrance of the benefits and the glory of the faith. "The Frank" is in Asia always the Catholic par excellence, and even all Catholics are called Franks in that quarter of the world. Now, if we no longer shed our blood for our brethren, it cannot be said of us that we are deaf to the cries of their distress; and, until our sympathies may be allowed a more useful manifestation, we should at least send them the succour of our alms. The ancient Monastery of Mount Carmel, destroyed by the ferocious Abdallah Pasha, began in 1819 to rise again from its ruins. We need not recapitulate the heroic labours, the constancy, the indefatigable zeal, and the courage, beyond all question which Father Jean Baptiste has displayed in bringing to its present state the work to which he has devoted his life. Eleven times during seven years did this magnanimous mendicant quit the blessed mountain to hold out the hand for charity at Jerusalem, Damascus, Tripoli of Syria, Cyprus, Alexandria, Smyrna, Athens, Palermo, Malta, Tunis, Gibraltar, and even Morocco; France also has responded to his call. And now that age and sickness confine him to the convent which his own hands have restored, pressed by urgent necessities, he has anew deputed towards this hospitable land one of the most devoted and intelligent of his companions. This is Brother Charles, who is now in Paris, and who, in 1799, went and gathered up the remains of our countrymen then lying unburied in Egypt, and bore them himself to the foot of the temple of Mount Carmel, where they lie beneath the protection of the Cross. Last Sunday the Rev. Father Lacordaire was to preach in the Cathedral of Versailles a charity sermon, in aid of the fund for the reconstruction of this church and of the hospital, of which it forms part. The blessing was to be given by the Bishop of Versailles; the petitioners for the collection (Quêteuses) were the Baroness de St. Didier, the Countess of Gainville, and Madame Lenos. The eloquent Dominican could not exalt his voice for a work which more completely unites the two characters that he specially loves and cherishes—the Catholic character first—but also, and as a natural consequence, the national character as well.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

CAN I CONTINUE A MEMBER OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?

Calcutta: Printed by J. A. Gibbons, Asiatic Press.

In our last, we promised to return to the consideration of a late publication bearing this title, and to give a specimen of the writer's strictures on the book of Common Prayer. Before we proceed, however, to redeem our promise by lengthened quotations from the pamphlet, we beg leave to direct the writer's attention to one or two particulars on which it is his interest to reflect. The pamphleteer is quite offended at the form of absolution in the book of Common Prayer, "And by his authority committed unto me, I absolve thee from all thy sins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." These words, no doubt, are very absurdly employed by Protestant ministers, in the exercise of a spiritual power which they disclaim, but the sentence is quite scriptural if pronounced by a true minister of Christ. Christ has said (John, 20. 23.) to his own ministers, "Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them, and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained," and these words bestow all the power that is exercised by the preceding sentence of Absolution.

The writer continues—"To interpret these words (of the book of Common Prayer) as some men interpret them, is to do that which both betrays and encourages a dangerous habit of mind." How very true, and yet how inconsistent! If it betrays and encourages a dangerous habit of mind to interpret these words of the Prayer Book, in a sense quite opposed to their obvious, natural, and grammatical signification, as some Protestants do, surely the Baptists and others, including the writer of the pamphlet, betray and encourage this dangerous habit, with far greater risk to themselves and others, by offering similar violence to the words of Christ himself. "Whose sins you shall forgive they are forgiven them, and whose sins you shall retain they are retained." (John, 20. 23.) and again,—"Whatsoever you shall bind on earth, shall be bound also in heaven, and whatsoever you shall loose on earth, shall be loosed also in heaven." (Matt. 18. 18.)

We trust the writer will remember what he has said of this dangerous habit, the next time he reads the words of his Saviour at the last supper, and become a Catholic. At present he has many objections to our holy faith, but he has evidently read as yet but one side of the question. How grievously has he been imposed upon by those who told him that the illustrious Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambray, deserted our holy Church!

His knowledge of Scripture, we fear, is very superficial. We shall give one or two instances out of many. In p. 5 of the pamphlet, he falls foul of what he calls "vain repetitions," in the book of Common Prayer; and what will our readers suppose are these "vain repetitions"—oh! shockingly unscriptural! "The Lord's prayer is said five times, and, if the sacrament be administered, six times, at morning prayer." We hope the Baptists are in the habit of saying the Lord's prayer at least every day; and if so, are they not guilty of "vain repetitions?" If they do not pray daily for their daily bread, they do not deserve to eat it; and if they imagine it a "vain repetition" to say the Lord's prayer three times a day, they should be consistent and shun the "vain repetition" of eating three times daily. If the writer wishes to see scriptural authority for "vain repetitions," let him read Psalm 117, where he will find abundance of them.

The writer asks—"What power do we find given or assumed in Scripture to decree rites and ceremonies? and in answer he says—Let all things be done decently and in order—is the Apostle's simple injunction." But are the Baptists the exclusive judges of what is decent and orderly in the Church? These very rites and ceremonies may belong to the decency and order of which the Apostle speaks; at all events, the Church of Christ, is the proper judge. The Church is the pillar and the ground of truth, according to the same Apostle, and Christ himself hath said, (Matt. 18. 17.) "If he will not hear the Church, let him be to thee as the Heathen and the Publican."

It is now time to hear, at length, the writer's observations on the book of Common Prayer, which, we beg leave to submit, ought to induce those who will not resign that book for the cant of the Baptists and other Dissenters, to become Catholics.

"The Articles and Homilies, for instance, contain most scriptural truths respecting election and justification by faith alone. But are those truths preached in the Church? Look at the Puseyites; They not only preach against them, but can and do show you, that what they say on these points, has been said before, not merely by Archbishop Laud, and Thorndike, and such divines, but by Bishop Jeremy Taylor, Bishop Bull, Bishop Van Mildert and many many more. Look at the "great Church Societies." Are sound doctrines taught in the tracts of the Christian Knowledge Society? No, certainly not. Works like those of Bishop Mant and Mann, Bishop Thomas Wilson, Crossman's Catechism, the Whole Duty of Man, and Nelson's Fasts and Festivals, do not teach such doctrines; while they do either teach, or plainly take for granted, the doctrines of Apostolical Succession and Baptismal Regeneration. What is the use of having Articles and Homilies ever so sound, if they are not preached? What is the effect of teaching one thing in the prayer book, and another thing in the pulpit? "It is of little avail for one Article to tell us that the Bible contains all things necessary for salvation, if, immediately after, another Article tells us, (the 34th Article) that whosoever through his private judgment willingly, and purposely doth openly break the traditions and ceremonies of the Church, which are not repugnant to the word, of God, and be ordered and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly." This is just such a sentence as Puseyism wants. It is the introduction of sentences like this, that makes the Articles, what Mr. Newman boasts that they are "Articles of comprehension,"—intended to include among their subscribers, men of very different and even opposite opinions.

* "From the Articles, I might go into a consideration of the Canons of the Church and the Rubric. But respecting these I will only say, that it is very well known, that they cannot all be carried into practice, without public scandal. Many a vagary, peculiar, as it is thought, to Puseyism, is, in fact, well supported by Canons or Rubrics which the Church either will not, or cannot reform.

"But I turn from these things to some of the services. I have admitted the great beauty of some of the Church prayers. Generally they are taken from the Romish books of devotion, and the honor of them belongs not to the Church of England."

"Now, what says the Church of England on this important subject (of apostolic succession)? She speaks thus: when a man comes for ordination the Bishop says to him 'Receive the Holy Ghost, for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven, and whose sins thou dost retain they are retained.'" What does this imply, but the conveyance by and through episcopal hands, of some mysterious and some apostolical powers? The Church of England, however, speaks also by deeds. If a Roman Catholic priest join the Church of England, he is not re-ordained; his orders are recognized as good. But if a dissenting minister join the Church of England, his previous ordination is deemed invalid and totally null; he must be ordained, and admitted into the ministry!"

"In the words which I have quoted from the ordination service, it is evident that the doctrine of priestly absolution is involved. This is with equal distinctness discovered in the service for the Visitation of the Sick. When the sick man professes penitence, the Priest says to him "Our Lord Jesus Christ who hath left power to his Church to absolve all sinners who truly repent, and believe in Him, of his great mercy forgive thee, thine offences: And by his authority committed unto me, I absolve thee from all thy sins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." I know very well, that these expressions, as well as the expressions in the Baptismal service, to which I shall come presently, are explained away; but I must say, that the manner in which this is done, is not ingenuous, and is far from satisfactory. Indeed, little less ingenuity is used in these explanations, than was employed by Mr. Newman, on the other side, with some of the Articles. To interpret these and other words, as some men interpret them, is to do that which both betrays and encourages a dangerous habit of mind."

"I would here inquire, how the battle of Evangelical truth, against Puseyism, can be fought on the platform of the English Liturgy? Is it not very plain, that the Prayer Book has, at least, so much in it favorable to Puseyism, that the few Evangelical Bishops may be acting discreetly in not pressing their differences with Dr. Pusey to this issue, namely, whether there be not quite sufficient in the Liturgy, as well as in Canons of their Church, to justify the Puseyites in teaching their doctrines, as the doctrines of the Church? It is true, at least I think so, that there is very much in the Prayer Book that, either in express words, or by inference opposes Puseyism; but if there be much also in favor of it, what then? How can any one call on Dr. Pusey to retire from the Church, when he can show that as to many of his chief doctrines, the Prayer Book sanctions him; and as to these doctrines he has as much sanction from the Prayer Book, and from the writings of the English Church, as the Evangelical clergy have for some of their doctrines?

"I must proceed, however, to other points. In addition to the matters I have mentioned, some objectionable things remain to be noticed. The appointed fast days, and Holy days of the Church, the rules for observing forty days in Lent, and for observing certain days as Saints days, are rules based merely on traditional authority: and as being compulsory on the members of the Church, appear to me unscriptural.

"Some of the occasional services of the Church also, are very wrong. Sometimes by royal or other secular authority only, a new form of prayer is set forth; as for instance, there is a command issued, that a certain form of prayer be used for success in this or that war, it may be (as in China or Afghanistan) an unjust war. It is difficult to understand by what scriptural authority, the right to command the Church to pray in this or that manner, or for this or that thing, is justified."

"The service for the commemoration of 'the martyrdom of the blessed King Charles the First, to implore the mercy of God, that neither the guilt of that innocent blood, &c., may be visited upon us,'—this service, is a specimen of the evils that may result from recognizing this authority."

"Let me here premise, that I am far from desiring to justify the execution of King Charles the First; and that I can quite sympathize with those who admire the dignity and courage with which he met his death. But, is the language used in this service, appropriate to him? In his youth and his manhood he was the friend and companion of the dissolute and vicious Duke of Buckingham; he arranged a marriage with a Spanish princess, one of the conditions of which was, that their children should be brought up as Papists: when that treaty of marriage was broken he married another Roman Catholic; he published and enforced a book of Sports, which required all persons to desecrate the Lord's Day, and he ordered his commands on this subject to be read by the clergy in their parish churches; he endeavoured to rule without Parliaments; his Court was a nest of Popery; by means of the Star Chamber he persecuted the Puritans, in a most cruel manner—as in the cases of Prynne, Burton, Bastwick, and Leighton; by means of shameful oppressions he endeavoured to abolish the Presbyterian religion in Scotland, which he was pledged to uphold; one of his chief chosen advisers was Archbishop Laud; and more than once he broke his plighted faith with his Parliament and his people. And yet he is held up to admiration as a blessed martyr; his blood is called innocent; and we are told to pray that we may follow his example."

The book of Common Prayer, therefore, is condemned, but what kind of ritual the writer proposes to substitute for it, we are still left to guess. Protestant reformers are skilfully powerful in the work of destruction, but they have not succeeded better in building up than the proud Architects of Babel.

Perhaps the pamphleteer will tell us, that the Bible is to be henceforth his only ritual and book of Common Prayer; but the Bible is also the ritual of the Socinians, and are we therefore to infer that the writer has embraced Socinianism. If the book of Common Prayer be a dangerous standard of faith, because it favours Puseyism as well as Calvinism, surely all the reformed Churches united pronounce a heavier condemnation on the Bible itself, since it is by turns made to teach, clearly and expressly, Anglicanism, Presbyterianism, Quakerism, Socinianism and a thousand other absurdisms including Anabaptism.

"BAPTISM OF THE ANABAPTISTS, IN FOUR DIALOGUES, WITH A SEQUEL."

An excellent little tract bearing this title has just issued from the Press of Calcutta, and we recommend every Baptist in India, and every one else who may desire to see Anabaptism tested by the word of God, to procure a copy of it. The author of it is evidently a foreigner; his mode of expression is quaint, but terse; and the freshness in the flow of his ideas is so agreeable, that a good humoured Protestant reader cannot help wishing that four other dialogues with another sequel, may be added to the little tract under notice. His arguments we consider to be at once forcibly logical and quite scriptural. We have heard the Rev. Mr. Storck mentioned, more than once, as the author.

THE REV. MR. PEROZY AND THE CATHOLICS OF BELLARY.

Our readers will be edited by the following Address from the Catholics of Bellary to the Rev. Mr. Perozy, on the occasion of his departure for Goa, as well as by the Rev. Gentleman's reply, and the accompanying letters in reference to that event.

If the Rev. Mr. Perozy be a subject of Goa, of course, the Archbishop has an undoubted right to recall him to his native diocese, and we trust that the cheering anticipations, contained in the address and reply, of religious peace and union, will soon be realised. There is, however, a slight mistake, no doubt inadvertently put forth, in these documents, respecting the unhappy differences which have been, for some time, an affliction to the Church in India. It is quite evident that the question is not, whether the British, Goanese, or Portuguese Clergy, should rule the Catholic Church of India, but whether the Holy See is to be obeyed or not, in matters appertaining to ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

In the Island of Ceylon, the Catholic Clergy are the descendants of Portuguese from Goa, and, because they possess jurisdiction from the Holy See, there is no disagreement between them and the British Clergy.

The Archbishop of Sardis, Vicar Apostolic of Verapoly, is an Italian; the Right Rev. Dr. Bonnard, Vicar Apostolic of the Coromandel coast, is a Frenchman; and yet the Goanese Clergy have given the same opposition to these Bishops, in their respective Vicariates, as to any of the British Vicars Apostolic.

The question is, therefore, plainly not one of mere national antipathy, but whether the Sovereign Pontiff, as the successor of St. Peter, is to be obeyed as head of the Church on earth, in those things which all Catholics believe to belong to his office.

We are happy to be able to state, on authority, that the Right Rev. Dr. Gyronimo, Bishop elect of Macao, who sailed a few days ago from Calcutta for the scene of his future Missionary labours, evinced in his intercourse with the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, all the virtuous dispositions which could be desired to make his exalted ministry pleasing to God and a consolation to the Church.

To a patriotic anxiety for the rights and glory of the Crown of Portugal, his Lordship joins that firm and uncompromising determination to give to God what belongs to God, which might be expected from a sound Theologian and zealous Missionary.

We hope that what we have said of the virtues of the Bishop elect of Macao, is also true of the Archbishop of Goa; and in that case, the choicest blessings of God are in store for the Catholic Church of India. At all events, if obedience be not rendered to the Holy See and the Vicars Apostolic, its representatives in India; if peace and charity be not restored and the common good of religion not promoted by common and united exertions, we are confident, that it will not be the fault of the Rev. Mr. Perozy, whose past example will be the condemnation of many others, circumstanced as he was.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—I shall feel much obliged if you will have the kindness to give insertion in your excellent periodical to the following account of an Address presented to the Rev. Fulgentius Perozy by the people of Bellary, together with the Rev. Gentleman's Reply, and also a most complimentary Letter to him from his Lordship the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly.

I have the honor to be,

Sir, your most obedt. servt.

A CATHOLIC.

Bellary, Feb. 6th 1844.

On Friday the 2d of February intelligence was received in Bellary that the Rev. Mr. Perozy had been recalled from this Mission by his Grace the Most Rev. the Archbishop of Goa, and had obtained permission from the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly to leave, together with a most complimentary letter eulogizing his zealous labours. This intelligence was communicated only to a few of the most intimate friends of the Rev. Gentleman. He himself had been engaged for some time on a Missionary Tour among the Christian villages in the vicinity of Bellary. On Saturday the Address was prepared, and read for the people on Sunday morning, by the Rev. P. Doyle, and it was intimated at the same time that it would be open for signature in one of his rooms from half past 5 to half past 6 that evening. Nothing could equal the enthusiasm of the Catholic soldiers and their anxiety to testify their respects to the Rev. F. Perozy. The Address was signed that evening by almost all the Catholic Soldiers; and the Native Christians were equally zealous in the good cause and anxious to testify their respect for their zealous Pastor, who had laboured among them with so much fruit for the lengthened period of 15 years. The collection to defray the expenses of his journey amounted to 300 rupees, the greater portion of which was contributed by the European Soldiers. If the subscription of the Native Christians was less than that of the Europeans, it was not owing to want of zeal on their part or respect for their Pastor, but to the want of means, the cheerfulness with which it was given was the same in both, and God loves the cheerful giver; in his eyes the widow's mite, because given with a good heart, was of more value than the larger sum given by the wealthy.

Several Protestants have with great liberality joined the Catholics in testifying their respect for the Rev. Gentleman. This was not anticipated at the time the Address was prepared, and therefore it was drawn up as coming from the Roman Catholics alone.

Late on Monday evening he returned from the villages, and on Thursday evening the Address was presented to him privately, at his own request, to which he returned a suitable reply. He is to start from this in the course of a few days for Goa, and carries along with him the blessings and affections of the whole Christian population.

The happiest results have followed, from the good understanding and friendship existing between himself and the Rev. P. Doyle, Catholic Chaplain of this station. Would to God that the Priests of Meliapore and other places in this country would unite in the same manner with our zealous, pious, and learned Bishop, and the British Priests, in labouring for the Glory of God and the salvation of souls. If they would only obey our common father, His Holiness Pope Gregory the XVI. it is the only thing that would be required of them; for I am persuaded our holy Bishop would not require more, and he could not be satisfied with less. If they would comply in this matter, they would be received with joy, and if recalled by their lawful superiors would be allowed by his Lordship to depart with regrets. Frutres sumus et filii Excelsi omnes!!! We are all brethren and the children of the Most High!!!

MY DEAR MR. PEROZY,

I am sorry that the Archbishop of Goa has called you away from us; if His Grace permits you to return, I will be happy to take you again under my jurisdiction, and to provide for you in old age, as I promised in a former letter.

You have my best thanks and wishes for your welfare, and I would deem no language strong enough to express my approbation of your zeal and edifying deportment.

I remain, my dear Mr. Perozy,
Yours very sincerely,

Bellary, 8th Feb. 1844.

DEAR AND REV. SIR,

We, the Roman Catholics of Bellary, have heard with great regret, that you have been recalled to your native city, by his Grace the Archbishop of Goa: we cannot allow you to depart from among us, without expressing our esteem and affection for you, on account of your many virtues.

In you we behold a Priest from that generous nation, that opened its Colleges for the education of our clergy, when they could not receive it in their own country.—We shall always entertain a grateful recollection of this inestimable favor, and, on account of it, an affectionate esteem for you, for all the Priests of your country, and particularly for your illustrious Archbishop, to whom we beg you will convey our most respectful congratulations on his happy arrival in this country. We hail him as the harbinger of peace, the healer of dissensions and discord, the cementer of union between the Priests of two countries that ought to be united in the closest bonds of affection, but who are, unfortunately for religion, divided,—that the Almighty God may soon enable him to establish peace and harmony in this country, will be our constant prayer to the throne of Divine Grace,—that you may, also, be a happy instrument in this blessed reconciliation, is the hope of your affectionate flock, and their greatest consolation, in their present bereavement.

We beg your acceptance of the accompanying small sum, which we have the happiness of sending you, through the Rev. P. Doyle, the Catholic Chaplain of this station, as a testimonial of our respect for you, and to enable you to prosecute your journey to your native city. That you may arrive safely at your journey's end, and that you may obtain all blessings, spiritual and temporal, will be the prayer of,
Your affectionate people.

MY DEAR CATHOLIC BRETHREN,

It is with much gratitude I acknowledge the receipt of your affectionate address, and although I cannot consider myself deserving of the high encomium you have passed on me, I take it more as an evidence of your affection than the reward of real merit. Although desired to wait on his Grace the Archbishop of Goa, I know not his Grace's intentions, and whether I may or may not be permitted to return among you again; but be the case as it may, I cannot refrain from expressing, on the present occasion, my heart-felt satisfaction as regards your orderly and Christian conduct, and the disposition evinced to receive and conform to the advice and admonition, which it had been my duty to impart to you during the long period of my residence here. I am happy in finding, that my ministry, which I have endeavoured to discharge with sincere and faithful zeal, has been appreciated by you, and that my departure has awakened that feeling and sorrow so well expressed in your Address. I came here in 1828, and, excepting three years which I spent in Goa, I have had the happiness to labour among you during the rest of the time; for eight years I officiated among the Irish and English Catholics, and from the tolerable knowledge of English I acquired during my residence here, I was enabled to know how affectionate and reverential their feelings were towards their Clergy, and I can assure you that it afforded me great pleasure and satisfaction to do my duty to them, as well as to attend to their wishes in all other functions of my office. Although I had not much to do with you, my European Christian brethren who have now united with others, or even taken the leading part in addressing me, I had many opportunities of knowing your benign disposition towards me; but I must say, that the handsome assistance with which your address is accompanied, has come upon me unawares, and I can hardly find suitable language to express my thankfulness. I can only say that this act of spontaneous generosity, shall ever remain impressed on my mind, and I pray Almighty God to repay you an hundred fold. I have had much happiness in affording some information respecting the condition of the Native flock to your dear Clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Doyle, whose disposition and deportment towards me have ever been the most amiable, and whose zeal for the cause of religion, and personal piety, is beyond comment, and I feel confident that he will carefully watch over your souls and guide you into everlasting life. I cannot allude to the differences existing between the Portuguese and British Clergy without much regret; but I entertain an humble hope that the disunion which has so long existed will be removed by the interference of his Grace, to which good cause I shall gladly lend my humble aid.

I shall consider it my duty at the earliest opportunity to convey to his Grace, your respectful congratulations on his arrival in this country. Finally I beg you will pray to Almighty God for my safe journey, and in return I shall not forget you in my prayers.

I remain with sincere affection,

Yours very faithfully and affectionately,
FULGENCIUS PEROZY,
Vicar, Missionary Apostolic.

REV. FATHERS FRANCIS AND VINCENT.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—The following extracts from letters lately received from Fathers Francis and Vincent are sent to you for publication. Father Vincent is now Chaplain to the Catholic troops on the N. W. Frontier. Father Francis to those of Agra. I avail myself of the present opportunity, to bring to the notice of the Catholics of India, the exemplary conduct, self-devotion, and self-denial of the gentleman who has the spiritual charge of H. M. 39th Regt. and proud indeed I am of the task.

Early in August last the cholera commenced its ravages, first in H. M. 39th Regt. afterwards in the Artillery. Father Francis immediately took his post amongst the men of both. For days and nights the Rev. Father took no rest, and had hardly time to take refreshment! O! the scene was a trying one, and well calculated to call forth the energies of an Apostle! Men dying in every direction, and all desirous to have the Priest to assist them through the last mortal struggle. After the confession was heard, the Holy Viaticum administered, and the anointing “in the name of the Lord,” was finished, the poor sufferer would beg of the holy man to remain with him until the death-pang was over. Some died in his arms! Early in the morning the Priest is found at the grave, where he had to remain for hours. Scarcely returned, when the cries of the orphan and the widow give place to those of the child or the wife, announcing that another victim is struck by this fell disease. Off on the wings of love and mercy, starts the Priest to the spot. Others shun a contact with this fearful scourge,—nothing can daunt him:—to labour thus he has forsaken all, and he is ready to follow his Divine Master to a death more terrible than this! Father Francis is next found following his flock to Gwallior:—on the plain of Maharajpooor, behold him whispering peace to the departing soul of the gallant Irishman in this, the most awful crisis of his whole life,—the dying hour!

This is but a faint picture of the services of Father Francis, the Catholic Chaplain of Agra.

Your devoted Servant,
VERITAS

FROM FATHER FRANCIS, A. M.

Dated Gwalior, 3rd January, 1844.

"I am at present in the camp of the English Army before Gwalior, affording spiritual aid to the wounded men. The day of the engagement I could not find the camp of the 39th, the following morning, accompanied by Father Felix, we reached it without accident. We were well received by all. An Escort of the 16th Lancers conducted us to the General's tent. The General, who speaks French very well, treated us with the most marked attention. I informed him I came to see the wounded; he thanked me, shaking hands, and gave orders accordingly. The officers of the 39th, with the Colonel at their head, invited us to breakfast. The Army with which I am, were opposed to Alexander's troops, who fought with great gallantry, particularly the Gunners, of whom a great many are Christians. The 39th Regt. much distinguished themselves. The English have had twenty-one killed and one hundred and eighty wounded. I have heard the confessions of all who are badly wounded. Being very busy, I must conclude in haste."

FROM FATHER VINCENT, A. M.

Dated Umballah, 23rd January, 1844.

RETURN TO THE ANCIENT FAITH IN THE DYING HOUR!

"In the year 1839, among other individuals sent to the 2d Bengal European Regiment, as Drill Instructors, was a Sergeant, a Catholic. In a short time he was promoted to Sergeant-Major: his name was William O'Sullivan. This very man, finding himself so suddenly raised above his comrades, became proud like Lucifer, and joining with it vanity, the sister of pride, he renounced his religion, and became a member of a fashionable one, one very good to live in (as a countryman of his was heard to say,) but not to die in. When the Regiment came to Ghazepore, I endeavoured to recal him to a sense of his terrible situation, in vain. Alas! in vain I expounded to him the sense of the Scriptures, the sentiments of the Fathers of the Church, and the awful denunciations of Almighty God! All in vain! One thing more remained, i. e. to pray for him. O Altitudo devitiam sapientie et Scientie

Dei; quam incomprehensibilia sunt judicia ejus! Whilst this wretched Apostate was sleeping the sleep of death, forgetting and contemning all the inspirations of that always working Grace, forgetting that God outraged, might leave him, and let him 'die in his sin.' Yes, that very time the Good Shepherd was more earnestly following him, to bear back upon his Divine shoulders the stray sheep to the bosom of His Fold and Spouse, our Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church! On the 4th instant, he, W. O'Sullivan, was thrown from his horse; he being a heavy man, the fall was felt in proportion to the force of gravity with which he came in contact with the ground. He was seriously injured. Medical aid was promptly afforded, and it was found that fatal effects were to be expected. The sufferer felt so: he saw clearly that his days were numbered, and beheld death approaching. This accident called him back to his God; and such is the power of Divine Grace, that the poor unhappy man forgot his agony through his conscience stinging him for what, in the days of his health and pride, he had done! How did he then act? As thousands have done before him. To his friends around him he said 'Do call the Priest, call to me Father Vincent. I now feel the weight of his words to me. I will make my solemn abjuration. I will confess my sins. I will die faithful to that Religion which has nourished me from my infancy.' I was not in the station at the time, but God granted him life enough to see me. On Friday, the 19th, I returned, and was instantly sent for. I went. Oh! what was his joy in seeing me! He bathed my hands with his tears—he made his general confession. I absolved him from the excommunication—gave him the sacred Viaticum—then anointed him 'in the name of the Lord,' and yesterday his soul returned to the Creator, and this morning his body to the dust. May he rest in peace, Amen.

"It may be asked, why do I relate all this? I reply, in compliance with the wishes of the deceased, in order that the public, who were scandalized by his apostacy, might be edified by his conversion, and to supplicate the prayers of the Faithful for him to Almighty God to grant eternal rest to his soul.

"I am happy to announce the following conversions:—

"A young Englishman, formerly of H. M. 13th Light Infantry, but now a Volunteer into the 31st Foot, was baptized conditionally by me in November; two women in Loodianah on Christmas Day; and a young girl, aged 12 years, in Subathoo, on the 3d January, were also conditionally baptized."

MORE CONVERSIONS. *

TO HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP OF EDESSA,
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, &c. &c. &c.

MY LORD,—I had the honor of addressing your Grace from Muddunpoora on the 15th instant, intimating the conversion of Mr. J. Jackson and his family, and of my having administered the sacrament to him and his son, after which I took my leave and proceeded to a place called Jallokattee, Modeepoor, a village not a day's distance from hence. I had understood from Mr. Lewis of several Christians of our faith residing here who sadly needed spiritual comfort. On my arrival, on the 17th, I had the pleasure of baptizing a young man and a girl, and of administering the sacrament of confession to three ladies bowed down with years: all of them were infirm, and it gave me pain to learn that for a period of 50 years they had not the satisfaction of seeing a Pastor nor the Church. One of them was so indisposed that I thought it necessary to give her the Extreme Unction, and the satisfaction expressed by all of them for seeing me and receiving spiritual comfort is inexpressible. It gives me much pain to add that the children of these individuals have received a Protestant education, none of whom could I meet to speak upon the subject of Religion. Had their parents been impressed with the necessity of educating them in the Catholic faith they would not have been so lost.—I returned to my Parish, at Sheebpoor, and in my way, a couple of hours hence, met 4 Mugs desirous of receiving Baptism, and I requested them to wait on me to be instructed. Yesterday, I baptized here ten Mussulmans, and two of them were also married. I have some more receiving instructions for Baptism. As I have been given to understand that at a place called Mirzagunge, a day's way from hence, several Mugs are desirous of being converted to the faith, I now intend to proceed there, and the result of my visit will be made known to your Grace.

These conversions to our Religion are sure indications of the triumph of that Church instituted by Christ, and which has existed for all ages. I feel glad to add that several of our separated brethren are reading such tracts as have given them, and they already doubt

Doctrines on which they hitherto placed their reliance and hope of salvation. It is a fact that a Protestant Lady had, in fulfilment of a vow made for the recovery of her child, sent two large wax candles to my Church lately; and on a layman of mine, (Mr. Lewis) shewing my written opinion, and persuading her how wrong it was to attend the worship of heretics, she dissuaded her Mother (a Catholic) from attending her own Family Sunday Prayers, which she had done for years and years. Is not this an indication of her faith in our Religion?

Should your Grace be pleased to send the Catechism of Mr. Crow, made in the Bengally language, I can have them transferred in Roman characters by some of my laymen as early as possible.—Messrs J. B. and G. B. Lewis, have also agreed to make an abridged Dictionary in the Roman characters of the Bengallee and English Languages and vice versa.

I am

Your obedient servant,
 THOMAS ZUBIBURN.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE MISSION.

Captain Roomer, the highly respected commander of the English Schooner Olivia, a convert from the Protestant faith, and whose name has appeared in this journal on more than one occasion, has written to His Grace the Archbishop, the following grateful letter for the contributions he has collected during his short stay in this city for the Church in the course of erection at the Cape of Good Hope. This gentleman's exertions in raising a fund for that Church, at every port his vessel touches, are truly laudable, and where is the Christian who can refuse a mite to such a man, soliciting the means for the erection of a temple dedicated to Almighty God, without admiring his zeal and piety?

Schooner Olivia, Proceeding down the River Hoogly, Feb. 29th, 1844.

MY DEAR LORD,—Annexed I beg leave to lay before your Grace the names of our benevolent Catholic, and generous Protestant brethren, who have kindly favoured me with their Donations for the completion of our Catholic Church at Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope.

Our Very Rev. Bishop, Dr. Griffiths, authorises me in his name, as well as in the name of all our Catholic brethren in Cape Town, to return their heartfelt thanks for the liberal assistance received from their kind friends in Calcutta.

I need not trouble your Grace by stating the present unfavourable prospect we have of making a speedy finish to our Church, for it is too true that our funds at the present time fall far short of the necessary expences, that must naturally follow in finishing the great and glorious work now in hand; but I trust the Almighty will aid and assist us, by bestowing his grace upon our liberal brethren and friends who have afforded us the means of carrying on that great work. In doing which I beg your Grace will return my sincere regards to all friends,

And remain, your Grace's

Most obedient servant,

WM. ROOME.

NON-PERFORMANCE OF RELIGIOUS RITES.

To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.

SIR,—Just as I was preparing to set out to my mission at Seebore, my attention was called to a letter and an editorial article in your paper of the 23d instant, in which it is stated, that a few days since a boy aged 8 or 9 years, who died in the Free School, was buried without any religious rites, and without even a coffin, in a hole in the Catholic Burial Ground at Intally. As the clergyman charged with the care of that cemetery, I feel it proper to inform you of the real state of the case to which your journal refers. You are aware, I presume, that in the Free School the children are obliged without exception to learn the Protestant Catechism, and to conform to the Protestant worship. Hence when they attain the use of reason, and continue in such an Institution, they are to be deemed Protestants and cannot, whilst in this state, be admitted to Sacraments in the Catholic Church. The child, of whom there is question, died in a Protestant Institution, and continued until death, in conformity with the rules of that Institution, to learn the Protestant doctrine and to attend to its worship. When applied to, by the mother of the deceased, on this matter, I informed her that for the reasons just given, I could not officiate at the interment of her son, but that I would offer no impediment to his interment in the cemetery under my care. You will please to remark, that the payment or non-payment of fees occasioned no difficulty whatever, either in this case, or in any other similar occurrence, for it is the usage with the Priests of Calcutta, always to perform in the Parochial Church of a deceased pauper gratuitously the funeral devotions. I am sure that you Sir, will admit, it would be unreasonable and inconsistent to expect that a Catholic Clergyman should officiate at the funeral of a person, who continued until death to act as a Protestant under the guidance of his parents or guardians. With respect to the boy in question being buried without a coffin, I knew nothing of that circumstance, until I learned it from your journal, and I am of opinion, that it certainly reflects great discredit on the well-endowed Protestant Institution in which the child died.

I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,
Calcutta, Feb. 24, 1844. AUG. GOIRAN.

PUBLIC PRAYERS FOR THE PEOPLE OF IRELAND.

The Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, and recently created Archbishop of Edessa, has published a Pastoral Letter, in which he conjures the Catholics of Bengal to offer up their earnest prayers to the Almighty for the people of Ireland, during the terrible ordeal through which they are now passing. He has given a touching description of the persecutions which that noble people have suffered for their religion for the last three hundred years. We dare say that his Grace's pious and patriotic suggestion will be faithfully complied with by the Church of Bengal, which is already so much indebted to Catholic Ireland. Indeed we have no doubt that in every part of the known world, prayers are offered up for the prosperity of Ireland, by her expatriated children. The "poor exile of Erin" never forgets the land of his birth, nor the religion of his fathers. Here in Halifax we can truly say that the snows of Nova Scotia have not chilled our patriotic ardour. We feel as intensely for the wrongs and sufferings of our country as any other portion of her numerous children. We know the crisis through which she is passing; and because there is a God of justice in heaven we believe she will be triumphant. By the peaceful, temperate, and constitutional agitation of the last year; she has driven her unwise rulers to the disgraceful acknowledgment that their dominion must be supported not by affection but terror. Hitherto, England might have attempted to deceive the world respecting the nature of the tenure by which she holds possession of Ireland. But this hypocritical mask is now torn off by her own reckless hands; and in the middle of the 19th century, in the face of the civilized world, before the Cabinets of St. Petersburg and Washington, of Berlin, Paris and Vienna, she makes the humiliating confession, that eight millions of the bravest and best of her subjects are overawed by brute force, instead of being ruled in kindness and mercy. The Military Array at Clontarf, is a clearer index, and more forcible exposition of English policy in Ireland than all the books that have been published on the subject for the last quarter of a century. The hideous system of misgovernment now stands forth in all its naked and disgusting brutality to excite the derision and scorn of every rational being.

Sacred Heaven! only think of eight millions of thinking, intelligent rational men:—eight millions of God's creatures made to the Divine Image—eight millions of a moral, temperate, brave, noble, generous, and Christian people, treated like so many wolves or ~~to~~ to their native land!

The arguments addressed to their reason are bullets and bayonets—~~the~~ of artillery are to make impressions upon the ~~the~~—the cannon's burn-match is to flash conviction on their benighted intellects, and all their knotty scruples about English justice are to be unravelled by the point of the sword.

But, glorious and magnanimous England!—"Envy" of the Afghans and "Admiration" of the Chinese! There is a God in Heaven, the strength of the weak, the refuge of the afflicted, the scourge of the oppressor. There is a "God of armies," there, before whom your artillery, horse, foot, and Dragoons are of no avail. There is a God of mercy whose compassionate care is ever open to the sighs and groans of the suffering creatures. Before his Throne, millions of tearful and agonizing supplications are now ascending not only from Ireland herself, but from every part of the habitable globe. Yes, England! THERE IS A GOD IN HEAVEN, AND THAT GOD IS JUST.—Halifax Register, Nov. 23. 1843.

REV. PETER J. TYRRELL, P. P., LUSK.

I regret most sincerely to announce the death of this most exemplary priest and uncompromising patriot, which took place on yesterday evening (Monday, 4th inst.), in his own house, at Lusk, in about the 51st year of his age; and 22nd of his sacred ministry. Mr. Tyrrell was in every sense an Irishman—in country, in religion, in feeling, and in friendship. He was born in Dublin, of honest but humble parents; and whilst at his daily toil he stole hours to study his Latin grammar. Having received the rudiments of learning in the Irish metropolis, he completed his studies in one of the French colleges—I think at Rouen, where he received the sacred order of priesthood, and remained on the missions there for some time. Having often visited there the celebrated Mount Melleray, he early formed an idea of entering that extraordinary retreat; but the extreme delicacy of his health, under the advice of others, prevented him from following up his desires on this subject. Having left France about the year 1823, he stopped in London; and the late Dr. Poynter, V. A. there, having applied to the venerable Archbishop of Dublin for liberty for him to remain on that mission, he continued most actively engaged at Stratford for about five years. Whoever is acquainted with the state of religion in England for the last twenty-five years, must be familiar with Father Tyrrell's magnanimous stand at the anti-Catholic and Bible meetings, held in London, in 1824, 1825, and 1826, and the active part he took in the formation of the Catholic Defence Societies in London, which contributed so much to the advancement of true faith and sound morality. Having about this time been taken seriously ill, Father Tyrrell was advised to take the benefit of his native air; and by great care and comfortable lodgings at Booterstown, near Dublin, he soon recovered. After some time he was appointed to the chaplaincy of Harold's Cross Convent. From thence after a few years, he went as chaplain to the Presentation Convent, George-hill. After some years he was appointed as curate to the Church of St. Audeon's, Bridge-street; where for years he laboured hard, and lived on very scanty means. The Rev. Mr. Fogarty, P. P. of Lusk, having departed this life, the 27th of December, 1840, the Rev. P. J. Tyrrell was appointed to succeed him, and took possession of the parish in the beginning of 1841. At the end of this brief sketch you have a simple outline of the manner in which he discharged his duties as pastor, from observations made nearly twelve months ago on the spot. It is needless to state that Father Tyrrell was one of those included in the list of lovers of their country—who have been charged, on the present Government informer, Bond Hugh's mis-sworn indictment, as guilty of a conspiracy. On Wednesday last, after celebrating Mass in his church, it was with difficulty he could get to his house, having a sudden attack of what is stated to be erysipelas, which terminated in mortification. He received Extreme Unction and the last Sacrament on Saturday, and expired, to the grief of his friends and the regret of his country, at six o'clock on Monday evening. To portray the character of the clergy in cities and large towns is, perhaps, unnecessary, as their labours are so generally known. I will, therefore, at present, praise one amongst the thousands, who, thank God, are an honour to the rural districts and country parishes. In the course of some twenty hours, I thus witnessed those ordinary and regular duties which form the daily or weekly rule of their lives. This was no festival time, nor extraordinary period of devotion. It was the every Sunday work—the every Sabbath duty! I arrived in Lusk, about ten miles from the metropolis, and famed for its many memorials of religious antiquity, on Saturday evening. Here the good pastor, who, in England and in France, had devoted many years to the sacred cause of his early ministry, Rev. P. J. Tyrrell, with his active curate, Rev. James Dunne, had terminated the awful but heavenly labour of the confessional for hours, and had retired to complete their divine office, the recital of which takes up in itself alone nearly an hour each day. We then concluded the Sabbath, or Lord's Day-eve, by an interesting conversation upon the labours and sufferings of the Trappists, and those other religious men who are the honour and ornament of the Catholic Church. After due sleep, we arose. It was the Christian's day of rest; but the ministers of religion's most active time of duty. The pastor, after commencing his morning by the first part of his divine office, repaired to the church to hear the confessions of all who were anxious to approach the table of the Lord with piety and love! This done, he rested and offered the holy sacrifice of the Mass for the relief of the living and the dead. He then opened the book of the Gospel, and having read the words of eternal hope, plainly but solidly laid before his flock their duties, their hopes, and their rewards. During this period the zealous curate was performing the same sacred work in the poor-house, thus turning the house of their captivity into comfort, and cheering the gloom of their prison with the divine rays of religion. Whilst we partook of a plain but solid breakfast, the curate arrived in the parish church again to offer the holy Sacrifice for all who could not attend in the early part of the morning. After this the pastor again ascended the steps of the altar, and for nearly another hour addressed the remainder of his flock, in the most fervent terms, upon what most concerned their present peace and future happiness. After this, catechetical instruction commenced and spiritual reading for all who had not the means of being daily instructed, which filled up the time to nearly two o'clock. We had scarcely time to take a circuit round the town, when, at three o'clock, vespers were solemnly chanted by the choir and responded to by the pastor, his curate, and his flock round the altar of love. Next followed the office in honour of the sacred heart of Mary, ever Virgin, which is recited here every Sunday, with the intention of imploring the conversion of sinners. The solemn prayers being duly recited, agreeably to the rules of this pious confraternity, the members of whom were assembled, a lecture on the virtue of the Holy Virgin was read, and an exhortation by the pastor given. He then gave a solemn benediction of the most holy Sacrament, and the evening's pious work closed by an additional enrolment of members. Time was left for dinner and that free and familiar converse which adds a charm to friendship and a pleasure even to piety itself. Thus, with a religious confraternity, good schools, benefit society, and temperance association, peace and order and the purest pleasure prevail throughout this rural seat of happiness and love.—Tablet, Dec. 9.

After an examination performed with such solemnity, and so positive a declaration from the novice, if she perseveres in her resolution to be professed,—even supposing that her first step might have been rather unreflected,—have we not reason to be persuaded, that the last is the result of a free choice and mature deliberation? On the contrary, if, notwithstanding all these precautions, to know whether any undue influence and human considerations have not been used to determine her resolution, she engages herself against her will and inclination, is it not true that she has been the chief contriver of her own ruin? If she puts on fetters which it will never be in her power to break off, has she not been the first to forge and rivet them? If she be an involuntary victim led to the altar in order to be sacrificed to the avarice or ambition of her unnatural parents, has she not been herself the sacrificing priest? For it is morally impossible that a bishop, and a whole community, violating coolly and with one accord, the most sacred duties of nature and religion, would enter into a foul conspiracy to force the inclinations of an innocent young person, and devote her to be miserable for the remainder of her life, and perhaps throughout all eternity.

It is sometimes said that a young person inclined to embrace a religious state, would do much better to remain in the world, than to hide in a convent virtuous qualities, with which she was adorned by divine Providence in order to edify her neighbour by her good example. It shows but a superficial knowledge of the nature of man, to pretend that every individual of our species is equally fit to fulfil the different duties of society, and that in order to appreciate with justice what sort of good a man could have done, we must not only consider what others may have done in the same circumstances, but of what he is capable himself; therefore, in order to judge without fear of mistake, a young lady would have done better to live in the world than in a community, the first thing to examine is, whether she was fit for the world, and could be happy in the world; for general experience teaches, that in order to render ourselves useful members of the commonwealth, we must be placed in a situation conformable to our inclinations, and adapted to our natural or acquired talents. Some are destined to shine in a high station; others to walk unknown in the obscure paths of an humble life. Some are called to dedicate their whole time and labours to the service and edification of their neighbour; others to hide themselves in retirement, only occupied with the government of their souls, the regulation of their passions, and practices of piety,—every one according to the particular gift which he has received from the supreme Giver of all good gifts. If it be reckoned as selfishness in a young person to leave the world, because she does not find her happiness in it, and because, knowing her own weakness, she is persuaded that her virtue would be exposed to dangers which it would be very hard for her to resist, it must be owned, that it is a selfishness founded upon the precept of our Divine Saviour himself, when he says, "What is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world, and lose himself, and cast away himself?" (Luke ix. 25.)

At least, they say, it cannot be denied, that a nun shut up in her convent, becomes thereby quite useless to society. To this objection I will answer, that it cannot be brought against those religious who dedicate themselves to the education of youth, and to the attendance of the sick; and they are by far the greater number. As for those who, judging themselves unqualified for these active and exterior duties of Christian charity, prefer a life of solitude and prayer, supposing that they are of no utility, to speak more properly, of the same visible utility to the public, (since it must be confessed that this kind of life which they like is not in the least injurious to mankind) why should they be denied the comforts of it? Have they not, like their other fellow-citizens, the liberty, as it has been already proved, of disposing of themselves, and of choosing the situation the best suited to their mental and bodily abilities, and consequently the best calculated to make them happy?

Moreover, is a life of retirement, penance, and prayer, to be branded with idleness and inutility to mankind? What shall we say then of Moses, who instead of putting himself at the head of his people, who were fighting against their enemies, went up to the top of a mountain to pray for the success of their arms? What shall we say of St. John the Baptist, who led for so many years such an austere life, hidden in a desert near the river Jordan? What shall we say of the apostles, who resigned to the deacons the care of the poor, the widows, and the orphans, in order to have more time to pray? What shall we say of that holy widow, Anna the prophetess, who, after having lived only seven years with her husband, and had attained the advanced age of "Four-score and four years, departed not from the temple; by fastings and prayers, serving day and night." (Luke, ii. 36, 37.) Shall we have the temerity to accuse these holy souls of having idled away their time? Shall we dare suspect their fervent prayers to have been unacceptable to God, and of no profit to themselves or others? What shall we say of Jesus Christ himself, who remained hidden and unknown, working in a poor carpenter's shop till he was thirty years of age, although at twelve he confounded the doctors of the law by the wisdom of his questions and answers and although as St. Paul declares, "In him dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily?" (Col. xi. 9.) What shall we say of his precept, "We ought always to pray and not to faint;" (Luke xviii. 1) and of his long and frequent prayers during the time of his ministry? Shall we have the sacrilegious audacity to pretend that we understand better than he, what is pleasing to the Almighty, and useful to man? Oh! no, all that we shall say is, "That wisdom of this world is foolishness with God."

Not so thought the primitive Christians. They considered religion as the main point, and made all temporal concerns give place to it; and this is what the monks and nuns do, who have separated themselves from the world, in order to attend with liberty to the one thing necessary; and from hence have been called religious, as at first all good Christians were. The primitive Christians prayed often, both in common together, and in private by themselves, coming as near as they could to continual prayer. We read in the letters of St. Ignatius, in the works of Tertullian, of St. Clement of Alexandria, St. Cyprian, Origen, in the apostolical constitutions, St. Ambrose, St. Chrysostom, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, St. Augustine, &c. &c. that the first Christians met to pray in common, as often as possible, being persuaded that the greater number of faithful who are joined together in begging the same favours from God, the more efficacious are their prayers towards obtaining the object of their humble and fervent petitions; according to the declaration of our Saviour: "If two of you shall agree upon earth, concerning anything whatsoever they shall ask, it shall be done for them by my Father who is in heaven; for where there are two or three gathered together in my name, there I am in the midst of them." St. Ignatius recommended to St. Polycarp, (both disciples of St. John the Evangelist) frequently to assemble the faithful, and exhorts him to see that all be present. The public prayers at which they most frequently assisted were those of the morning and evening, or what is called lauds and vespers. They were exhorted thus to consecrate the beginning and close of the day, and not to excuse themselves therefrom, on account of their temporal concerns, which are to be considered as only secondary to those which are spiritual. Such as could not be present, as the sick, the imprisoned, or people on a journey, met in private as many as possibly could; and though they were alone, they failed not to pray at their appointed hours. Besides lauds and vespers, they prayed also at terce, sext, and none, and in the night. St. Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and St. Cyprian, expressly mention all these prayers. Origen requires that every one should pray at least three times a day; in the morning, at noon, in the evening; and in the night. Generally during the day, which was divided into twelve hours, according to the Roman manner, they prayed every three hours. They even rose to pray at midnight. St. Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen, mention this midnight prayer. St. Cyprian recommends it. And this custom of getting up in the night is much praised by all the fathers, as of great use to mortify the body, and to raise the mind to God, at a time the most quiet and free from disturbance. The faithful were exhorted besides to employ the intervals of sleep in meditating on the Psalms, and the Lord's Prayer, &c. In a word, to renew more frequently their attention to the presence of God, they recited some particular prayers before everything they did, according to the precept of St. Paul: "Whatsoever you do in word and work, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ: giving thanks to God and the Father through him." Thus all their husbandry labours, such as ploughing, sowing their corn, making the harvest, and gathering the fruits of the earth, began and ended with prayer. They prayed when they began to build a house, or to dwell in it; to make a new piece of cloth, and when they put on their clothes; and even in the most ordinary occurrences. We see instances of these prayers in the benedictions still retained in the rituals. The salutation at the beginning of a letter, and on other occasions, was not only an expression of friendship but also a prayer. In performing the least action, they made use of the sign of the cross, as a still shorter formulary of a benediction: they marked it upon their foreheads, and used it almost on all occasions, that is to say, whenever they came in or went out; when they walked, when they sat down, and when they rose up; when they went to bed, and when they dressed themselves, or put on their shoes; when they ate or drank, &c. &c. Now this holy practice of continual prayer, this singing of the psalms, these pious observances and customs, these short prayers before and after meals, walks, work, &c. and frequent signs of the cross, we find ordained in the constitutions and rules of monasteries of monks and nuns, and nearly in the same manner as we have seen the first Christians practising them. St. Anthony, St. Pachomius, St. Benedict, and the other founders of religious orders who followed their example, did not aim at introducing any novelty, or to go beyond the virtue of their fathers. They wished only to preserve the tradition of the strict practice of the gospel, which they found to grow slacker every day. They always proposed to themselves as models those ascetics who had preceded them: such in Egypt (according to what Cassian says) were the disciples of St. Mark the Evangelist, who lived in the neighbourhood of Alexandria, shut up in houses, praying, meditating on the Holy Scriptures, using manual labour, and not taking their food until night. Some, it is true, who tended to the most sublime perfection,—or converted sinners, who wished to purify themselves by repentance, practised all the exercises of penance, in imitation of the prophets and St. John the Baptist; adding to the ordinary frugal and spare diet of the Christians, extraordinary abstinences and fasts, and inuring themselves to the duties of piety, by chastising the body, as St. Paul says of himself, and reducing it to subjection. But the generality of religious of both sexes proposed only to themselves the example of the primitive Church of Jerusalem, and that of the apostles. They sought not to gain admiration by any extraordinary way of life, but to live like true Christians. This is seen in the greater rules of St. Basil, which are no more than an abridgment of the morality of the gospel, which he proposes in general to all. There are only a few things in this rule which regard in particular persons separated from the world. What was peculiar in religious was their renouncing marriage, the possession of temporal goods, and the company of the faithful, even of their relations. In every other respect they were an assembly of good Christians, living by their own labour, observing silence, exercising themselves in combating their vices one after another, to the end that having fought a good fight, as St. Paul says, they might attain that purity of heart which would render them worthy to see God. All their practices were and still are, grounded upon these principles. Such have been the motives which have at all times actuated the founders and foundresses of monastic orders; and the good religious who embraced their holy institutes.

NEW ROMAN CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL AT LAMBETH.

(From the Globe, January 4.)

This building, which is situated in the Westminster-road, near the Blind Asylum and Bethlehem Hospital, is rapidly approaching completion. The foundation stone was laid in April, 1840, on which occasion the church was dedicated to St. George the tutelary saint of England. It is the largest ecclesiastical edifice devoted to the Roman Catholic worship that has been constructed since the Reformation, when Henry VIII. destroyed and reduced the majority of the Catholic establishments. Its external dimensions are 230 feet long by 84 feet broad. The height of the tower at the west end at present is 60 feet, but when completed its extreme elevation will be 330 feet above the ground level. The style of architecture preserved throughout the building is the florid Gothic. The tower is most substantially built of Caen stone. Its walls averaging nine feet in thickness. It contains a belfry, with room for a peal of eight bells. On each side of the tower are double belfry windows, decorated with mitres, parapets, pinnacles, &c., and when funds shall admit, it is intended to ornament the walls with 100 statues of saints and martyrs. The tower will be surmounted by a steeple, built after the pattern of the magnificent spire of Salisbury Cathedral, and will be terminated by a large cross. The interior height of the church, from floor to ceiling, is 57 feet. The length of the nave in the clear is 160 feet, by 72 feet broad; the chancel is 40 feet long by 26 feet broad. Over the entrance to the chancel is a richly carved oak screen, and a rood-loft in the form of a cross, on each side of which will be placed statues of St. Anne. From either side of the rood-loft ascends a spiral staircase, terminating externally in two turrets decorated with crockets, figures, and other ornamental work. Each turret is elevated 40 feet above the ceiling. A carved stone pulpit will be placed at a short distance from the chancel screen. Adjoining the chancel, on each side, are two small chapels for altars, over which are to be placed stained glass windows. The chancel window is very large, measuring 30 feet by 18 feet; the mullions are of oak, with rich foliage; the interstices will be filled with stained glass of various colours, containing an emblematical representation of the history and passion of our Lord. It is the gift of the Earl of Shrewsbury, and will cost 5000*l*. Underneath will be placed the principal altar, which will be decorated with statues of saints and bishops. Another large window is placed in the tower opposite the chancel window, and is considered a fine specimen of the florid style of architecture.

The church contains in all 28 windows. The roof is constructed of carved, stained timber, which will be stencilled in various colours and devices. The mode in which the roof has been built is a modification of the manner anciently observed in the building of large edifices. Instead of covering the rafters of the ceiling with lath and plaster, to form a basis on which to construct the decorative work, as is usually done in modern buildings, the rafters themselves subserve ornamental purposes, by which means considerable expense is avoided, and beauty is combined with utility. The roof is supported by two rows of fluted stone pillars, consisting of eight in each row. The pillars are 18 feet in height, and will be finished by capitals elaborately wrought in fine stone, carved in rich foliage, and connected one with another by small intercolumniations, in the form of arches, rising from the capitals to the rafters. The floor of the nave and aisles will be covered with red and blue Staffordshire tiles, each tile measuring six inches in the square. The chancel and side chapels are to be paved with encaustic tiles, cast in different shapes and of various colours. At the south-west corner of the south aisle will be placed the large and richly-ornamented baptismal font carved in Caen stone. The interior of the Church is not obstructed by galleries; the only projections are the organ-loft and two small galleries for the choir over the two side doorways at the east end. No pews or closed seats will be allowed, but open benches will be placed down the aisles, constructed with low backs, so as to afford an unobstructed view of the interior. The seats will yield ample accommodation for 5,000 persons. The bare costs of erecting the cathedral will be 40,000*l*, but it is expected that a sum of 100,000*l* will be necessary to complete all the contemplated embellishments and improvements.

At the east end of the church is a large sacristy: and adjoining at the north-east corner are cloisters, which connect the edifice with a presbytery, containing a spacious dining-room, and affording accommodation for several priests. Abutting on this is a convent for the Sisters of Mercy, and a school for 300 children. The convent is fitted up with kitchens, refectory, dormitories, a small chapel with a belfry, and will furnish an abode for 13 Sisters of Mercy, whose charity and kind offices will be distributed indiscriminately among the members of all religious denominations, who may need assistance. The convent, with its accompanying buildings, will cost 7,000*l*. The architecture displayed in its construction is of a similar style to that used in the building of the church, only more subdued, and of a less expensive description. Several little turrets and spires are erected in various parts, which give it a very pleasing effect. The church and nunnery together stand upon an acre of ground, measuring 42,000 square feet.

The entire edifice is built from the design of Mr. Pugin, under the superintendence of Mr. Myers, who during the last 10 years has been engaged in the construction of 37 churches. The cathedral will be consecrated and opened for public worship in the autumn of the present year; but a considerable time must necessarily elapse before the great tower and spire shall be completed. The subscriptions towards this gigantic undertaking have, for the most part, been raised in the provinces through the exertions of the Rev. Mr. Doyle, who is the principal officiating priest. The Earl of Shrewsbury and the late Mr. Benjamin George Hodges have been the principal contributors. A considerable sum has also been subscribed by the poorer classes inhabiting the parish of St. George. The names of the King of Sardinia, the King of Bohemia, and other foreign potentates also figure largely in the list of contributors. A liberal donation is expected from Louis Philippe, the King of the French, who, during his stay in England, was a resident of St. George's parish. The Roman Catholic chapel in the London-road, as soon as the cathedral is finished, will be converted into an hospital for the cure of cancer. The cathedral is the largest structure in Great Britain that has been erected by voluntary subscriptions.—Times

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.—In the Edinburgh Review for October, 1840, page 225, Mr. Macaulay rated the Roman Catholics "as certainly not fewer than one hundred and fifty millions; and it will be difficult," adds the right hon. reviewer, "to show that all the other sects united amount to one hundred and twenty millions." This proportion is pretty much confirmed by Adrien Balbi, in his great statistical work, the "Atlas Ethnographique," of which he communicated to me some of the earlier pages, and by Malte Brun, in his "Universal Geography," vol. vi., p. 79; while the English Church does not comprise a tithe of the communicants thus attributed to her elder sister; and, in the same ratio, necessarily loses her right to the designation of Catholic, or, its equivalent, universal. Weighed against even their combined opponents, the massive unity of one hundred and fifty millions cannot be denied the more comprehensive name, but, if we descend to a comparison with the minute and multitudinous divisions of Protestants, what fractional portion can sustain the slightest competition? It was this unity, contrasted with the infinite divergencies of the Reformers, that influenced the conversion of Christina of Sweden, struck with the observation of Cicero (De Natura Deorum, lib. i., cap. 2), "Quorum (philosophorum) opiniones, cum tam variae sint tamque inter se dissidentes: alterum fieri potest, ut eorum nulla, alterum certe non potest, ut plus una vera sit."—(See Ranke, Papste, Theil viii. § 9.) And St. Augustine coincidentally remarks of himself, "Inque illa unitate mens rationalis, et natura veritatis ac summi boni, mihi esse videbatur: in ista vero divisione, irrationalis vitæ nescio quam substantiam et naturam summi mali opinabar." (Confessionum, lib. iv., cap. xv.)—Gentleman's Magazine for September.

Printed and published by P. S. D'Rosario & Co.

turned as killed during two entire years of civil war. And that too by adding the evidence of rumour, to authentic testimony. And this fact vouched—not by an Irishman or a Catholic, but by an English Protestant Clergyman. Notwithstanding all, the Irish Catholics were still charged with the murder of 50,000 Protestants on the 23d of October, 1641, (though it has been demonstrated by Sir William Petty and others that there could have been scarcely more than 200,000 Protestants in all Ireland). This calumny was every where circulated in speeches, pamphlets, &c. Hume, the man who of all historians is least to be relied on, as we have very justly remarked before, for in his works, we can scarcely find one fact stated accurately, has given great circulation to this enormous falsehood. In the present case he is the more culpable, inasmuch as shortly after the appearance of the volume of his history containing the reign of Charles the 1st, he was furnished with documents demonstrating the utter falsehood of his account of the alleged Massacre. But all to no purpose, he still clung steadfastly to his falsehood, as it gave greater interest to his fictitious history. At the present day, however, no writer of character would venture to repeat the calumny, and though we are of opinion that the odious practice of imputing crime to Catholics has partially ceased, and we are sure it has with the more enlightened portion of the English, yet such a practice is still kept up by a few to whom fortune has not been so propitious, or if she has, have neglected to cultivate the talents with which she has endowed them. Dr. Lingard, the only historian whose work deserves the name of a history of England, has very properly omitted all mention of what is called “the Irish Massacre.” It is impossible to read attentively the following extracts from Dr. Lingard’s Notes (where he states his reasons for this omission) without being fully convinced of the utter falsehood of the story told by Clarendon and Temple, and that the alleged Massacre of the 23rd of October is purely a fiction. That we may not trespass too much on our readers’ patience we will be satisfied with giving the despatches (of the Lord Justices) of different dates, and a few specimens of the sort of evidence adduced to prove the reality of the alleged Massacre. “The first despatch of October the 25th; with the accompanying documents (Lord’s Journals, iv. 412; Nalson, ii, 514—523): But in these there is no mention of any one murder. After detailing the rising, and plundering by the insurgents; they add, ‘This, though too much, is all that we yet hear is done by them’. (Journals ibid; Nalson, ii, 516),” Lingard, x. 494, Note (A.) “In the fourth (despatch) of Nov. 25th, they describe the progress of the rebellion. ‘In both counties, as well Wicklow as Wexford, all the castles and houses of the English, with all their substance, are come into the hands of the rebels; and the English, with their wives and children stript naked, are banished thence by their fury and rage. The rebels in the county of Longford do still increase also, as well in their numbers as in their violence. The Ulster rebels are grown so strong, as they have sufficient men to leave behind them in the places they have gotten northward, and to lay siege to some not yet taken * * * * They have already taken Mellifont, the Lord Moor’s house, though with a loss of about 120 men of theirs, and there (in cold blood) they murdered ten of those that manfully defended that place * * * In the county of Meath also, the rebels rob and spoil the English Protestant till within six miles of Dublin” (Ibid. p. 900) —Lingard, x. 496, Note (A.) “A despatch of Nov. 27th. ‘The disturbances are now grown so general, that in most places, and even round about this city within four miles of us, not only the open rebels of mere Irish, but the native men, women, and children, join together and fall on the neighbours that are English and Protestant, and rob and spoil them of all they have, nor can we help it.” (Nalson, 902.) “I shall add a sixth, of Dec. 14th. ‘They continue their rage and malignity against the English and Protestants, who, if they leave their goods or cattle for more safety with any Parish, those are called out by the rebels, and the Papists’ goods or cattle left behind; and now upon some new councils taken by them, they have added to their former, a farther degree of cruelty, even of the highest nature, which is to proclaim, that if any Irish shall harbour or relieve any English, that he suffered to escape them with his life, that it shall be penal even to death to such Irish; and so they will be sure though they put not those English actually to the sword, yet they do as certainly and with more cruelty cut them off that way, than if they had done it by the sword, and they profess they will never give over till they leave not any seed of an Englishman in Ireland.” (Ibid. p. 911) Lingard, x. 467, Note (A) There remains another proof afforded by the Lords Justices, of the utter falsehood of Clarendon’s and Temple’s narrative. It is the following. “On the 23d of Dec. the same Lords Justices granted a commission to Henry Jones, Dean of Kilmore, and seven other clergymen, in these words: ‘Know ye that we do hereby give unto you * * * * full power and authority * * * * to call before you and examine upon the holy Evangelists * * * * as well all such persons as have been robbed and spoiled, as all the witnesses that can give testimony therein, what robberies and spoils have been committed on them since 22d of Oct. last, or shall hereafter be committed on them or any of them, what the particulars were, or are, whereof they were or shall be so robbed or spoiled; to what value, by whom, what their names were, or where they now or last dwelt that committed these robberies. On what day or night the said robberies or spoils committed, or to be committed, were done; what traitorous or disloyal words, speeches, or actions were then or at any other time uttered or committed by those robbers or any of them, and how often; and all other circumstances concerning the said particular, and every one of them. And you, our said commissioners, are to reduce to writing all the examinations, and the same to return to our Justices and Council of this our Realm of Ireland." Temple, Irish Reb. 137. There is not the smallest shadow of probability that had there been any Massacre of Protestants by the Irish, an inquiry into that most important subject should have been totally omitted in such a commission as the above. It should have necessarily been the leading feature in an inquisition of that description. Yet, such a commission did issue to inquire into matters, comparatively of trivial importance, without so much as one single word respecting the alleged Massacre! Multiplied proofs would but weaken the demonstration arising from those already given, perhaps it may be interesting to our readers to have a few specimens of the kind of evidence adduced to prove the reality of the alleged massacre. Our first extract is from Sir John Temple's "History of the Irish Rebellion:" "Hundreds of the ghosts of Protestants," says Temple, "that were drowned by the rebels at Portadown Bridge, were seen in the river bolt upright, and were heard to cry out for revenge on these rebels. One of these ghosts was seen with hands lifted up, and standing in that posture from the 29th of Dec. to the latter end of the following Lent." The next specimen we will furnish our readers with "of the reality of the alleged massacre," is taken from the testimony of a no less personage than a Protestant Bishop, and surely when a man of such exalted a character as a Protestant Bishop outrages all that is probable, in order to degrade and blacken the Irish Catholics, it is difficult to conceive what the minor inventors of fables would not do. Dr. Maxwell, Protestant Bishop of Kilmore, "who," says Borlase, "was a person whose integrity and candour none ever dared to question" "has described, in his own prolix examination, the different postures and gestures of these apparitions—(the Ghosts of Protestants)"—"as having sometimes been seen, by day and night, walking up the river at Portadown; sometimes brandishing their naked swords; sometimes singing psalms; and at other times shrieking in a most fearful and hideous manner." He adds "that he never heard any man so much as doubt the truth thereof; otherwise he had as much certainty as could morally be required of such matters." Borlase's Hist. of the Irish Rebellion, Appendix, p. 329. We are sorry to be obliged to trespass so much as we have done, on the attention of our readers, but the subject is one of so much importance, and has been so frequently introduced, that we thought it only fair and just, to quote the authorities, on both sides. That our readers and the Editor of the Englishman, will come to the conclusion that no general Massacre was contemplated, we entertain not even a shadow of doubt. Therefore we will conclude with a quotation from Warner, giving the genuine character of the Protestant Historians of this disastrous period; "It is easy enough," says this Protestant clergyman, "to demonstrate the falsehood of the relation of every Protestant historian of this rebellion." Warner, p. 296.

CONVERSIONS.

The following letter from a highly respectable Convert to our holy Faith, to his Grace the Archbishop V. A. B. will edify our readers:—

"MOST REV. FATHER,—A farewell letter from my good friend Dr. P.* has informed me of your Grace's most kind and condescending congratulations on the long and earnestly prayed for occasion of my dear wife's reception into our Holy Religion, and of your having vouchsafed un-solicited to offer up the Holy Sacrifice in thanksgiving to the Almighty. In her name and my own, I beg you to accept our humble, hearty, and grateful thanks for such paternal regard, and though personally unknown to your Grace and far removed even from your spiritual jurisdiction, I presume to entreat your Lordship to continue to remember us at the Altar, that our faith fail not, but that we may persevere to the end in working out our salvation in fear and trembling.

After such kindly interest your Grace may perhaps be pleased to learn the moving cause of this happy consummation. Singularly enough, (for local circumstances, unnecessary to enter into, were sadly discouraging to her taking the step and had long deterred her) her resolution was determined by the unexpected, but complete concession of a pious and talented friend whom she had prevailed on to study Catholic works with the sole view of removing ungenerous prejudices unworthy of his charitable professions, so that in the inscrutable designs of an overruling Providence, two sincere Protestants may with truth be said to have been made the means of convincing each other to the tenets of the Catholic faith.

I have the pleasure to enclose an order for 100 Rupees, our joint offering to gain the Lenten Indulgence and partly in lieu of our obligatory exemption from the strict observance of this penitential season. Be pleased to appropriate Mrs. ———'s share to the support of St. John's College, and divide mine between the Orphanage and defraying the expences of those three poor children from the Upper Provinces, in such proportion as you may seem desirable.

I should apologize for this long intrusion on your Lordship's valuable time.

Soliciting your blessing and prayers for ourselves and also for the friend above alluded to, that he may have strength to follow out his good resolution, I beg to subscribe myself, with the highest esteem,

Most Rev. Father,
Your very humble Servant,

Sunday, 3rd March, 1844.

In the Bengal Vicariate during the week before last, accounts were received of the conversion of two Heathen and two Protestant females, and one Armenian girl, aged about 14.

Within the last week a Presbyterian in the Bengal Vicariate requested to be admitted into the communion of our holy Faith.

CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS FOR THE INDIAN ARMY.

We are glad to learn that the Bombay Government have lately made provision for the support of a British Catholic Bishop for that Presidency, and that official notice was received from them, within the last Month, that 150 Rs. per mensem will be given to fit and proper Catholic Chaplains at Kurrachee, Hydrabad and Sukker, in Scinde. We understand also, that a new chapel has been ordered by Government for the use of the Catholic Military at Poonah, and another at Aden. Let us hope that these are the first fruits or rather the symptoms of a sincere disposition in the British rulers of India, to place the Catholics of the Indian Army on an equality with their Protestant comrades. The time which will lay their motives bare to public inspection and test their sincerity, is not distant. Six months shall not have passed away before it will be made publicly manifest, whether the timid and sordid littleness of local fears and temporary expediency, or the honest sternness of justice has forced from our rulers this pittance of propitiation. Justice to the Catholic Soldier requires, that provision should be made for the support of a Catholic Bishop and Catholic Chaplains in Bengal as well as in Bombay and its dependencies, and no good reason can be assigned for a distinction not founded on justice, when the claims of justice are to be admitted or rejected. A British Catholic Bishop arrived in Bombay only within the last year, and a state provision is now justly and properly made for his decent support and maintenance; a British Catholic Bishop has been long resident in Calcutta, who has laboured effectually to provide for the spiritual wants of a large portion of the Military, and yet, not only has no provision been made for his support, but even the co-operation of a friendly countenance in promoting the welfare of the Soldier's orphan, was often denied him by Government. In a few months hence, a Coadjutor British Bishop will have arrived with missionary resources to meet the wants of the British Soldier, and to aid our Government in promoting the happiness of all classes of our fellow subjects, by a strict attention to the duties of their benevolent vocation, and will any provision be made by Government for their support? We shall soon see the intentions of our rulers tested.

There is a trite saying, that what is badly got is badly spent; and it is equally true, that what is unjustly withheld is justly lost. Let Government look to it;—there never was a time when it was more prudent to be just towards one half of the British Army in India, than when the accents of insubordination and wide-spread discontent, begin to be heard from the lines of our Native Troops.

CONDUCT OF GOVERNMENT TOWARDS ITS CATHOLIC SOLDIERS.

To the Editor of the Calcutta Star.

SIR,—You have in yesterday's Star commented at some length, in one of those able and vigorous articles which it is quite refreshing to read, on the comparative treatment which the Irish Protestant and Catholic Clergy experienced at the hands of Government. Your sentiments will I think be concurred in by honest and liberal men of every creed, and it appears to me that your remarks are to a certain extent applicable in this country.

At least one-half of the European Soldiers in this country are Catholics. If there be any class for whose spiritual instruction Government is especially bound to provide, I submit it is the European Soldiery. How then does the Indian Government provide for the religious wants of its Catholic Soldiers?

Why it leaves them to find their own Priests and build their own Churches the best way they can. Ah! but it pays the Catholic Priest. Yes; —the enormous sum of 50 Rs. a month after he has travelled perhaps 500 miles at his own expense. To suppose that the Catholic Soldier can contrast this with what is done for the Protestant Clergy without a galling sense of humiliation and injustice, would be to suppose him devoid of the known principles of human nature.

When the Catholic Soldiers supplicate the Government to provide them with competent Ministers of their own faith, they are given to understand that, however reasonable, their request cannot be conceded to importunity —and it appears that, as regards the Catholic Soldiers, humble submission and patient endurance under a heartfelt grievance is deemed to have no limit.

The majority of H. M.'s 13th and 40th Regiments are Catholics. Of what avail let me ask, has their silent submission and good conduct in Afghanistan been towards obtaining for them a boon which they value above all others?

On their return, a Catholic Priest went from Agra to Ferozepore by dāk, at his own expense, to meet them. When he arrived there, the military authorities refused him a Tent to perform Divine Service in, though, as was well known, there were plenty in store. It has been said the Protestant Chaplain had no Tent assigned to him for the like purpose. When it is known however, that he had the use of the Governor General's Durbar Tents, it will probably be allowed that he could have no occasion for any other. The fact is, that on the morning of Christmas, 1842, while the Protestants were engaged in the performance of Divine Service in the Durbar Tent, upwards of three thousand Catholics were kneeling in the open air —and a bitterly cold morning it was. It is ridiculously absurd to say, that the Catholics do not feel this distinction. They feel it keenly. It was a common observation, "Oh Irish Papists are dogs now, but they were thought as good as Protestants in Jellalabad." The distinction was viewed with disgust by their Protestant comrades and with surprise by the Sepoys of the gallant 35th.

While at Agra the Governor General went with the Catholic Bishop to see the Chapel in Cantonments and gave directions for its reparation. The Chapel has since indeed been repaired, not however at the public cost, but at that of the poor Catholics of the 39th, many of whom have breathed their last on the field of battle, or after lingering for a time in Hospital without a minister of their faith to administer to them the consolations of religion and prepare them for eternity.

There is a time when an act of even bare justice may be done with grace and received with gratitude. But may not that time pass away? Had the English Government done for Ireland a few years ago what it would willingly do now, we should have heard nothing of repeal, which is the result of unfair Government, and O'Connell's conviction by such a Jury as has been packed to try him will do more to strengthen the repeal movement than all the speeches he could have made for the next twelve months.

FAIR PLAY.

March 8, 1844.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF GOA.

On Monday last, at five o'clock in the evening, the following Gentlemen, Natives of Bombay, went to Mazagon to pay their respects to the Archbishop of Goa. They were received with every kindness.

Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy, Kt.
Jugonathjee Sunkersett, Esq.
Mahomed Ali Rogu, Esq.
Manockjee Limjee, Esq.
Manockjee Cursetjee, Esq.
Akbar Ali Khan, Esq.
Jeejeebhoy Dadabhoy, Esq.
Cursetjee Muncherjee, Esq.
Rustomjee Jumsetjee, Esq.
Sorabjee Jumsetjee, Esq.
Wittoo Josy, Esq.
Furdonjee Hormusjee, Esq.
Mahomed Ibrahim Mukba, Esq., &c. &c.

Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy and his sons and daughters were introduced to the Archbishop by Sir Roger de Faria, who afterwards presented all the other Gentlemen.

The Archbishop addressed the party, and expressed his great satisfaction on becoming acquainted with the wealthy and respectable Natives of this Island, and in particular with Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy, whose name was known over the whole civilized world for his numerous acts of princely munificence. There was a difference on matters of Religion between him and the Gentlemen whom he addressed, but that did not prevent him from appreciating fully the estimable character of the generous and charitable sons of Asia. He knew that they had received from Her Majesty the Queen of the British Empire, proofs of their Sovereign's esteem for their good qualities as industrious subjects, and as Commercialists, to whose exertion so much was due. He should feel sincere pleasure in proposing their example to the inhabitants of Goa, and if any of them visited the Capital of Portuguese India, they might be assured of his willingness to prove to them how highly he valued the industry and honesty of British Merchants.

Those Native Gentlemen then retired, highly pleased with the kind and cordial manner of the distinguished and dignified Ecclesiastic.

Their presence in the humble dwelling of the R. C. Prelate is a remarkable fact; it proves the advancement of civilization in the nineteenth century, and it demonstrates the freedom enjoyed under the British Government of India. Parsees, Mahomedans and Hindoos of wealth, independence and intelligence, offering freely, and of their own accord, their respects to the Representative of the former Chiefs of Christianity in the East, would form an historical picture which if well executed, cannot but be considered an invaluable bequest to posterity.—Bombay Gentleman's Gazette, Feb. 28.

ON THE STATE OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN RUSSIA.*

(From the Univers.)

The translation and the original text of this volume are both the work of a foreign hand; it will be necessary, therefore, to excuse what may be found imperfect or irregular in the form of the work, in consideration of the extreme importance of the subject of which it treats, and the important information it contains.

There is passing in the present day in Europe a cruel case, and its cruelty appears to us to have few examples, even in the most fearful periods of the world's history. Men proceed in cold blood, in perfect peace, and in spite of a publicity which increases every day, to the methodical destruction of an ancient and illustrious nationality, which ought to be sacred in all Christian eyes, in remembrance of the benefits it has conferred on all Christian nations. After having torn from the Polish nation all its securities, political, civil, and social, the master that Heaven has in its anger given to Poland, labours, with a singular combination of skill, audacity, and success, to extirpate from its bosom the Catholic religion.†

To continue this work, already far advanced, so as to accomplish the ruin of the political independence of that kingdom which the Popes had formerly dignified with the title of the Orthodox, the Emperor of Russia tramples under foot the most solemn treaties, contracted not only with his victim but with his allies, with all Europe, in 1768, in 1773, and in 1815; and, in the triumphant march of his system, he respects neither humanity nor pity, neither justice nor plighted faith, nor the most profound secrets of conscience—nothing, in a word, which ennobles man and purifies him.

It was imagined, that after having crushed the Polish insurrection in 1831, the Czar would have paused respectfully before the rights of religion: it was pleasing to make a distinction, disproved, however, by the history of ten centuries, between the existence of Poland as an independent nation, and the security of Catholicism in the east of Europe. There are found, even in France, a sort of Catholics, of whom the number is happily diminishing daily, who, induced by their political sympathies, have fixed upon Russia their hopes for the religious and social regeneration of the modern world. The Emperor Nicholas appears resolved to destroy, even to

* The considerations that we publish from the introduction to a book entitled "Vicissitudes de l'Eglise Catholique des Deux Rites en Pologne." 2 vols. in 8vo., Debécourt, 64, Rue des Saints Pères, Paris.

† It must not be forgotten that when we speak of Catholics in Russia, the Poles alone are meant. In some of the great towns, indeed, of the Russian empire, are reckoned the Catholic colonies, formed by Italian or French merchants settled there for commercial pursuits. There have been also a small number of conversions in the ranks of the Russian nobility, but the Catholics of these two categories, of whom the number does not certainly amount to 20,000, are insufficient to constitute what is called the Catholic Church in Russia. Truth to speak, there are no Russian Catholics, nor are there in Russia any other Catholics than the Poles, and of them there are at least 5,000,000. It is necessary that this should be known, for the sake of the language employed in many diplomatic communications, which we are bound to correct.

their shadow, these futile distinctions and these culpable hopes.

On the contrary, we have seen cruelly verified the prediction of that great Pontiff, Clement XIII., who, among expressions of the warmest regard for his very dear Polonese Republic,† and while affectionately blessing this orthodox nation, so glorious for its faith,‡ declared, in 1767, that the security and integrity of the Catholic religion were bound up with the maintenance of the political position of Poland§ and not having troops of his own to send to the succour of this free and orthodox republic, exhorted the Emperor of Germany and the Kings of France and Spain at the same time, to defend their Catholic brethren of Poland, who were fighting for the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ.††

It was not then Western Europe only, with its civilisation and its liberty; it was the Church also which found, in the existence of Poland a barrier which can never hereafter be restored against the invasion of barbarism and error. This heroic nation, which had twice saved Christendom, at the expense of its blood—first in the middle ages against the Tartars, and then, in 1685, under the walls of Vienna, against the Turks—this nation has been immolated by the three great Powers of the North, as the consummation of a series of crimes which would have assuredly deserved the first place in the reprobation of mankind, had not God, almost at the same time, permitted the French republic to still more frightful crimes, to attain in some measure a monopoly of the fear and horror of the world.

This truly orthodox and religious nation, the history of whose whole career may be rounded up in this magnificent expression of one of its chiefs—"I love liberty more than all the wealth of the world, and love the Catholic Faith even more than I love liberty,"†† has succumbed; its fall yet unavenged—not even understood. Its liberty was first torn from it, and the struggle now to uproot the Catholic Faith from its bosom, and the success of the experiment would appear to justify it. The violation of the rights of Catholicism, under pretence of protecting schism, was, as may be seen in this work, the first of Russian usurpation. On the assumption that the religious element intervened in the last usurpation, the seal will soon be put to the deepest iniquity of history. Three millions of souls stolen from the Church by one stroke of the pen, in the recent comedy of the return of the united Greeks to the centre of the autocratic system, sufficiently announces to all that continue Catholic in Poland what fate they may expect, and which, according to all human probability, cannot fail to await them. "We have done well," his Imperial Majesty is said to have exclaimed, lately; "We have done well as regards the Uniates, now let us begin with the Latins."

And as a climax to our grief, those things are passing in the midst of an indifference or an ignorance the most profound and general. The half of Europe, that which monarchical diplomacy governs, has not interrupted the servile respect which it professes for Muscovite absolutism with the slightest remonstrance. The other half, governed by democratic passions, is silent also, even if it does not applaud* acts by which the most potent of modern despots testifies to his instinctive sympathy with revolutionary theories, in as far as they are hostile to the Church. Here, as elsewhere appear, the two great anti-social forces—popular tyranny and monarchical tyranny—which, truth to speak, are only two scarcely differing forms of the revolt of human pride against Truth and Justice.

Ah! if of old, in those ages which the precursors and historiographers of these two tyrannies have named dark and barbarous, any potentate, be he who he might, had attacked in such a fashion conscience and the dignity of man, all Christendom would have risen in arms to save their brethren, and chastise the oppressor. In these days we are more prudent and more calm. A society in which "progress" industry and new lights reign, does not disturb itself for such trifles. No doubt, if any political tourist, or any actor of renown, any one of those opera dancers, for instance, who have gone from time to time to parade their attractions on the banks of the Neva, had been seized and cast into an unknown fortress, as the Bishop of Podlachia has lately been, we should have seen the numerous journals which distil among us the waters of the river of Social Progress, excited to emulation, recounting with the liveliest solicitude all the details of such a crime, and leaguely together to place Russia, as they would say, under the ban of civilization. But what now; it is an affair of priests, monks, churches, conscience, prayer, the faith of our ancestors, God! Once again; enlightened Europe is too wise to agitate itself on such subjects. Not one journal in a hundred would trouble its readers with the matter; not one power, not one single power could express either grief or indignation. Is it not necessary that commerce should continue its expeditions tranquilly to the Baltic and the Black Sea? Would it not be a pity if mathematic circles of constitutional kingdoms should experience the void that would be by the absence of the plenipotentiaries in the Liberal journals in France, Belgium, and approved the measures of Nicholas against the Church, his of Russia? And, besides, at what should we be astonished when we see the only one of all the ancient Catholic monarchies which remains entire, governed by the descendants of Rodolph of Hapsburg, saved by Sobieski, and still proud of the title Apostolic—Austria, in a word—send one of its archdukes to adorn by his presence the matrimonial pomp of the most implacable enemy of the Church?

Thus, then, it is needful to know it, if the Church succumbs in Russia and in Poland, her fall will be due still less to the blows of the Muscovite than to the treason of the Catholic West.

For ourselves, who hastily pen these few lines, we have neither the mission, nor the strength, to defend faith and justice, shamefully violated in Poland; but in other times—in former times, our fathers would have been compelled to help them sword in hand, and we should think ourselves fallen from their faith and ancient house if we neglected the least occasion which is offered to our weakness to assist misfortune so august.

The book that is offered to the Catholic public forms part of that already published under the title of "Persecution and Sufferings of the Church in Russia,"† of which it is the preliminary and necessary companion. Both make known to its depths this Russia, the object of adulation to some, of grievance to others, of the instinctive terror of all, and which we hesitate not to proclaim the supreme enemy of all that remains for us to preserve of Christian society. We may see in both these works by what a series of inhumanity, baseness, and perfidy the Russian monarchs, since Peter 7, and the great Catherine so idolised by the philosophical regenerators of the last century, have made the basis of their greatness, the double ruin of Catholicism and Poland. We may shudder at the sight of the dangers which threaten us in the infallible support which this monstrous power is sure to find in the social maladies of our epoch. We may contemplate at our ease in this lamentable history, man despoiled of all dignity and deprived of all conscience, reduced to a mere machine in the hand of the sovereign, proud of his degradation and incapable of conceiving, even in a dream another destiny; so precarious are the positions so dependent are the conditions of force and greatness on the mere caprice and violence of the moment; so completely are the last vestige of any traditional independence, of any hereditary influence, of any resistance, aristocratic or ecclesiastical, swept away, leaving, as in our modern democracies, only individuals and instruments; but with the redoubtable difference that the monarchical unity and perseverance in a the views that promote this unity establish in favour of absolutism. To the advantage of the Russian monarchy, the cunning and proverbial servility of the Byzantines are coupled with the genius of military force and matériel. Judge of the fruits that this combination promises to the liberty of Western Europe, already so cripple in her faded youth.

As to the food of religious, it is necessary to observe that it was a common thing, not only among the Christians, but even amongst the most rational of the heathens, to live on pulse and fish, and to have reading during their meals. The principle recommended to them was, not to live, for the sake of eating, but to eat for the sake of living. It is also the principle laid down by St. Clement of Alexandria, who says that a Christian ought to eat no more than is necessary for the support of his health, and for keeping up the degree of strength requisite for his labour. He says, that he ought to renounce all exquisite dishes; the setting out of great entertainments, and whatever requires the art of cookery. The religious, as well as the most perfect Christians, took in a literal sense, and as a general rule, the saying of St. Paul; "It is good not to eat flesh, and not to drink wine." Refraining from wine was chiefly recommended to women and young people: and such as drank it at all, always mixed a great quantity of water with it. If they ate any animal food, they preferred fish or fowl, to the grosser flesh of four-footed beasts, which they esteemed too succulent and nourishing. But they constantly abstained from blood, and strangled meats, according to the decision of the council of the apostles, and which was observed for several ages. Many, therefore, lived only on white meats, fruit and pulse: nay, some there were who thought certain kinds of pulse, such as peas, beans, and lentils, too nourishing for those who wished entirely to subdue their flesh. Hence they reduced the vegetables they made use of to plain herbs, with bread and water, observing literally this other passage of St. Paul, "He that is weak, let him eat herbs." It is true, that the stemious way of life was not then so extra-irrevocable as it would appear now; though the luxurious liberty, table had reached to an excessive height, it are to be seen in the Greek and Latin author blindness. time, particularly in Athens, it was not that man is to that pitch or extravagance it is at present to virtue; us. The Egyptians and several other nations to follow, observed their superstitious practices. If his natural nence of the Pythagoreans was held miserable, and deem, as it appears from the instance of Epictetus, of Thyana, and from the writings of Porphyry, who lived in the second and third centuries. Horace, as great an epicurean as he was, reckons vegetables and herbs his ordinary food, and promises his friend, whom he invites to supper, nothing more. The Emperor Augustus himself most commonly lived upon brown bread, cheese, figs, dates, raisins, and small fishes. A thousand other similar instances are to be found in ancient history. It was usual to make only one full meal a day, and that in the evening, when they had despatched all their business, and everybody was got home; this was their supper. What they called prandium, dinner, was rather a breakfast than a dinner in our language, since it was only a slight refreshment to support them during the day, and several did not even take that. It was reckoned among the excesses of Vitellius, (one of the greatest gluttons of antiquity) that he often took four meals a day, and never less than three. The primitive Christians lived at least like the wisest and best among the heathens, and consequently used a plain diet, and preferred that food which required no dressing at the fire, to that which did. They made at most only two meals a day; the repast, however simple and plain, was preceded and followed by long prayers, of which we have still a formulary in the prayers of the Catholic Church before and after meals. It was also an usual practice in those times to have reading during meals. Pliny never failed to have it; and Juvenal, inviting one of his friends to sup with him, promises to have Homer and Virgil read. The Christians accordingly had the holy Scriptures read, and grave tunes and spiritual canticles sung, instead of the profane songs and buffooneries, with which the heathens accompanied their entertainments. The first Christians behaved with the same modesty and sobriety in every action of life. They valued only interior greatness and nobility; they esteemed only spiritual riches. They condemned whatever luxury had introduced amidst the prodigious riches of the Roman Empire; such as clothes of too bright a colour, expensive buildings and costly furniture. To give a specimen of their aversion to superfluities, I will here transcribe a description of the furniture which the persecutors found in the room in which St. Domna lived, who was a very rich virgin of Nicomedia, as it is related by contemporary writers: viz. a cross, the Acts of the Apostles, two mats on the floor, an earthen lamp, and a small wooden box, in which she kept the blessed Sacrament to communicate herself.

If the primitive Christians took any diversion, it was merely a diversion; that is to say, a relaxation of the mind, a rest from labour, to satisfy the weakness of nature, which would sink, if the mind always laboured, and if the mind were perpetually fixed on the same object. But they would not that to seek pleasure merely for pleasure, and for no other end, was certainly the contrary to the obligation of renouncing to pleasures, which is the soul of all Christian facts. Bodily labour, or moderate exercise, is a relaxation to the mind; more rest, wholesome food, and comfortable sleep, are sufficient to recruit the body. Sedentary games are never necessary; this we see by the example of the poor and the common people, who continually labour. Let us now observe how many women there are who gain their livelihood by working at their needle; their time is wholly employed in this occupation; they seldom stir out during the week, except on Sundays; these persons however look more cheerful, and enjoy better health than our fine ladies, who seem to begin continual motion, and who are incessantly changing places, from a visit to the theatre to a ball, from the town to the country, from the country to the sea-coast, &c. &c. It is the rich, and such as have no employment, who seek after diversions to kill time, and diminish the irksomeness of their idle lives. The primitive Christians therefore avoided all public shows; those of the theatre, the amphitheatre, and the circus, because these diversions fomented the passions. Moreover they blamed the great expense and idleness encouraged by them; the meeting of both sexes who were there assembled promiscuously together, and disposed to gaze on one another with too much freedom and curiosity. In short, they would admit of nothing unbecoming in their manner of life; nothing vulgar, or unworthy of persons of character; nothing of that silly, useless talk, and that reciprocal commerce of detraction and vanity so common among worldly women; but condemned by St. Paul, when he says that our discourse ought always to be seasoned with the salt of grace. It was with a view to retrench these disorders that silence was so much recommended.

But however severe this mode of life may appear to us, we must not imagine that it was dismal and melancholy. St. Paul did not require an impossibility, when he exhorts the Christians always to rejoice. If they deprive themselves of those lively and irritating pleasures, which are the general pursuit of mankind, they were at least exempt from the vexations, disappointments, and passions which torment others; since they lived free from all anxiety, disengaged from worldly care; averse to all sordid gain, and to whatever could in the least degree be suspected of injustice; and moreover not subject to the restless desire of amassing riches, and to the ambition of raising themselves above others by power and dignities. As they had neither relish for nor attachment to the vain and transitory pleasures of the world, so they were little affected by the loss or privation of them, and even bore with a constant equanimity of soul and modest courage the calamities inseparable from this life. They enjoyed peace of conscience, and the satisfaction arising from good actions; and, above all, they were constantly supported and animated by the hope of another life, which they looked upon as near at hand, and in which they would be superlatively recompensed for the short trials they had undergone. "What greater pleasure," says an Arabian, "than to condemn the world, parade true liberty and purity of conscience, had content with little, and not to fear death, as are the pleasures; these are the shows we Christians."

St. Benedict, therefore, ordered nothing that was unusual: nor St. Scholastica, by adapting his rule to persons of her sex, anything that appeared strange or impracticable, concerning fasting, abstinence, manual labour, silence, reading, prayers before and after meals, distribution of time, recreation, &c. &c. The religious were only distinguished from other Christians by a few things, peculiar to persons living quite sequestered from the world. With regard to the diet, St. Benedict, and the other founders of religious orders, have used, on the contrary, great discretion, by adapting their rule to the climate, the country, and to the different constitutions of those for whom it was intended; some exacting a greater austerity, others allowing greater indulgence. We see that St. Benedict permitted his religious two sorts of dressed meat, with a little wine. The hours of meals and sleep which the religious observe, are the same that every body observed till within the last two centuries. They dined at nine or ten o'clock in the morning, or a little sooner, as the labouring people did a few years ago, and they supped at six in the evening. The regulations of the police, with regard to the curfew and the time which the people were allowed to work, show that they reckoned the night from eight o'clock in the evening till four in the morning, which is the best rule for taking the exact middle of the night, and to lose as little as possible of the day.

It is a great error to imagine that a nun in her convent leads an inactive life, and that she is always either upon her knees in the chapel, or absorbed in deep contemplation in her cell. This is certainly not the case; and nuns have been heard to say, that they had more time to pray when they lived in the world than since they had quitted it. The reason is, that in a convent no one is allowed to follow her private devotion and propensity; a nun does not live for herself alone but for the mutual advantage and comfort of her sisters. Among the members of the same community there is a continual interchange of duties and services, with which every one is obliged to comply: the rule must be equally obeyed by all, whether it calls them to recreate themselves, or commands them to retire to their cells, or to their work. All the hours of the day are distributed with such prudence, that they are never permitted to be taken up too long with the same occupation, which might fatigue the head, or weaken the body; there is a time appointed for reciting the divine office, for mental prayer, reading, manual labour, either in common or in private; for walking or recreation; in short, for everything, according to the different offices in the community which each nun has to discharge; so that the religious have not a moment left to uncertainty or idleness; and under the appearance of a dull and tiresome uniformity, there is a constant and pleasing variety, the nuns passing port continually from one occupation to another; and in the society though they rise early in the morning, they contemplate that the day is too short, that the night tory, man dem too soon to take their rest; and they all conscience their straw bed, or hard mattress, a hand of the and more refreshing sleep than others do and incapable of down. By these wise regulations another distress in prayer, work, &c. &c. is avoided; so dependent time for bodily exercise and for repose reatness on y granted, but even strictly enjoined; the ~~man~~ is preserved; and with health, evenness of temper, liberty of mind, serenity of conscience, and a constant cheerfulness.

We now come to the question of the vows taken by the inmates of our convents. Their authority is not contemptible. We read in holy writ that Jacob made a vow to offer unto God the tithe of all the things which were to be given to him, and that God was pleased with the offering. (Gen. xxviii. 22; xxxi. 13.) In the books of Numbers (vi.) and Leviticus (xxvii.) there are several laws concerning the different vows which might be made, and the manner of accomplishing them. David, that great prophet, according to God's own heart, made a vow to build a temple to the Lord, and the Lord promised him that his son should accomplish it. (1 Kings vii. 13.) The chiefs among the Israelites bound themselves by a vow, to contribute to the expenses of the building, and they accomplished their vow. (1 Chron. xxix. 6.) Samuel, Sampson, and John he Baptist, were consecrated to God by vow; and the obligation of keeping the vows made to God is clearly established, Deut. xxiii. 21, Job xxii. 27, Psalms lxx. 13, Eccles. v. 3, &c. &c. Many even of our Protestant commentators, in their notes on Leviticus and Numbers, acknowledge the sanctity of the vows mentioned in these two books, and the obligation of keeping them. Now, as the God of the Old Testament is no other than the God of the New, and since he vouchsafed to accept the vows of men under the law of nature, and under the Mosaic dispensation, have not Catholics a solid reason to relieve that he will equally be pleased with them under the law of grace?

Accordingly, after the apostles in the council of Jerusalem had decided the ceremonies of the Mosaic law to be no longer obligatory, St. Paul made a vow and accomplished it. (Acts of the Apostles, xv., xviii. 18, xxi. 16.) The same apostle, in his first epistle to Timothy, speaking of the young widows, who "having grown wan in Christ, will marry," says, "that they have damnation, because they have made void their first faith." (1 Tim. v. 11, 12.) And this appears to have been the unanimous opinion of all the holy personages who have distinguished themselves, both by their learning and their virtue, from the time of the apostles down to the Reformation of Luther. We can name St. Ignatius, disciple of St. John the Evangelist (Ep. ad Smyrn. xiii.), Tertullian (De Veland. Virg.), St. Cyprian (Epistle iv.); then the Basils, Ambroses, Hilaries, Gregories, Cyrils, Chrysostoms, Jeromes, Austins, Paulinuses, &c. Even Protestant divines own them to have been warm advocates of religious vows. However, without taking advantage of the authority of the Holy Scriptures, and the practice of the whole Christian world, during fifteen centuries, let us examine the thing with the light of reason alone, and see if an irrevocable engagement be truly destructive of our liberty, and if those who are willing to contract it are to be accused of inexcusable temerity and blindness. Melancholy experience teaches us, that man is born with more propensity to vice than to virtue; therefore to leave him at full liberty to follow, without the least control, the bent of his natural inclinations, would make him most miserable, and render him at the same time the scourge of his fellow-creatures. An evident proof of this truth is, that from the beginning of the world, men have agreed, with one accord, to acknowledge an authority, to submit to laws, to have restraints laid upon their will and actions; in short, to sacrifice a part of their natural independence and liberty, in order to enjoy the security and comforts to be found only in civil society. Nay, even in the present state of things, look around you: who are those who truly taste the sweets of life? Is it the rich man, who finds in his treasures the means to indulge at all times the inconstancy of his desires? Is it the infidel, who having obliterated from his heart the principles of religion and virtue, knows no other morality than the gratification of his unruly passions? Ah! their impatience of contradiction, restlessness of temper, fondness of change, incessant craving after new enjoyments, evidently betray that they are consuming themselves in fruitless attempts, and ineffectual seekings after happiness, which constantly flies away from them at the very moment they flatter themselves they have attained it. If happiness is to be found in this world, the man who enjoys it in its full extent, is certainly the man whose delicacy of conscience does not allow him to transgress in the least the salutary restraints which religion and the laws of his country impose upon him. It is the man, who, by the regular and uniform plan of life which he has voluntarily adopted, has precluded himself, as it were, from the possibility of a change, and thus shut up all the avenues of his heart against the fickleness of vain desires, and the fantastic projects of a heated imagination. In fine, it is the man, who, according to the Scripture phrase, has borne the yoke from his youth.

Under our free government, are we not ourselves living in perpetual restraint? Is not our liberty curtailed and limited by many prohibitions and laws? Are not our soldiers bound by an irrevocable engagement as soon as they are enlisted; by which single act,—almost always done from want, or in a frolic, or in a state of intoxication,—are they not subject to a discipline a thousand times more severe than that of the most rigid religious orders? Are they not, in truth, merely passive instruments in the hands of their commanding officers? Is not their diet, their sleep, their dress, even their motion, under continual restrictions? Willing, or unwilling, are they not doomed to go wherever they are sent, even to the extremities of the world, and to the most unwholesome climates, to fight the battles of their country, with scarcely a distant hope of seeing their friends again in their native land? Is not marriage among us subject to restrictive laws? When contracted as the law directs, is it not indissoluble? And is not the unfortunate young person who has been sacrificed to the avarice and ambition of her unnatural parents, or who has been the melancholy victim of her own blindness, condemned to pass her days beneath the yoke which she can never more shake off? To bring the question nearer home,—by the sole fact of our being born in England, are we not deprived of what appears to be an essential part of liberty; the liberty of disposing ourselves as we think best, and of choosing the climate, and the form of government, which we judge to be the most conducive to our happiness? From this single fact, in which we never concurred in the beginning, nor which we ever subsequently approved of, have we not contracted with our native country an engagement so irrevocable, that it can never be dissolved by any act of our own?

FREE CHURCH BIGOTRY.—Mr Stott stated yesterday in the town Council, that on Thursday last, he heard the Rev. Dr Macdonald of Ferintosh, who was preaching in Edinburgh, use the following language in his sermon. "The Established Church of Scotland is a Christ-denying, God-dishonouring, and soul-destroying Church." The awful state of mind which could give birth to this sentiment, must make its unhappy possessor an object of sincere pity to all right-thinking persons.—Post.

THE PUSEYITES, THE ANGLICANS, &c.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON AND THE LAY PROTEST.—The Lay Protest to the Chancellor and heads of houses of the University of Oxford having been forwarded last Thursday to the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, several weeks after it had appeared in the Morning Herald, and having been reprinted last Saturday in that paper with the names of about 600 of the 10,000 memorialists, our readers will not be surprised that the following characteristic reply of his Grace the Chancellor should appear in the first instance in the public prints;—"London, Dec. 18, 1843. —Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington presents his compliments to Lord Ashley, Sir John Easthope, Mr. Gribble, of Stockwell; Mr. Fry, of Ham; Mr. Smith, of Sydney College Cambridge; Mr. Parrott, town-clerk of Macclesfield; Dr. Jephson, of Leamington; the twelve capital burgesses of Sheffield; Mr. Long Goe, of Queen's College Cambridge; and other lay members of the Church of England and Ireland. He has received their address, in which they represent themselves 'to be much grieved by the tendency of certain publications, sent forth by some members of the University, to excite dissatisfaction with the principles of the reformed Church, as recorded in the Book of Common Prayer, and especially in the thirty-nine articles.' * * * Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington is a civil magistrate, bears not the sword in vain, as most people know, and as his duty requires (Art. xxxvii.), but has not received the power of the keys, except of the Cinque Ports. He is one of the few men of the present day who do not meddle with what does not belong to them. He has not read all the Oxford Tracts, as he supposes the memorialists have, but has read the thirty-nine articles, and the declaration prefixed to them which he fears the memorialists have not done, or they would not have been ignorant that if differences arise about the articles the said differences are to be settled by the bishops and clergy in convocation, and not by Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, who has never taken Father Mathew's Popish pledge; and will never impose a new Protestant one."—Tablet, Dec. 30, 1843.

PUSEYISM IN AMERICA.—"SAM SLICK" IN THE Boston Pilot, of Dec. 2.—The Episcopalian Church of this town (Hagerstown, U.S.A.) has been lately repaired and enlarged, and presents a handsome appearance. But there is nothing so striking to the Catholic as an elegant brazen Cross immediately over the pulpit; and the Tapers which are lighted during service, and ranged on the table at which the clergyman officiates. At one time the idea of this issue was looked upon as heresy, and met with much opposition on the part of the congregation; but now the untiring efforts of the rev. preacher to substantiate his innovations met with encouragement. On Sunday se'nnight, he preached a regular Puseyite semi-Catholic sermon, proving beyond doubt the authenticity of Catholic ceremonies and recommending their observance.—Ibid.

PUSEYISM AT TYNEMOUTH.—M. Popplewell, Esq. has, in consequence of the introduction of Puseyite practices into the service of the parochial church at Tynemouth, addressed a printed handbill to the parishioners announcing that 4001 has been already subscribed towards the erection of a church in the parish, where the simple and pure forms of the Established Church may be handed down to posterity. A handbill in defence of the practices complained of has also been issued.—Tyne Mercury.

WHAT HAS THE CHURCH ("OF ENGLAND") TO FEAR?—In learning, in philosophy, in faith, hope, and charity, they ("the Romanists") abound; they may be pitted for their errors, but they must be loved for their virtues. If the strength of our Church lies in the many ordinary minds that we bring to the foot of the Cross, the strength of the Church of Rome lies in the mighty minds which she first enslaves to her system and than supports and sustains. Now, it is to this class of mind, the aspirations of which the high-and-dry would mock, and the low evangelical is unable even to imagine, that Romanism is holding out the lure.—Let it be clearly understood what our present danger is. It is not that the mass of people will become Papists, for, alas! they are more likely, through High-and-Dry coldness and the unchristian violence of Evangelicals, to become infidels, but that the Roman party may be rendered fearfully powerful by the accession of all that is high in intellect and devoted in piety in Young England. The Romanists have the hearts of the lower orders in Ireland, and if they gain the intellect of England so far as it is earnestly given to religion, our rulers, ecclesiastical and civil, will have more to do than they wot of, and will rue the day when, instigated by a fierce and foolish faction, or to save themselves trouble, they urge those to go over to Rome whom they ought, at almost any sacrifice, to retain in the Church of England.—Ridley, in the Times.

SWINDLING EXTRAORDINARY.—The Morning Herald, the only London morning paper, which supports the present Government, has the audacity to express joy, not only that Dr. Jeune is to be created a Bishop, and Mr. Filleul, Dean, of Jersey, but that the English people are to be swindled out of eighteen hundred pounds per annum, to support Dr. Jeune's dignity!! A more wicked, infamous job than this was never contemplated. Surely the Ecclesiastical Commissioners who have such large funds to dispose of, might find amidst the horrible destitution of London, objects infinitely more in need of assistance than an already frightfully overpaid Jersey parson! And this Tory Herald, the advocate of the protective Conservative Government, is enchanted to hear that such a scandalous swindle is about to be perpetrated! Ah! John Bull—John Bull, what a patient ass you are! Not only do the larger beasts of prey fatten upon your devoted carcass, but the meanest vermin seem entitled to suck your blood with impunity! But we do hope there is sufficient spirit in the House of Commons to prevent this scandalous misappropriation of the property of the English people. If it be absolutely necessary to the spread of Christianity in the Channel Islands, that they should be Bishopped, let the Society for propagating the Gospel amongst the Heathen be applied to. Their funds are derived from voluntary sources, but in the name of decency do not compel the English farmer to cultivate the clods of Jersey! They have plenty of poor soils of their own to attend to.—Jersey Gazette.

MISCELLANEA.

DEPTFORD MISSION.—RESTITUTION MONEY.—The following letter addressed by the Rev. A. Nolan, P.P. of Dunkerrin, Moneygall, Ireland, to the Rev. W. Marshall, of Deptford, shows the value of confession as a means of grace:—"Dunkerrin, Moneygall, Dec. 5, 1843.—Rev. and dear Sir:—I have received your letter of the 2d October only on this day. The delay, I apprehend, arose from the circumstance of directing it to Dunkerrin, which is not a post town. On looking to the envelope I find it has the Dublin post-office mark of the 3d December. On receipt of your communication I waited on Mr. Delahunty, who resides four miles from my house, gave him the two pounds, and herewith transmit his receipt. He is a Protestant, and, as you must be aware that the landlord and Irish press represented the Irish priesthood as having preached simultaneously the extermination of all classes of Protestants, I was enabled to turn the delivery of the restitution money to very good account, remarking, with the kindest expression of good humour, that I trusted that such instances as this would show that the priests of the Catholic Church, so far from doing or intending any harm to their dissenting brethren, were labouring indefatigably in giving value to their property, and affording security to their lives. The matter told with singular effect. I was also enabled to add the assurance that, in January, 1842, I got intimation of three armed men who were to lie in wait on the next night for the purpose of murdering an obnoxious land-agent and an ultra Orangeman. My informant told me that nothing but my appearance on the spot could prevent the revolting crime, and although confined to my room at the time with a serious affection of my lungs and chest, yet, to save the life of a fellow-creature, Orange though he was, and a declared and avowed personal enemy, I exposed my own and had fortunately saved his. In a few days I had the averted danger communicated to him through one of his friends, and he is now for his security residing in another part of the country. And this is only one of the many instances of the lives of Protestants saved by Catholic priests; and still we are the object of their calumny and malignity every other day. In handing the money to Delahunty my only remark was, "This money got to hand you: it is your property, and I have only to request that you will not ask any further questions." With the highest sentiments of respect, I have the honour to be, dear and rev. sir, your very obedient servant, A. NOLAN, P.P.—Rev. W. Marshall, &c., Deptford. The following receipt was enclosed:—1843, Dec. 5. I acknowledge to have received 2l. from the Rev. Mr. Nolan as restitution money.—JAMES DELAHUNTY.

JERSEY.—Eighteen persons, converts from various negations of belief, were received yesterday morning into the Catholic Church, by the Rev. Mr. Cunningham. The church was crowded. —Jersey Gazette, Dec. 25.

FANATICISM AND MANSLAUGHTER.—On Thursday, the 23d ult., a frightful occurrence took place at Crewe, in Cheshire, which has caused the liveliest emotions of pity, anger, and surprise throughout the whole of that now populous neighbourhood. It is well known that the Grand Junction

Railway Company have erected immense works at Crewe, and have in their employment between 400 and 500 workmen. Amongst these are men of all shades of religious opinions, and some of them are Mormonites, better known as "latter-day saints." The priest of the order is a blacksmith, of the name of Cartwright, and among the devotees is a fanatic named Pugmire, also a smith, or engineer. The latter was married to a respectable woman, about 30 years of age, who had borne him three children, and was within three months of her next confinement. She had steadily refused to adopt the fanatical opinions of her husband, and much altercation had ensued in consequence. Worn out, however, with his repeated solicitations, and his continued declarations that unless she submitted to be baptized into the order she would be eternally lost, she declared her intentions to one of her neighbours to obey her husband's wishes, being satisfied, as she said, that unless she did so "she should never have any more peace with him." On Thursday, the 23d ult., at eight o'clock at night, the poor worn out creature was taken by her husband and the blacksmith priest down to the river below the works, was denuded of all her clothing, except a small flannel cinglet and, notwithstanding her interesting situation, these wretched fanatics, after muttering some incantations, plunged her into the stream! The night was dreadfully cold and dark, and, in consequence of the late heavy rains, the river was running at a great rate, and was much higher than ordinary. The priest, having hold of her naked arm, unfortunately let go his grasp, and the current, running like a mill-race, immediately carried her away, and, it being pitch dark, she was instantly overwhelmed by the boiling flood and drowned. The husband walked home with the greatest deliberation and non-chalance, and told his neighbours what had occurred; and after seating himself in a chair, rolled himself in a flannel, and declared his conviction "that it was the will of God that she should be drowned," adding "that it was the weakness of her faith that caused it, but that he was now satisfied that she was in glory."

Captain Winby, of the Crewe station, and other parties, hearing of the said occurrence, immediately rushed down to the river, and after some time discovered the body of the unfortunate woman in a bend of the river, about 200 yards distant from the spot where she was immersed but life was extinct.—Britannia, Dec. 9.

THE REV. MR BRIDGMAN AND HIS SON'S BODY STEALERS.—On Thursday the grand jury at the Central Criminal Court returned a true bill against Isaac Bridgman, and George White Bridgman, for felony. The prisoners stand charged with breaking open the tomb of the late Thomas Ghorst Sawney, situated in the burying ground of a chapel in Walworth, of which chapel the defendant Isaac Bridgman is the minister, and stealing therefrom the coffin and body of the said Thomas Ghorst Sawney. In returning the bill, the foreman of the grand jury stated to the Court, that the grand jury considered it as their duty to report that Mr. Sawney, the son of the deceased, and the prosecutor in this case, had stated to them that the counsel had offered to have restored to him the skeleton of his father, if he would withdraw the prosecution.—Standard.

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER'S DAY.—The annual celebration of the Feast of the great St. Francis Xavier, of the Society of Jesus, Apostle of the Indies, and Special Patron of the Association for the Propagation of the Faith, being transferred from the 3d which was the first Sunday in Advent, was observed with marked devotion in the Church of St. Francis, in Gardiner-street, on Monday last. The high priest was the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe, Coadjutor, Bishop of Bengal, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Kavanagh and the Rev. Charles Young as deacons, and the Rev. Mr. Quinn as master of the ceremonies. After the first Gospel, the Rev. Mr. St. Ledger delivered a powerful and beautiful panegyric on the great Apostle of modern times.—Tablet, 9 Dec., 1843.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY.—Thursday, the 30th ult., being the feast of St. Andrew the Apostle, was observed with the usual devotion in the Church of St. Andrew, Westland-row. This being the 34th anniversary of the consecration of the venerable Archbishop of Dublin, as usual, his attendance in this parish, of which his Grace was so many years the ornament and administrator, was anxiously expected. Indisposition of some days' standing, however, confined him to his room. He is however, now perfectly convalescent. The Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe presided, and the Rev. W. Mulhall preached an eloquent and affecting sermon on the Life and Virtues of St. Andrew.—Ibid.

CATHOLIC MISSIONARY COLLEGE OF ALL HALLOWS, DRUMCONRA, DUBLIN.—The Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe visited this establishment on the 28th and 29th ult., and celebrated Mass in the little chapel attached to the college on the morning of the 29th. Having administered the Holy Communion to ecclesiastical students, his lordship delivered a moving and pious exhortation to these young aspirants to the Apostleship of foreign countries; two of whom, Mr. J. Martin and Mr. McCarthy, left on Monday for the Cape of Good Hope, where they wait the pleasure of the V. A. the Right Rev. Dr. Griffiths. Two are about to leave for Calcutta, and two are leaving for the College of Gap, in France—previously to their departure for the vicariate of Agra—under the Right Rev. Dr. Borghi. There are forty students preparing for other dioceses. Rev. J. Hand has already received nearly 4,000*l.* for this good work.—Ibid.

RESTITUTION THROUGH CONFESSION.—John Reynolds, Esq., 16, D'Olier-street, acknowledges to have received 15*l.* restitution money, per the Rev. J. Smith, St. Michael and St. John's Chapel.—Mr. Patrick Sheehy, of Ballycannon, near Croagh, county Limerick, thankfully acknowledges the receipt of 8*l.* 10*s.*, restitution money, per the Rev. J. Mahon, R.C.C.—Freeman.

THE RESTORED CONVENTS IN ARGOVIA.—The letters we received from Lucerne inform us that the canton of Argovia, considering itself the conqueror in the question of the convents, has desired, as its deputy to the Diet undertook for it, to re-establish four convents for women, but on the following conditions:—The religious expelled from these convents shall be held bound to re-enter them, so soon as the architects and masons shall be enabled to repair, as far as they can be repaired, the dilapidations effected by the Government agents, charged with the execution of the decree of expulsion. Those who shall refuse to enter shall be deprived of the miserable pension that has been allowed them. The houses thus restored shall be placed, as well as their property, moveable and fixture, under the administration of the State, which shall fix the quota of expense, the support and clothing of the religious, and the costs of worship. Further, a sum shall be fixed on which shall be the amount to be contributed by each of these houses towards the pensions granted by the Government to the religious, whose monasteries have been suppressed. The houses thus restored shall not enjoy the right of receiving novices. Such, then, is the final result of the pretended agreement, which served as a basis to the conclusion of the Diet on the 31st August. The sequestration of the property of these nunneries is maintained under form of a usurped administration; their poverty does not protect them from a forced contribution towards pensions which ought to be paid by the State, since it alone profits by the value of the confiscated property of the monasteries of men, and the suppression of the convents is maintained by forbidding the reception of novices; and it is believed that the Catholics, if they could agree to the suppression of the convents of monks, may be satisfied by the restoration of four nunneries, on conditions in which oppression and bad faith strive for the mastery. It would seem that the Argovian Government tried to exasperate to the last degree its Catholic population, in order to provoke, on their part, an outbreak which would furnish it with an occasion to crush them by the force, not of its own arms, but of those of its friends and accomplices of Berne; but of this they appear sufficiently warned. All their hopes rest on the Catholic conference of Lucerne, whence, God aiding, they may look for deliverance. The Holy Father has conferred the Cross of the Order of St. Gregory the Great on Dr. Sherer, whose writings are the unwearied defenders of the Catholic cause in Switzerland. This well-merited favour is, at the same time a strong pledge of the interest which the Common Father of the Faithful feels in the holy cause of which the new knight is so zealous, valiant, and devoted a champion. In this regard the decoration which has been remitted to the Doctor by Mgr. the Nuncio, was hailed with the universal applause of all loyal and sincere Catholics.—Tablet, Dec. 9, 1843.

A number of Dissenting ministers have issued an address to the Dissenting ministers and Churches in London, setting forth that they have witnessed with indignation the recent attempt made by her Majesty's Government to undermine their liberties; and have seen with heartfelt satisfaction the energetic efforts of the great dissenting community, in defence of their claims; and that from signs which the dullest cannot fail to understand "it is clear that some great design against the safety and honour of the Nonconformists" is in the wind; with much more of the same sort; wherefore they pray the "Ministers and Churches" aforesaid to convene as soon as possible, a Conference of dissenting ministers and others from all parts of the country, for the purpose of promoting the dissolution of the Union between the Church and State.—Felix Farley's Bristol Journal.

MAY I SEPARATE FROM THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?

OR,

Strictures on a pamphlet entitled—"Can I continue a Member of the Church of England?"

By REV. CHARLES J. QUARTLEY, A. M. Calcutta, 1844.

This pamphlet, as its title implies, is intended as an answer to the little tract by a seceding member of the Church of England, lately reviewed in this journal. The lucubration now under notice is, in one respect, more satisfactory than that to which it is a reply. The pamphlet is dated, the writer tells us his name and office, and attempts to substitute something positive for the negative creed of his reforming adversary. We are far, however, from thinking that the reply is satisfactory. It is full of inconsistency, it cannot and ought not to silence the honest seceder if he has a spark of genuine zeal in his nature, or sincerity in his belief. It is like the Church of England: a pompous, bloated, crouching, halting thing, pure and corrupt, fallible and infallible, Calvinistic, Puseyistic, in every sense elastic.

Were we to judge of the Rev. Mr. Quartley from his words, we should incline to think that he will never lose a church living on account of qualms of conscience. Two sentences from his pamphlet will show how comfortable he could contrive to make himself in the Church of England, let her discipline be as corrupt, and her doctrines as contradictory and false as you please. P. 33. he writes,—"We want a steadfast deliberate attachment to truth as it is delivered in the Bible, not as it is doled out to us by any parties, and sects and systems. The doctrines and the prescribed discipline of the Church of England supply this want, &c." How is this we should like to know. Is the Church of England neither a party, nor a sect, nor a system?

What is the Church of England? Is it neither a party, nor a sect, nor a system, because it embraces within its articles of comprehension all parties, all sects, and all systems? And is the truth, as developed in the Bible and as taught by the Church of England, a patchwork of the contradictory doctrines of parties, sects and systems? Oh! not that exactly, but be a Church of England-man and you can believe what you please, and keep what you have. In p. 14 Mr. Quartley writes—"The Church of England has never made false symbols of faith: she has never imposed sinful terms of communion;—she has never compelled her members to choose the sad alternative between unfaithfulness to their God, and their loss of Church privileges; and, therefore, there is no scriptural authority for leaving her pale."

What a benevolent man Mr. Quartley must be, or how very forgetful! Were there no penal laws ever in force in England and Ireland requiring attendance contrary to the dictates of conscience at the State Church, under penalties, pains and privations? Was there never any such thing as a Test Act? Why were the Catholics and Puritans persecuted to death in the reign of Elizabeth and Charles the 1st? The 39 articles are Calvinistic and Puseyistic, and yet the Church of England never made a false symbol of Faith. All the clergy are made to swear to the truth of this contradictory creed, under penalties and privations, and yet the Church of England has never compelled her members to choose the sad alternative between unfaithfulness to their God and their loss of Church privileges. Is it not an acknowledged and well known fact that many of those who thus swear, do not believe the articles in their literal and grammatical sense?

Forsooth, they are articles of comprehension.

It is Mr. Quartley's deliberate opinion that we are not authorized to forsake the communion of any Church in which we may have been born, no matter how corrupt she may be in discipline and doctrine, provided we are not denied, what he calls, Church privileges, for adhering to the peculiarities of our private judgments. After this he can well afford to admit all the charges brought against the Church of England, and yet deny that any one is bound or even authorized to leave her communion. It is hard to see what he intends to prove, unless it be, that it is wrong, under any circumstances, to pass from one reformed congregation to another. He seems to admit that they are all branches of the Catholic Church, and the arguments by which he dissuades members of the state Church from becoming Dissenters, would also prevent Dissenters from entering the Church of England.

A clear sighted, disinterested, consistent Church of England-man could hardly escape becoming a Catholic from an attentive consideration of Mr. Quartley's pamphlet. Without intending it, he gives a death-blow to private judgment and all the fundamental principles of the Protestant reformation.

He not only admits but undertakes to prove, that there is not in the Bible a single word to authorize separation from any Church on account of corruption of doctrine or discipline, while he does not deny, because he could not, that the old Church founded by Christ and his Apostles, obtained from Christ the power of commanding obedience to her teaching, under the penalty of excommunication. The old Church is styled in scripture the pillar and the ground of truth; whoever will not hear her, should be regarded as the heathen and the publican, while there is not a single word to authorize separation from her, on account of corruption of doctrine or discipline; and what then becomes of the mushroom churches of the reformation and the principles of private judgment, separation, and protest? Where is the room for a protesting church and a negative creed like that of the Church of England?

Mr. Quartley puts the question confidently, (p. 10.) "Can any pretend to say that separation from any church, on account of corruption of doctrine or discipline, is authorized in the Word of God?" And again, (p. 11.) he says, "We find directions 'to watch,'

'to take heed,' 'to remember the first love,' 'to do the first work,' 'to be zealous,' 'to repent,' but separation is not so much as hinted at in the word of God."

We shall close our observations for the present on Mr. Quartley's pamphlet, with the following extract, in defence of the principles of the reformation:—

"But the thought may occur to the minds of some, if this be so, how can our own separation from the Church of Rome be justified? From this question we do not shrink; neither does the full consideration of its importance demand a retraction of one position already advanced. Separation from Rome was not only allowable but was necessary, because Rome not merely held and taught false doctrine, but she imposed it upon her members; she not only corrupted the faith, but she demanded the confession of a false faith." We invite our Protestant friends to reflect well on this. If our Church, the Church of all Christendom at the time of the reformation, not only corrupted the faith, but demanded the confession of a false faith, then our Saviour must have foreseen this event, and of course, he never would have said (Matthew. 18. 17,) "Tell the Church, and if he will not hear the Church, let him be to thee as the heathen and the publican." Neither would St. Paul have deceived us, (1 Tim. 3, 15) by calling a Church which demanded the confession of a false faith "the pillar and the ground of truth."

In our next we propose to consider Mr. Quartley's apology for the book of Common Prayer.

SINGAPORE MISSION.

In publishing the following letter, we beg to solicit the attention of our readers, and of the liberal public of Calcutta, to the strong claims which in their present destitution the Catholics of Singapore have on the charity of their brethren in Bengal.

Subscriptions for the completion of the new Church at Singapore will be received by Messrs. John Lackersteen and Brothers, and Messrs. P. S. D'Rozario and Co., also by the Archbishop and the Clergy.

We have been requested to mention that on Easter Sunday morning Collections will be made for the above purpose in all the Catholic Churches of Calcutta.

TO HIS GRACE THE MOST REV. DR. J. P. CAREW, ARCHBISHOP OF EDESSA AND VICAR APOSTOLIC OF BENGAL,

MY LORD,—Our Venerated Bishop and Vicar Apostolic, the Right Rev. Dr. H. Courvez, having lately left the mission and retired to France, the care of the Catholic community of Singapore has been committed ted to me by the Very Rev. J. B. Boucho, our Pro-Vicar Apostolic.

I, then, through his permission, beg to address to your Grace the following appeal in behalf of the new Church we are building here, of which your Grace has undoubtedly heard something.

When we first established our Mission at Singapore, in 1832, we built a small Chapel, which was something for that time; but which could not answer long as a fit place of Catholic worship in an increasing settlement like this: for we are happily in a time where Catholicism does not remain behind other things in growth.

We, then, resolved, about the end of 1840, to erect a more respectable Church, and to convert the present Chapel into a School. For two years and a half, we endeavoured to obtain sufficient funds, to complete our intended building, following the advice our Divine Saviour gave, when he said: "Which of you having a mind to build a tower, doth not first sit down and reckon the charges that are necessary, whether he have wherewithal to finish it; lest after he hath laid the foundation and is not able to finish it, all that see it begin to mock him, saying: this man began to build and was not able to finish." (St. Luke xiv. 28.)

Our appeal was heard and liberally supported by many, especially by those who knew how much we were in want of the intended sacred edifice.

Through God's blessing, we succeeded beyond our expectations—a Plan for a respectable Church was then drawn up; a suitable site for its building was granted by the Government, with however the condition that it should be erected according to the Plan which had been approved and which required at least Spanish Dollars 10,000 for its execution.

All being ready, Divine Providence, through some hidden design, sent us a great trial; we lost, as it is well known, by the unexpected failure of a house of Agency here, more than the third of the funds we had collected with the greatest difficulty—we were, indeed, a little discouraged; yet this did not prevent our zealous Bishop, who had so much at heart this sacred undertaking, to laying the corner-stone in June last, hoping that God would not let it remain unfinished: may, then, the Almighty hearken to the prayers and vows of the good and ever venerated Bishop!

Now, my Lord, is the very time we look for the expected assistance: the walls are not yet completed and unfortunately our funds are exhausted.

Here and in some other places, where we have been liberally assisted in our former appeal, we have very little to expect, many being unwilling to give twice for the same purpose. One hope in our distress, is left to us; it is to recur to your Grace's charity and liberality—a few words in behalf of our undertaking will have a good effect on your generous flock—we had not yet made a public appeal to your charity, partly on account of the large expenses incurred by your Grace's flock to support your Grace's liberal and useful institutions:—but now we cannot help recurring to you, being persuaded that you will not suffer a Catholic Church to remain unfinished; especially in a place where it is surrounded by fine and rich schismatic, heretic and pagan temples.

Your Grace is aware that "the Association of the Propagation of the Faith" does not afford assistance for private undertakings, as the building of a Church; and the funds it furnished to the whole of our mission, viz. Penang, Singapore, Malacca, Merguy, Nicobar Islands, &c. &c. &c. are scarcely sufficient in three years to make up the sum we are to spend for the building of our Church here.

Further, the Catholic Community at Singapore is generally poor, being composed of a few Europeans, of a rather large number of country born, of many Chinese converts and of about 100 Malabar Christians—we build not only for the present generation; but also for the future.

Singapore, my Lord, should not be an indifferent place to our brethren of Calcutta; for when the steam communication is well established between the Straits and Calcutta, she will become as a suburb to the City of Palaces; and when they may occasionally visit us, they will be found to have given their mite towards the building of one of the finest churches throughout India.

Finally, it will be proper to inform your Grace that we are deficient at least of 8,000 Co.'s Rupees to enable us to complete our undertaking: therefore may we hope for a corresponding liberality.

Begging your Grace's blessing, I remain, your Grace's most obedient and humble servant,

J. M. BAUKEL, M. A.

Singapore, 17th Feb. 1844.

PROTESTANT TESTIMONY.

It will be gratifying to the Catholic Community to read the following letter, which comes from a Protestant gentleman who deservedly holds a high and important post under Government, one to whom the Catholics owe a great debt of gratitude for his enlightened and benevolent attention to their clergy and brethren in his vicinity.

TO HIS GRACE THE MOST REV. ARCHBISHOP AND VICAR APOSTOLIC OF BENGAL, DR.
CAREW.

MY LORD,—I had the honor of receiving through Mr. — the gratifying message with which your Grace had been pleased to notice my slight endeavours to assist the Missionaries of —, with whom I have been fortunate enough to form friendship, and whose high qualities have always commanded my respect and esteem. The following is an extract of a letter received from a friend of mine Mr. —, of —, and I have much pleasure in hoping that the Rev. Mr. — will meet during his stay at that place, the same cordiality of reception and the same attention which he would have experienced had he remained here.—“I shall have much pleasure in receiving your friend the Revd. —, and you may rely upon my showing him every attention in my power. I have already informed Mr. — of the Revd. Gentleman's proposed visit, and he has promised to make it known far and near; Mr. — will likewise write by today's dak to his Catholic friends at Chittagong to prepare them likewise. I am obliged to start for the interior of the District to-morrow, and shall not return before the 4th or 5th March, but should I be so unfortunate as not to be at home when your friend arrives, I hope you will tell him that my house is perfectly at his service, or, if this will not suit him, — will be happy to shew him every civility and so will —.”

I beg to assure your Grace that it always will afford me the highest satisfaction when opportunities may occur of showing my respect for the Missionaries of your Church, and my sense of the benefits they are conferring on the people of this country to serve them to the best of my power.—Trusting always to continue in your Grace's favorable remembrance, with the highest respect, I have the honor to remain your Grace's most obedient and faithful Servant, —

BURRISAU.

A letter from Burrisaul, dated 7th instant, mentions that the Rev. Mr. Zubiburn, the Pastor of Sibpore, had baptized six Mahomedans on the 3rd of this month, and on the following day the Christians of Maribangah rejoicing in consequence of their conversion. The Rev. gentleman previous to his departure from that place gave catechetical lessons besides baptised two infants. Undersigned that the Christians in Boreah had received religious instruction he was quite disappointed, but he was quite disappointed in some of them much attached to Mussulman ceremonies; the Rev. gentleman however, entertains hopes that they will be very good Catholics in time. He gave the Christians seven pictures of the Blessed Virgin, which were received by them with joy. The indefatigable Mr. Zubiburn returned to Burrisaul on the 7th and was preparing to proceed to Nacally on the 10th instant.

LETTER NO. X.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS
PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—Though some of you may deem that I have already said enough upon the subject of unity and its opposite quality, still, as it may be reckoned a fundamental point in religion, you must kindly put up with me if I prolong the momentous matter, even should I verge upon prolixity; the maxim of our blessed Saviour that, “a house or a kingdom divided against itself shall not stand,” unquestionably involves religious unity or division; the existence of the first in a Church is as necessary to the successful teaching and permanence of truth, as that the aphorism is true, that a house divided against itself cannot stand, or that a broken cistern cannot contain water; all nature in fact teaches us this instructive lesson, that there is no stability or life without unity. We see it, for instance, daily verified before us in the vegetable kingdom, the growth of everything depends upon the combination of the whole; the plant is attached to the soil, and derives its nourishment therefrom, and from the dews and the winds of heaven, as well as from the life-giving warmth of the sun; the tree produces its fruit, and there is no fruit without its rind, and no fruitful tree without its leaves and bark, and no kernel without its shell; the God of nature has thus provided them with nutritiousness and covering for their growth and security; deprive the fruit of any of its even most minute fibres, or of its peel; tear off some of the shell which covers the kernel, and they wither and rot away, as the flower droops if you injure the delicate stalk it rests upon. Here we may trace by the hand of nature what vitality there is in unity, that the celestial bodies associate their properties with the qualities of this terrestrial earth in generating all living matter. And is the structure of man less perfect in its unity? wound one vital part of him mortally and he dies, so is the whole animal creation constituted. The very stones under our feet may show to us its essential attributes, do we not value them, if we wish to build any durable work, according to their compactness and uniformity, the diamond is not prized alone for its size and purity of water, but also for its being free of all flaws; the marble slab taken out of the quarry is cast away as worthless, if it is found with cracks in it; nay, the whole creation rests upon this base, or grand and essential principle, unity in all its parts, and if we look into the most ingenious and finished works of man, we shall find that their perfection arises from the accurate agreement and unity of all their component members, and shall we behold and know all this, that there is unity in Heaven, and unity, order and conformity in everything that has vitality or perfectness on earth, and yet make lightly of the divisions, rents and wide chasms which exist in what you designate the Church of Christ? Shall we count unity less necessary in spiritual matters than in material things? Shall we view with a calm and indifferent eye the professed word of God reduced to a chaos of contradictory beliefs, and driven as chaff to and fro by every adverse wind, until we witness men's minds, as St. Peter says, like, "fountains without water, and clouds tossed with whirlwinds to whom the mist of darkness is reserved?" God forbid, that we should be so dead to what is so vital; for the Church is to faith what the shell is to the kernel; faith, in this sense, is the fruit or the kernel, and the Church is but the shell or outward cover which God in his mercy has appointed in order to keep pure and uncontaminated this spiritual food, not only from the machinations of the evil one, but, alas! from the sacrilegious hand, and innovating mind of man as, in like manner, he has designed the nutshell to protect the delicate substance within from the inclemency of the weather, and the birds of the air. Which of us, let me ask, that had to undertake a voyage, however short, would enter into a vessel that was visible to all in a shattered and broken condition? No one would be so foolish. Are we, then, to be less careful of our souls than we are of our bodies? It must not be. You need not wonder, then, my dear friends, that I continue to press you so earnestly to the investigation as to which of our respective Churches has in it the true Unity prayed for by Jesus Christ.—That Protestantism is not very nice or particular in its connexion and union of members, we may readily infer from its acknowledging a class of religionists, and whom you pronounce as being guilty "of the most damnable idolatry—the most blasphemous fables—sins detestable to God, and damnable to man," as an integral part and parcel of the "Church Catholic."—I shall not stop here to point out how incompatible this is to that "Glorious Church, holy and without blemish," which Christ endowed for himself, but advert to the fact that your divisions compel you to this shocking alternative, of offering a place to the "Red Lady" herself, as you call at times the Church of Rome, upon the "Protestant Tree;" the Bishop of London, in his Charge for 1842, says, "Nor do I think it consistent with truth to deny that the Church of Rome is a Branch, however corrupt, of the Church Catholic." Hundreds of Protestant divines have said the same before him—thus would Protestantism fain unite the Church of Rome with, as you say, all her idolatry, to its contradictory doctrines, as if it were to accomplish the old and opprobrious adage, that, "birds of a feather flock together," upon this Protestant Tree; but it is almost needless to remark that the Church of Rome receives such miserable advances and humiliating concessions with more pity than scorn; she looks upon your sects as branches lopped off, as lost sheep, and she would gladly and joyfully reclaim you, but it is not for a moment to be supposed she will ever ally herself to the motley throng; no, she will not, and she cannot unite herself in any way with contradictions and errors, for she is in this as the canticle describes her, "a garden enclosed, a fountain sealed up," against such intermixture. St. James asks, "Doth a fountain send forth, out of the same hole, sweet and bitter water," so can, "the fountain of living waters—the Church of the living God" harbour together Unity and Division—Truth and Error? The unchristian notion of such an unholy admixture is not to be entertained for a moment; that you as Protestants have, however, "dissensions, strifes, enmities, contentions, sects," among yourselves, is irrefragable, and how could it be otherwise, for when did you ever see peace and unity reign in a family, when opposite opinions, contentions, and enmities, sat personified round the same board, or have you never remarked, if you ever beheld, when opposite and strong currents meet, how violently the waters are lashed up by the collision, sometimes forming in their course dangerous and fatal eddies to all that come within their influence, while, on the other hand, agreement of opinion and harmony of spirit, however numerous the members may be, produce unity and peace, so in like manner a body of water in one continued and even stream, will flow smoothly and majestically along, however mighty it may be, unless it meets with any obstructions on the way. This is a principle in the nature of things that stands good as respects religion, for every religious system has a principle, good or bad; prove yours by this test, and, if it bears this touchstone, it has unity. Bring your different sects in contact with each other, assemble if you can under the roof of one Church two or three ministers and a due proportion of laity of each Protestant denomination, Lutherans, Calvinists, Zuinglians, Episcopalians, Plymouth Brethren, Jumpers, Quakers, Methodists, Unitarians, Baptists, and fifty more such ists and ans, and call upon one to preach the doctrines of Christ, and all to respond Amen to it; reason at once prompts you to say, "the thing is impossible, quite impracticable." But could they be so congregated and got to declare their respective faiths, fancy what a variety of human opinions, what a fearful strife and whirlpool of human passions, would not the spirit of division and contention fulminate forth, such a scene would be insupportable; you would close your ears and shut your eyes; you would be bewildered and horrified; Dr. Irving's "Unknown Tongue," would be nothing to it, when men and women used to fall into fits, would not one exclaim, "I am of Paul, I of Apollo, and I of Cephas," or rather, for these three did not, like the Reformers, differ in points of faith, "I am of Luther, I of Calvin, I of Fox, I of Wesley, I of Cranmer, I of Zuinglius," and no doubt all would exclaim, "And I of Christ," but what answer would they give to the question, "Is Christ divided?" when they would thus rend asunder his seamless garments?—or think you all these would at the conclusion follow the admonition of St. Paul, "Salute one another with an holy kiss?" But fortunately the world is wide enough for them to range without being forced to come in such close approximation to each other, as the forest is for its rude inhabitants, for it would be impossible to convene together such combustible materials without the occurrence of such a convulsion; a test of this sort would have the same effect as applying a spark of fire to a magazine of gunpowder; it would break up the meeting in the wildest confusion, and work up and foment the most bitter and virulent spirit. Unity would be rent to pieces, and peace would fly from such an Assembly. But you cannot, my friends, witness such a state of things, though it in reality exists; this world in a manner is but one mighty edifice under the canopy of heaven, and there is One Above that sees and hears all this contention of sects; yes, the God of truth and unity; and can you believe He will say to them, "Well done my good and faithful servants?" when you are told, "God is not the God of dissension, but of peace?" In vain then will you look in Protestantism for the realization of this text, "and the multitude of believers had but one heart and one soul," Acts 4th, 32. No, you must seek for it in Catholicism, where you will find this "one heart, one soul, and one faith," as you will find, that the light of day, the innumerable rays which illuminate this earth, proceed from that one glorious orb, the Sun; but space compels me to close this, and reserve the illustration of this context to No. 11.

Yours faithfully,

C. A. C.

REFUSAL OF GOVERNMENT TO AID THE CAUSE OF EDUCATION AMONG CATHOLICS.

To the Editor of the Calcutta Star.

SIR,—I submit that Catholics have cause to complain of unfairness towards them, on the part of Government in the matter of Education.

The Catholics are the most numerous, but at the same time, the most indigent body of Christians in Calcutta. This circumstance would seem to render it incumbent on an enlightened and benevolent Government to aid, at least, in giving them the means of useful education. This principle, however, tho' fully admitted and acted upon by other, and not less enlightened Governments, is apparently little understood by the Government of India.

Strong appeals have at different times been made to Government for some aid to the Catholic Free Schools. These appeals were all in vain. "The Catholics," says the Government of India, in the 19th century, "are numerous and should educate their own poor!" It may not perhaps be quite clear to every one how the numerousness of a body, notoriously poor, could exonerate a paternal Government from the obligation of assisting, at least, in placing the benefits of Education within the reach of all, to make the task less difficult to better circumstances of the body itself.

The educational aid which Government freely gives to Hindoos and Mahomedans is peremptorily denied to a body of its Native subjects, incomparably more poor, and therefore more in need of such aid, merely because they happen to profess the religion of the great majority of the Christian World.

It has been said that the refusal of Government to assist in the education of poor Catholics does not proceed from any latent hostility to their creed, that it is in accordance with the principles observed in regard to all other denominations of Christians. This has been and will doubtless be again said, but it is not true. To say nothing of 800 Rupees per mensem, indirectly given by Government to the Protestant Free School, does it not give 200 Rupees a month to the Benevolent Institution, which is under the exclusive management of the Baptists, and where the education given is just sufficient to retain the Anti-Catholic virus which is assiduously instilled into the minds of the Christian pupils. It is well known that the most rancorous Anti-Catholic bigots, to be found in Calcutta are the descendants of poor Catholics educated at the so called Benevolent Institution——. It appears that there are now 150 Catholic children at this institution, but it does not require the gift of prophecy to predict that they will not long remain Catholics.

Thus, Sir, the Government not only refuses to aid in the education of poor Catholics, but it actually contributes from the public funds towards a practically proselytizing institution; towards making Baptists of the children of poor Catholics.

FAIR PLAY.

Calcutta, March 18, 1844.

THE CATHOLIC SOLDIERS.

We are excessively sorry that a letter addressed to us on the subject of the religious treatment of our Roman Catholic soldiery has, by some unaccountable mistake, been mislaid. It was a well-written, temperate, and judicious address; pointing out the differences, and distinctions allowed still to exist in India between the degree of attention paid to the wants of the Protestant as compared with those bestowed on the Catholic soldier; and it would have happily prefaced the letter signed FAIR PLAY in our paper of the 14th instant, turning upon the question of the non-support given by Government to educational establishments for Roman Catholic children.

It is a painful truth that the bigotry of our Established Church exceeds by far the practical intolerance of the Roman Catholic one. Wherever the regular Protestant spirit prevails, the ascendancy of the Reformed Creed is made to appear by differential distinctions of a character terribly personal. Thus, as the letter above alluded to informed us, on a recent occasion at Ferozepore during the presence there of a distinguished individual, the Protestants were performing divine service on Christmas day within the Durbar tent, while the Catholics, bearing such proportion to their Protestant brethren as hundreds do to scores, were celebrating the rites of the holy day in the open air, having been told there were no tents available for them! But this is in keeping with the scale upon which their spiritual wants are provided for: the Roman Catholic priesthood are scantily employed in our army, and miserably remunerated, while the orthodox church establishments is on the scale we all know of. It is a subject deserving the attention of the Friend of the Army, who if he were sufficiently interested in the institutions of the "Old Religion," to visit, as he did, the convents at Agra, and in Chowringhee (and them alone of all such institutions since his arrival), surely may have fellow-feeling enough to sympathise with the humble but faithful follower of that creed, who gives his aid in obtaining that "——British glory won with Irish blood——" of which His Lordship is so fond. It is a subject which none could take up better than himself: not ostentatiously, nor even openly, but in a manner to give effectual remedy to an evil much complained of, and deeply felt by the Catholic soldiery in India, while his own orthodoxy remained unsullied under cover of an incognito by the imputation of over-tolerance.

We do think it by any means improbable that the attention of the Governor General may have been seriously directed to this subject. He has seen one sight which Civilians do not often witness, a field of battle; he has made it his boast to visit and frequent the hospitals filled with the wounded on that bloody day; the great majority of the men whom he saw fall, and whom he beheld afterwards suffering, were Catholics, and he must have been made aware of the yearning for spiritual comfort and for the performance of the last rites according to their faith, which beset these gallant sufferers. If his Lordship wishes to fix his fame with the British soldier on a lasting base in this country, we have indicated to him an easy and certain road of attaining his wishes: if as a Christian, and a Philanthropist, he desire to fulfil in the unostentatious mode we have alluded to his duty even according to the power that has been given him, he can do so with a wish.

We should have infinite satisfaction in chronicling any appearance of such a spirit, confident that the first step would not be the last. It would, on the contrary, be but an initiatory move to some such scheme as that to which our correspondent, FAIR PLAY, alluded,—the extension of Government aid to places of general instruction under Roman Catholic guidance. The Government of India is professedly based on principles of the widest toleration. It recognizes the prejudices of the Hindoo, it acknowledges the scruples of the Mahomedan, nay, there is no grade, nor shade of distinction resulting from the sectarian profession of those faiths that it will not respect, and (in its own indirect way) aid, and foster. A Mussulman College, the focus of religious instruction according to the faith of its professors, is in the true spirit of tolerance supported, endowed, and maintained by the British Government: a Hindoo College in which the study of sacred writings according to the Hindoo doctrines is mixed with an educational course of a more general character is most judiciously and justly fostered and favored in like manner: other institutions of other creeds, and the sectarians of other creeds are not without their share of the support of this tolerant authority, and we are on the point of raising our voice in unreserved praise, when we find that the sister creed to that which the members of our Government profess, is entirely neglected. Educational assistance is withheld from schools and colleges conducted by Catholics; charitable donations for the education of the children of poor Catholics are, if given at all, in the proportion of one to fifty as compared with those intended for poor Mussulmans and poor Hindoos; those who anathematise a "false Prophet," and cry out upon "the abomination of idols," admit the followers of one and the worshippers of the other to greater privileges as respects instruction, than they could extend to their brother Christian of another sect!—Calcutta Star, March 16, 1844.

ON THE STATE OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN RUSSIA.

(From the Univers.—Concluded from our last.)

Every page of this recital (a) will show still further that Russia will not recoil from employing any of the means which the union of cunning and strength supplies her with; and that she is quite capable of preaching liberty and equality as she did in 1766, by the mouth of her Ambassador, Repnin, (b) and to allow her Cossacks to hang up, at the same gallows, a noble, a monk, a Jew, and a dog, as a practical illustration of this equality; (c) or to invoke, as she now-a-days does, the exclusive rights of the royal power, and even, in case of need, to appeal to Rome, to obtain the deposition of a bishop, to show the interest she takes in the maintenance of tranquillity in the legations, and the part which she arrogates to herself in the establishment of the Pope's temporal authority. (d)

The simplest reflection may suffice very clearly to demonstrate the radical incompatibility of a power so constituted with the liberty and prosperity of the Catholic religion. Russia has for a long time placarded her tolerance; with respect to Protestants and Jews, indeed, she has even been able to exercise it, but she never has, and never will do so towards the Catholics. And wherefore this flagrant exception? because of all religious institutions, the Catholic Church alone, by her doctrine and her constitution, as by the ineffaceable antecedents of her history, attempts to restrain the omnipotence of human power. This restraint is sometimes invisible, sometimes forgotten, sometimes much relaxed, but at all times, and wherever there is a Catholic priest, faithful to his duties, this restraint exists.

This it is that will embitter and ever excite the pride of men who cannot trace the origin of their power to the true God. Whatever may have been the efforts made, and by whatever party, to wield the Catholic faith upon temporal power, there has been, at the completion of the circle, some point by which it has ultimately escaped to resume its natural orbit. And it is the eternal glory of the Catholic Church that the tyrants of the earth, whatever their species, cannot bring themselves to suffer her to live at liberty near to their ephemeral thrones. In this, and we speak it loudly, the demagogue is altogether at accordance with absolutism; and hence it is that from one extremity of modern Europe to the other, the dictatorial anarchy of Madrid responds faithfully, by its cold and cruel persecutions, to the absolute politics of his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias.

Only, we must avow that absolute power, more skilful and more durable than its rival, when it becomes the enemy of the Church, does persecute it with more energy and success. This is demonstrated by the conduct of Russia, and the details may be studied in this volume. Ever since the Church of Jesus Christ was founded on Calvary, its persecutors appear to have employed these different methods to accomplish its ruin. One party has proceeded by way of blood-shedding and tortures; thus did the Roman emperors, and so do those savage monarchs, who, even at the present day, send hourly new recruits to the glorious army of martyrs. Another has had recourse to violent spoliation, like the Protestants in Germany, in Scandinavia, and the British isles. And a third has preferred what we would willingly call the diplomatic way—the direct and the surest of all, which consists in placing itself within the Church itself, or upon its sacred threshold; to study its weakness, to find accomplices in its prevaricating ministers, and more securely to tear it in pieces under the appearance of a lying solicitude. Julian the Apostate, and Philip the Fair, both appear to have foreseen the advantage they might derive from such a system. But they were both left a thousand leagues in arrear by those refined uses of that system which Catherine the Second, and her grandson, the Emperor Nicholas, have brought to it. It was reserved for these august autocrats to institute a college of Catholic priests to render it the docile and persevering agent of their plots against Catholicism. It was reserved for them to invent minute processes for penetrating to the depths of secret consciences, and to place themselves between the confessor and his penitents.(e) It is true that before them much had been accomplished in the spoliation of the Church of those riches which faithful princes and people had confided to her, but theirs was the idea that the confiscation of their wealth proceeded from the earnest desire to save the clergy from cares considered incompatible with their state, and at the same time to secure for them a more lucrative position.(f) It is true that before them men had lavished decorations, and rewards upon apostates and traitors, but I know of no instance in previous history of a bishop having been compelled to submit to a medical inquest under the pretext of examining whether the prelate's resistance to the yoke of persecution might not be the effect of a morbid depression of the intellectual faculties.(g) What a country and what a system is that in which the strict fulfilment of the most sacred duties shall appear to the eyes of power as an act of the most incomprehensible madness, and in which this power shall have the hardihood to speak in such a phrase of the Episcopal authority, even to the very Head of the Church! And what shall we say of those men who, in France or elsewhere, having looked upon such facts as these, shall dare still, under the name of Catholics, to repose their hopes on Russia, for working out the triumph of their political opinions? Now, a word upon another theme, which very naturally connects itself with the vicissitudes of this unfortunate Church. These things afford us a means, when we combat our Jansenists, our parliamentarians of former times, and their living successors, once again so numerous and so embittered, of showing them the state into which the Schismatic Church has already fallen, and into which the Latin Church, in Russia, is day by day(h) still more and more advancing,—a perfect and complete type of that system which the modern successors of the legists of Phillip le Bel have, century after century, attempted, but in vain, to introduce in France. The permanent mixing up of the civil authority in the administration of the sacraments, the exclusively governmental organisation of public instruction, and especially of theological education; the universally acknowledged pre-eminence of the imperial authority in cases of conflict; the constant assimilation of the Roman Pontificate to a foreign power; these are so many characteristics perfectly recognisable in the eyes of every man, who possesses the slightest knowledge of the attempts against the Church during the last century in Western Europe. They are to be found elsewhere less compacted, indeed, and affected by several obstacles, but still much too frequent in all the modern legislatures of Catholic kingdoms. And that nothing may be wanting to this remarkable resemblance, in Russia as elsewhere, the powers inimical to the Church have never experienced any difficulty in finding instruments of their perversity among self-called Catholics always ready to betray the duties of their faith to the worship of their masters' will.

It should, indeed, be avowed that in this dismal narrative of the evils that have fallen on the Church through the extension of the Russian power in Europe, the weakness of the good has ever been the accomplice of the audacity of the bad. How has it happened that Rome has almost always consented to acknowledge for metropolitans in Poland, men chosen with the most marvellous tact by the oppressors, to concur by their treason in the work of demolition? Thus Podowski, recognised in 1767, at the instance of Catherine, in spite of the tears of all friends of their country and religion, and who but too well justified this twofold fear. (i) Wolodkiewicz, who, from 1762 to 1778, performed the same part, with respect to the united Greek Church; and, above all, Siestrzenciewicz, whose nomination was torn by Catherine the Second from the same Pope, who had the weakness to grant to temporal power the destruction of the Jesuits; Siestrzenciewicz, who, during the fifty-four years of his pontificate, undermined, in manner now irreparable, the faith and ecclesiastical liberty in this immense empire! How happens it that in the midst of countries ravaged by these prevaricators, the only prelate who appears conscientiously to have fulfilled his mission, M. Guskowski, Bishop of Podlachia, even while he is a prisoner for the faith, should be induced, at the invitation of the sovereign Pontiff himself, to resign his apostolate?

Wherefore, then, are Catholics so ignorant of their strength? Do we not see in every page of the Church's annals, from St. Ambrosius to the immortal Bishop of Cologne, that the legitimate resistance of Pontiffs sent of God brings happiness to Catholicism, and that it is their weakness alone which has induced and encouraged crime? In our times, more than ever, in spite of our infirmities and miseries, nothing can be more true than this magnificent saying of Fenelon—"No human power can force the impenetrable entrenchments of the liberty of a heart." (k) But, alas! amidst this general depreciation of all that men once valued and desired, titles, honours, crowns, nothing has fallen so low as character.

Men of heart and conscience, armed with courage in a holy cause, appear no longer, except at lengthened intervals: they are like the scattered ruins of those lost races of the new world, who are dying out before the invasion of a materialist civilisation.

Perhaps, indeed, the Polish clergy of the provinces may have illustrated, by numerous and heroic achievements, their resistance, difficult and little appreciated as it has been, to the odious laws imposed upon them. If it be so, these self-devotions will have shone with a glory as much the more brilliant before God as they have been obscured before men; but is it not astonishing that of them the only name, that of the Bishop of Podlachia, has reached our ears? Lastly, the Head of the Catholic Church has lifted up his voice; the common Father of the Faithful has denounced in heaven and on earth those acts which have menaced the faith of so numerous a portion of his children. (l) Some have wished that he had spoken earlier, and with still greater energy; that he had not abstained from any expression of compassion and sympathy for the misfortunes of a people whom Clement XIII. had characterised as the champions of the glory of sacrifice for the blessing of peace to the people of Russia the imprescriptible rights of the Polish nationality. Others, again, have thought the accusation against the Emperor Nicholas so much the more overwhelming, because of its moderation; but no one has denied the vital importance which has been acquired by a cause pleaded by that voice which is never heard in vain. In the midst of this general prostration of Europe under Muscovite influence, when the House of Hapsburg humbles itself before that of Romanow, as we said above; when France, hitherto so susceptible upon the point of her national honour, patiently suffers from the Czar's proceedings, puerilely insolent; when the proud and powerful England maintains the most prudent reserve with respect to the rival who menaces and compromises her greatness in Asia, with what a holy and legitimate pride ought not Catholics to be penetrated on seeing the vicar of their God, without arms, without treasures, without any support whatever here on earth, advance alone to the battle against the most redoubtable adversary whom truth has encountered in our days. Whatever may be the duration and vicissitudes of this struggle, now so fierce, its issue cannot appear doubtful to the faithful soul. It was written three thousand years ago, in characters infallible. To unfaithful pastors, to prevaricating bishops, (m) responsible for all the souls they have sold, for all the consciences they have tortured, he has said, "Væ pastoribus Israel, qui semetipsos... vivo ego," saith

(m) It is known that death has already relieved the Church from the danger which it had to dread from the metropolitan Pawlowski, whose dissemination maintained so fatal an analogy with that of Siestrenczewicz, his predecessor, of deplorable memory. His death, so immediately following the sudden catastrophe which terminated the life of the diplomatic agent, Fuhrmen, in the very act of signing a tissue of artful falsehoods, in reply to the complaint of the Holy See, sufficiently announces to the most incredulous that, that arm which struck down Ananias and Saphira at the feet of St. Paul is not shortened.

the Lord... "Quod facti sunt greges mei in rapinam, et oves meæ in devoracionem omnium bestiarum... ecce ego ipse requiram oves meas et visitabo eas." (n) To the courageous and faithful pontiffs, as to the heroic veterans of the holiest of causes, he has left an immortal promise and consolation:—"Pro justitia agonizare pro anima tua et usque ad mortem certa pro justitia et Deus expugnavit pro te inimicos tuos." (o) Lastly, as to monarchs blinded by their earthly power, and deaf to the most august and disinterested voice that can make itself heard in this world, their sentence is already promulgated and is beyond appeal:—"Si exaltatus fueris ut aquila, et si inter sidera posueris nidum tuum: INDE DETRAHAM TE, dicit Dominus (p) DE REGIBUS TRIUMPHABIT, ET TYRANNI RIDICULI EJUS ERUNT." (q) We must, however, await the day of the Lord's justice; sooner or later the wrongs of the Church will be avenged—by men sometimes, by God always.

Let us now apply these observations to communities of women. It is true that on the day of her profession, a religious takes an irrevocable engagement; but, had she married, it would have been perfectly the same; the only difference is, that she never make her vows, but after having acquired a complete knowledge of the whole extent of her future obligations, and of the difficulties she will have to meet with, and after having tried for a considerable time if her health and inclinations are well calculated for a religious life: whilst by marrying, her prospects of happiness rest more upon desires and hopes, than upon experience; as it is impossible for her to be fully acquainted with all the duties and consequences of matrimony, but when it is too late to alter her situation; consequently, whatever may be objected against perpetual vows, can be retorted with stronger force against the indissolubility of marriage. But, as all moral writers agree that the peace of families, the good morals of the people, and prosperity of the state, depend in great part on the indissolubility and sacredness of matrimonial engagements, have we not a right to conclude, that perpetual vows are also a great ingredient of happiness in a religious life, and perhaps its best security? Supposing that a nun had the liberty to leave her convent, and to come back to it at pleasure, what benefit would she reap from such a liberty? After an abode of a few years in solitude, were she to return to the world, all she knew and loved in it has already disappeared, or is entirely altered for her; for the world is a scene continually changing. If you lose sight of it for ever so short a time, you are sure to see new decorations and new actors,—she becomes a stranger to its manners and fashions,—destitute of the qualifications requisite to please others, and hard herself to be pleased, obliged to submit to a second education, and to form new habits, in order to gain the affections of new acquaintances and friends, the inconstant religious would be soon disgusted with her new situation, and long after the tranquillity and comforts of her former habitation. Would she obtain the object of her actual desires? It is in vain; her convent is no longer the same as she left it: having once tasted in some degree the noisy and intoxicating pleasures and diversions of a worldly life, she would not have the same relish for the uniform occupations and tranquil enjoyments of a religious life. Having lost the taste of simplicity and candour, she would find the conversation and society of her pious companions dull and insipid; religious observances trifling and tedious, and her own way of life laborious and irksome. Too virtuous to take a part in the criminal diversions of the world, and too worldly still to relish the pure delights of innocence and piety,—half a fashionable lady in her convent, as she was a formal old maid in the world,—an object of compassion and trouble to her religious sisters, and of contempt and railery to her worldly friends, she would pass, and end, her melancholy days in bewailing the dismal consequences of her inconstancy, or in forming new schemes of changing her present situation for another, which as soon as obtained, would prove equally uncomfortable and burthensome. It appears then certain, that by renouncing the power of disposing of herself, the religious renounces only a power which she could not exercise, but to her detriment and ruin; and which she would not have actually used had she retained it in its full extent. This is not a mere conjecture; it is a truth confirmed by the example of the religious who make their profession in communities in which perpetual vows are not required; it depends upon them to return to the world whenever they please: however, they scarcely ever do it, and they die happy in the house in which they had consecrated to God the first years of their youth. The founders of monastic orders, by imposing on their disciples, rules and practices of perfection, never thought that they could release them from their primary and indispensable duties towards God and their neighbour: those holy and truly wise men were penetrated with the truth of these maxims: "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's: and to God the things that are God's. As you would that men should do to you; do you also to them in like manner." They know perfectly well, that monastic as well as political obedience derive their strength and support from the same principle, "from Him who reaches from end, mightily, and ordereth all things sweetly." Wisd. vii. 1. Monastic and political obedience are two sisters, united together by a perfect agreement of sentiments; and not two rivals always at variance. They both command their respective subjects, "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be, are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God." Rom. xiii. 1, 2. Superiors never imagined that by requiring from their religious a vow of obedience, they had power to command them to renounce the lights of their reason, or the dictates of their conscience. However, such would be the case, if they could ever suppose, that the rule which enjoins obedience to the Superior, is above the natural and divine law which strictly commands allegiance to the lawful sovereign. The vow of obedience does not render the religious a blind instrument in the hands of his Superior, nor deprive him of his natural faculties. No, he ought to make use of them, as other men do, to distinguish between good and evil, right and wrong. He renounces his will, and submits it to that of his Superior, only in this sense, that in the things which, before his profession, he could indifferently either have done or omitted (salva conscientia) after it, he engages himself to follow the judgment and discretion of his Superior; acknowledging in him a right to command, and in himself an obligation of obeying; but always with this restriction, within the limits of his rule, and only as far as the natural and divine law permit; which laws can never be dispensed with on any pretence whatever. Hence, before a religious revolts from his allegiance to his sovereign, he must have already revolted from his faith, and from the rules of his order. The vow of obedience has only for its end the glory of God, the temporal and spiritual advantage of the religious, and the maintenance of peace and good order in the community. The perfection of the vow of obedience consists, not in complying with every order of his Superior, whatever it may be, but in the disposition of the religious (whenever submission is not incompatible with charity,—whenever there is no appearance of sin, or the voice of God condemns the voice of man) to consider in the Superior, who commands, Jesus Christ who is to be obeyed; to obey, not only in things of strict obligation and great importance, but also in matters of indifference; and at the first sign, without reply or reluctance, and even with pleasure and alacrity: such is the doctrine of all Catholic moralists, concerning the vow of obedience.

How then can religious obedience be called a slavery. Slavery is an involuntary yoke. The obedience of the religious is not forced upon him against his will but the effect of a free choice. Obedience is a burden and yoke only to the Superior. Slavery is the melancholy consequence of birth or of conquest: the obedience of the religious is the result of mature deliberation, and real independence. Slavery is a violent invasion of liberty: the obedience of the religious is a voluntary cession, a gift, a free homage; consequently the noblest act of his liberty. Slavery puts the slave under the dominion, and leaves him at the disposal of a master whom he could not reject: the obedience of a religious subjects him to a Superior of his own choice, and who cannot dispose of him, but according to fixed laws and regulations, which he has himself approved of, and which he respects and loves. Slavery is entirely for the advantage of the master: obedience is entirely for the benefit of the religious: obedience is the delight, comfort, and felicity of the religious: by a generous and unreserved sacrifice of self will, he is delivered from one of the greatest obstacles to salvation, and exempt from the trouble of choosing for himself. Obedience enhances the value of his good works, and even gives him the merit of all those which he is not allowed to perform. It is the light which guides his steps; the authority which solves his doubts; the help which supports his weakness; the spur which animates him in his undertakings; the motive which encourages him in his difficulties; in fine it is his security during his whole life. Slavery is the torment of the slave, and all his desires tend to break off his chains, and to be set at liberty: obedience is the delight of the religious; for he fears nothing more than to see his sacred engagements dissolved, and be rendered again master of his destiny.

We must not imagine, that the constitutions of monastic orders give to Superiors a despotic authority over their religious. No, they cannot govern them according to their caprice, but according to the rules of their community. Superiors themselves are bound by laws which they cannot infringe; they are not surrounded with slaves nor even with subjects, but only with friends and children. The sceptre which they hold, is the sceptre of mildness and benevolence; it is forbidden to the Superiors to rule with harshness, and to the inferiors to obey through servile fear: the names of father or mother which they bear is not only a title of honour; it is a mark of the nature and character of their administration. In short, their empire is an empire which love and confidence have erected, and which is exercise only by confidence and love.

Now, if you shut to Catholic women the entrance of the cloister, you evidently preclude several of them from the avenues to happiness, which consists in a seclusion from the agitations of the world, and which they could not find elsewhere. In order to make us sensible of this truth, we need but take a slight survey of our communities of religious women. Let us suppose each of them to have been composed of thirty members; and that out of this number ten who were without near relations, and as it were strangers in their native country, esteemed themselves happy to have had it in their power to enter, by adoption, into a family, the gentle and pure manners of which were suitable to their own inclinations: ten others, destitute of those natural graces and captivating charms so highly valued in the world, had brought a grateful heart into a society of pious and enlightened souls, among whom the want of these external accomplishments is accounted as nothing, when compensated by virtue: the ten remaining, condemned by the shipwreck of their fortune to a life of penury and indigence, with transport blessed the religious foresight of our ancestors, who had prepared for them an hospitable land, where, from slender means of subsistence, united together, there arose a comfortable sufficiency for all. Now, if you disperse these thirty nuns, and keep them separated from one another in the wide world, you offer violence to their inclinations, destroy their happiness, and devote their existence to the greatest calamities. Are not the calamities which oppress individuals to be looked upon as the calamities of the political body of which these individuals are members; And is it not the duty of a wise and paternal government to prevent them? "The happiness of a people," says Dr. Paley, "is made up of the happiness of single persons; and the quantity of happiness can only be augmented by increasing the number of the percipients or the pleasure of their perceptions." Vol. ii. p. 346

It has been also said (for what has not been said against religious orders?) that notwithstanding all the regulations which the most consummate wisdom could establish, to prevent an abuse of power in the Superior, nevertheless, it might, be still possible, that he should abuse his authority over a timid and uninformed religious, to make him subservient to the designs of his ambition, or his enmity against the government of his country. That such a thing is possible we grant. That it is probable, we boldly deny. But with this objection of possibility, there is nothing so sacred, so useful, so necessary upon earth which will be free from suspicion. If the mere possibility of an abuse be once admitted as a sufficient cause to reject and abrogate a convention, or destroy an establishment, there is no longer any sort of authority safe, nor any sort of obedience without danger. The defence of the country must not be entrusted to the genius of the most experienced general, because it is possible that he will abuse his influence over his soldiers to raise the standard of revolt. Magistrates should not be appointed, to watch over the execution of the laws, and maintain good order; because it is possible, that a judge will use the sword of justice, which is put into his hands for the punishment of the guilty, to sacrifice the innocent. Parents must be deprived of the authority which every law, divine and human, gives them over their children, because it is possible that they will form and habituate to commission of crimes, the young hearts which they were bound to bring up in the practice of every virtue. Sciences and liberal arts, ought no longer to be tolerated, because they may possibly tend to increase the number of corrupted citizens. Nay, religion itself, and all religious worship, must be reprobated, because, in the hands of hypocritical and profligate ministers, it is possible they may become an instrument of delusion, superstition, and fanaticism.

Let it be acknowledged that, through that infirmity inherent in all human establishments, which tend, after a certain lapse of time, to relaxation and decay, the most fervent convents have now and then wanted reformation. But the irregularities so loudly complained of by the zealous advocates of religious sanctity and so maliciously exaggerated by partiality or prejudice, though they now no longer subsist, were, for the greatest part, mere irregularities,—deviations from the strictness of the rule, too frequent an intercourse with seculars, introduction of a worldly spirit, or adoption of conveniences contrary to a life of mortification and poverty. But these irregularities were never general; they existed only in some few houses, whilst all the others exhibited the most edifying example of all Christian and religious virtues. I will not even deny that sometimes, though very seldom, vices might have crept into convents, and polluted these sacred abodes of innocence and perfection.

Indeed, since among the twelve apostles, chosen by Jesus Christ himself, and formed by his example and instructions, there has been a traitor, can we reasonably expect that our convents, which have contained many thousand religious, during the space of fifteen hundred years, should have enjoyed the singular privilege, never to have the inconstancy of a foolish virgin to bewail? However, let that be as it may, these defects, nay, even these vices, were only the defects and vices of some few individuals; they had never any influence on the prosperity of the state, or the morals of the people; they were not the cause, but the melancholy consequence of the general corruption of manners: as in a country infected with the plague, the most healthy and robust constitutions* cannot always escape the general contagion.

As for enclosure, such as was sanctioned by the civil laws in Catholic countries, before the French revolution, is it true that it made a convent a place of slavery and woe? A most afflicting scandal has served at least to display a most edifying truth. Out of a feigned compassion for religious women, pretended philosophers had long since published throughout all France, that the day when an option should be offered to these cloistered victims, between their chains and their return to the world, they would that very day quit, with eagerness, their deserted solitudes. However, a solemn law loudly proclaimed such an option: and the result of this philosophical experiment, became, to the eternal ignominy of those who had solicited it, a splendid triumph of the fidelity, and an evident proof of the happiness of our virgins. And we may say, if such a comparison be allowed, that the crucible scarcely threw out an imperceptible dross. Those religious virgins, whom their false friends had flattered themselves to stir up, and draw into inconstancy, —those to whom they had endeavoured to palliate the crime of injury and apostasy, in order to smooth the way for their return to the world; —all of them recoiled back with horror, at the prospect which opened before them, and hid themselves with more eagerness than ever in the obscurity of their beloved solitudes, from which, at a later period, it became necessary to tear them away by violence. And after twenty-two years of abode in the world, immediately upon the restoration of the Bourbon kings to France, these pretended victims of religious despotism, sent forth from all quarters of that extensive kingdom the most urgent petitions to the king, to obtain leave to resume the public exercise of their sacred engagements, and shut themselves up again within the walls of a convent. Nay, some, without waiting for that permission, at once put on their religious habits, erected grates to their parlours, and excluded the world from their houses.*

But if the objections against a religious life be destitute of solid grounds, as it must appear to every impartial reader; in the form in which they are dispersed among the public, we shall discover still more of disingenuousness and intrigue. Enmity to a religious life is served up in every shape that is likely to allure, surprise, or beguile the imagination:—in a fable, a tale, a novel, a poem, and “awful disclosures;” remote and oblique surmises, in books of travels; of philosophy; of natural history; in a word, in any form rather than the right one, that of professed and regular disquisition: and because the coarse buffoonery and broad laugh of the old and rude enemies of the Catholic faith, would offend the taste, perhaps, rather than the virtue of this cultivated age,—a graver irony, and more skilful and delicate banter is substituted in their place. The adversaries of a religious life have gone still farther; they have pursued it with poisoned arrows: obscenity itself has been resorted to by a Gathercole and a Gregg. The innocent customs,—if we are not permitted to call them the holy rules of the religious,—together with all the adjuncts and appendages of their external profession and worship, have been impudently profaned by an unnatural conjunction with impure and lascivious images. The fondness for ridicule is almost universal; and ridicule to many minds is never so irresistible, as when seasoned with obscenity, and employed upon monks and nuns. But in proportion as these noxious principles take hold of the imagination, they inflate the judgment; for trains of ludicrous and unchaste associations adhering to every minutia of a religious life, render the mind indisposed to receive either conviction from evidences, or impressions from its benefits to society; and this effect being exerted upon the sensitive part of our frame, is altogether independent of argument, proof, or reason; is as formidable to a true religion as to a false one; to a well-grounded faith as to a chimerical mythology or fabulous tradition. Every mind which wishes the advancement of truth and knowledge, in all researches which have reference to the happiness and reputation of his fellow-creatures, must abhor this licentiousness, as violating no less the laws of reasoning, than the rights of decency.—(To be continued.)

MISCELLANEA.

JERSEY.—“A POSER.”—A certain lecturer expounding “heaven” and “hell,” at Jersey, referred both to the conscience, defined the former an approving and the latter a condemning conscience, and denied any other interpretation or application of the words. Having invited objections, Mr. Russell put one, but was cried down as worse than an infidel or a papist, and was answered out of a scripture which the reader did not, it was quite evident, at all comprehend. After a time Mr. Russell obtained a hearing, and said—“This is the question; and I should like some of you who can appreciate its bearing upon the whole theory of dissent to ponder it well before you attempt answering it. You say, every one of you, that all merely human judgment is liable to error; that all churches are fallible: and that no body of men, however numerous, and however learned, but are liable to fall into enormous errors of judgment—” Chorus of voices: “Yes certainly; there is no infallibility anywhere—” Mr. Russell: “Good; you maintain, of course, that the Church of Rome is, and ever was, quite as fallible or perhaps more so, than any other—Socinians, Muggletonians, and Jumpers, not excepted.” Chorus of Voices: “Undoubtedly, we do.” “That,” snuffled a big boy with red hair and sore eyes, “That is a saving evangelical truth.” Mr. Russell: “It is also admitted that all your various religions are founded entirely upon these Scriptures.” General Chorus: “Certainly.” Mr. Russell: “Well, then, this is my question: How can you be sure that that fallible Church of Rome has not through mistake or design, choused you out of the right Scriptures? They collected in the third century all writings extant upon Christianity, and pronounced, by virtue of their infallibility—as they say, but which you deny and deride,—which were true and which were not. They rejected the Gospel of St. James, preferring St. Mark’s in its stead, and very many others, alleged inspired writings, they cast aside. Now, if they were, as you aver, a fallible Church, how can you be certain that they did not reject the right and gave you the wrong Scriptures?” Dr. Rowand: “I deny the premises.” Mr. Russell: “What premises? Do you deny that the Catholic Church collected, collated, and pronounced judgment upon the genuineness of the Scriptures?” Dr. Rowand: “No no, no; I deny the premises of your argument.” Mr. Russell: “Those are the premises of the argument! German philologists have succeeded in demonstrating that of the four gospels, that alone of St. John was written by the Saint whose name it bears; and that, though of no possible consequence to a Catholic, is of a perilous importance to you; it strikes at the very foundation of your religions.” Dr. Rowand: “I do not admit the premises.” Mr. Russell: “What do you mean!” But Dr. Rowand had had enough of discussion, and rather hastily retired.—Jersey Gazette.

* This is a fact of which the writer of these pages was an eye-witness. Among the religious communities which put up grates, he may name the English Austin nuns in Paris.

AYLESBURY.—RETRIBUTIVE PROVIDENCE.—“No Popery.”—The Aylesbury News thus turns to account a controversy going on in that parish between a Puseyite curate and some of his ultra-Protestant flock:—The controversy respecting the use of the Bible in the Aylesbury Church Sunday School, affords an illustration of the truth of the doctrine of a retributive Providence. For many, many years, the clergy of the Establishment set the people of this country on the cry of “No Popery,” and itinerant parsons travelled from Dan to Beersheba to persuade the ignorant mob that the Pope and the Devil were first cousins, and that everything that was Popish was necessarily bad, and of an infernal origin. Well, the cry took, the clergy and the Tory gentry having met with a complete success, especially in the more rural and ignorant districts, the cry being still now everywhere heard. How much easier is it to raise an evil spirit, than to lay him again. Against whom is now this foolish cry raised? Why, against the parties who for selfish reasons originated it. As old Cobbett said, “If a strong prejudice had not been raised against Popery, the persons could never make a reasonable excuse for holding possession of the property of the ancient Church.” And now these very parsons are suffering the inconvenient consequences of their own cry, for the charge of Popery is preferred against them, and they cannot take a single step towards performing their duty, according to the rubrics of the Church, without this insane cry being sounded in their ears to such an extent that the very bishops are frightened from their propriety, and are recommending their clergy to be very careful how they introduce any novelties into their mode of worship, however wrong the customary form may be with which their people have been habituated. What is all this bother about in this parish? Who have a greater right to manage the Sunday School, settle the course of instruction, choose the kind of books, &c., than the clergy? And yet, no movement can be made—no new books introduced—without this cry of “No Popery” being raised, and opponents starting up on “Protestant principles.” Among the poorer people the prejudice has taken deep root, and they have strong suspicions of their clergy. A poor woman of this town, being asked the other day what for the bells were ringing, replied, “Because the Catholics have got the day in the Sunday School.” I stopped a poor girl of respectable appearance and decently dressed, a short time ago, whom I knew to be connected with the Sunday School, having been herself a scholar, and having relations also connected. I said to her, “Why, Mary, I hear strange things of your new clergyman and your school, what is it all about?” “I don’t know exactly, Sir,” was the reply, “but I am told they are going to make a Catholic school of it.” I might give more of such instances, but they are common enough to all your readers who have taken the trouble to enquire into the matter. In some parts of the country, the greater horror is felt at the approaching reign of “the man of Sin,” who is now understood to be a Puseyite, or English Catholic. Absurd as all this may seem, and as it really is, it shows the great extent of the “No Popery” feeling among the poor, and those who ought to have a full confidence in their spiritual leaders. No good can be done by the clergy, while people’s minds are thus occupied with absurd prejudices; and the Church of England is now losing ground fast, through the very prejudice its clergy but a few years ago did their utmost to create. In bidding the people to be thoroughly Protestant, they overdid their business, and the people are become too Protestant for their purposes. There is no policy so good as that of straightforward, blunt honesty. Truth always prospers, trickery never for any length of time. Bitterly are the clergy of this country now suffering from the effects of their own former folly and crime; though it may happen that the sins of one generation are being visited on the clergy of another. This “No Popery” feeling is drawing many to the dissenting meeting-house; and a young clergyman cannot now even choose what vestment he shall preach in, without being accused of being in league with the Pope. Let those who in future attempt to throw dirt to their neighbours, be quite sure where the dirt will stick. Many a man has himself fallen into a pit he dug for another.—Tablat, Dec. 16, 1843.

MAY I SEPARATE FROM THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?

OR,

Strictures on a pamphlet entitled—"Can I continue a Member of the Church of England?"

By REV. CHARLES J. QUARTLEY, A. M. Calcutta, 1844.

Before we proceed to consider the second part of this pamphlet, viz. the writer's Apology for the book of Common Prayer, it may be well to direct attention, briefly, to what we deem peculiar and interesting in it.

Were a Catholic writer to attack the Church of England's Prayer Book and Ritual, in the manner it has been lately attacked in Calcutta by a learned and respectable seceding member of her own communion, his judgments would be probably suspected and his inferences rejected, without examination, by the great mass of Church of England Protestants. We are disposed to think that they have not been equally hasty in dismissing from their minds the sentence pronounced in their Prayer Book by the writer of the little Tract to which Mr. Quartley replies in his pamphlet now before us. Were a Catholic clergyman to adopt, with a few exceptions, Mr. Quartley's language and arguments in defence of Church authority, repetitions in the Church service, tradition, apostolical succession, priestly absolution, and baptismal regeneration, all sects and denominations of Protestants would say that he was substituting the word of man for the Bible, and man himself for Christ. This is what we have to complain of so often in Protestants, their inconsistency in not using, under all circumstances, the same weights and measures when they enter the sanctuary to judge of doctrine and all that is sacred in religion.

If Mr. Quartley were to admit in disputing against Catholic doctrine and discipline, what he asserts against the Dissenters in defence of the Church of England, we should thank him for his candour; but now that the necessity of self-defence and the inroads of dissent have forced it from him, we pity his inconsistency, but cannot thank him. See the dilemma in which he feels himself enclosed; see how he wavers, advances and retreats; how he hesitates, first asserts and then doubts what he has asserted; see the vague limitations and conditions by which he endeavours to qualify what he would say, but fears to read in black and white; above all things, see how much afraid he is of attaching any definite fixed meaning to some of the most important passages in the Bible, regarding the power of the priesthood, the forgiveness of sins, and baptismal regeneration.

Let us have Mr. Quartley's own words:—

"The first exception is to the 20th ARTICLE—or at least to that portion of it which states that the Church hath power to decree rites and ceremonies, so long as they are not opposed to Scripture: the writer adds, 'what a convenient sentence is this to Puseyism.' Not contented with this quaint animadversion, he quotes from St. Paul 'Let all things be done decently and in order,' and says 'this is the Apostle's simple injunction.' Why this simple injunction of the Apostle's, so far from opposing the authority of the Church in decreeing rites and ceremonies, confirms it. How could things be done decently and in order, without such authority? Who is to be a judge of the decency, and who is to prescribe the order, if not the Church. Let me ask did not the Church conform to this rule, when in her primary synod and with her concentrated authority she issued in Jerusalem her mandate to the Gentile Churches? Acts xv. 'As they went through the cities they delivered them the decrees for to keep that were ordained of the Apostles and Elders which were at Jerusalem.' Acts xvi. 4. Was there no authority here in decreeing rites and ceremonies?

"Then again as to TRADITIONS. The writer objects to the 34th Article and says that 'it contains just such a sentence as Puseyism wants'—the sentence runs thus—'Whosoever through his private judgment, willingly and purposely both openly break the tradition and ceremonies of the Church, which are not repugnant to the word of God, and be ordered and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly.' Is this un-Scriptural?—are no traditions, no ceremonies, no customs to be observed? We ask not what does Puseyism want, but what saith the Scripture? 'If any man seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the Churches of God.' I Cor. xi. 16. 'Now we command you, Brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus, that ye withdraw yourselves from every Brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the TRADITION which ye have received of us.' II Thess. iii. 6. In the former case the Apostle denies the propriety of an act, in itself immaterial, simply on the ground of there being no such custom in the Churches: by which he evidently supposes that had the custom prevailed the plan might have been adopted by the Corinthians. From the second passage quoted, it is evident that some plans, not based upon express revelation, yet nevertheless in accordance with the word of God, were to be regarded by the Thessalonian Church. We do not contend for the Romish or Tractarian use of tradition—we would give it the authority neither of a co-ordinate or subordinate authority in the interpretation of God's word—such principles our Church repudiates in her Sixth Article; but we do contend, on the authority of the Apostles, for tradition of fact and of ceremony, which only the Church has power to revoke. If the time permitted, we might easily show that even those who make the loudest outcry against this subordinate use of Tradition, do retain it in their own ceremonies and services." * * * *

"The appointment of FAST DAYS, HOLY DAYS of the Church, the forty days in LENT, &c. are censured as rules based merely on traditional authority; 'and being compulsory on the Members of Church,' appear to the author unscriptural. That these appointments are compulsory, is false: the author cannot say that he was ever compelled to observe them: he was never denied any Church privilege for refusing to attend them: they are provided, but they are not compulsory. As we have before proved on the authority of Scripture, that it is lawful for the Church to appoint ceremonies, if they be not repugnant to God's word,—nothing more need be said on this part of the subject." * * * *

"Next we turn to the DAILY SERVICES—we are told 'in the morning form of prayers what vain repetitions there are: the Lord's Prayer is said five times,' &c. 'That there are repetitions we admit, that the repetitions are vain may well allow of doubt. Can our author think, that when our Lord went, and repeated, thrice 'repeated the same words,' that he indulged vain repetitions? Are the Angels guilty of vain repetitions when they say, 'Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty.' Was the inspired Psalmist guilty of vain repetitions when for twenty-six times without intermission he closes each stanza with the same words 'for his mercy endureth for ever?' Ps. cxxxvi.

"The ORDINATION SERVICE is then objected to, on the ground of its implying a regular succession of Ministers, and a transmission of Apostolical authority. The following passage is selected for our author's animadversion—'Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. Whose sins thou dost forgive they are forgiven, and whose sins thou dost retain they are retained.' Apostolical succession is a subject which is much misunderstood, and it would exceed the limits prescribed for this pamphlet to enter into a sufficient examination. That it exists in the Church of England, is an historical fact; that it is desirable where it exists, cannot be easily disproved;—but that it is essentially and absolutely necessary under all circumstances for the preservation of the means of grace in any community, we should be loth to believe, except upon the plainest testimony of the word of God." * * *

"But however this may be, we cannot see how any man dare deny the lawfulness of a form of words which our Divine Master employed in the ordination and commission of his own Apostles. He said to them, before the miraculous descent and miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost, whosoever sins ye remit they are remitted unto them, and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained.' John xx. 22. We do not here defend any particular, any false construction which party spirit may have put upon these words—we only contend that whatever be the right interpretation of our Lord's own expression, the same interpretation must, in common honesty, be accorded to them when used by our Church. We also know that the Apostles followed the example set them by the Lord. 'And when they had fasted and prayed and laid their hands on them they sent them away.' Acts xiii. 3. 'I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the Gift of God which is in thee, by the putting on of my hands.' II Tim. 1. 6."

"The remarks made upon this subject apply equally to the objections preferred against the form of ABSOLUTION provided in the Visitation of the Sick—and we may therefore pass on to the BAPTISMAL SERVICES."

This is a pretty way to dispose of the priestly absolution provided in the Book of Common Prayer. Have not conscientious, sincere Protestants a right to be informed on this subject? Are they bound to confess their sins or not? and are their ministers empowered to impart absolution? The words in the book of Common Prayer are as clear as words can be, and if they are not understood to signify what they clearly mean in their grammatical sense, there is nothing certain or fixed in the Church of England.

Let us now hear Mr. Quartley on the Baptismal service :

"But we are told that there are still worse things in this service—one of these things is said to be, Baptismal Regeneration. This conclusion is drawn from two expressions in the service, where it is stated that 'this child is regenerated,' and where thanks are offered to God that he hath 'been pleased to regenerate this infant,' and also from the declaration, that 'it is certain by God's word that children which are baptized, dying before they have committed actual sin, are undoubtedly saved.' The question is not, what is the name of the doctrine taught in these services : but is the doctrine scriptural ? What says the Apostle Paul ; 'Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death : therefore we are buried with him by Baptism into death.' Rom. vi. 3, 4. Can any words more strongly declare, that Baptism is the ordinance in which union with Christ is intended to take place. 'As many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ.' Gal. iii. 27. 'The like figure whereunto even Baptism doth also now save us, not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God.' I Pet. iii. 21. This last passage proves indeed that it is not the mere opus operatum that saves us ; but it also proves that, with a certain pre-requisite, under certain conditions, baptism is an instrument employed in introducing us to the blessings of the covenant of grace. Our Church appears to form her service on the supposition that God is faithful to his promise, and that the congregation pray in faith for what God has promised."

We invite the attention of our Protestant readers to the words which we, not Mr. Quartley, have marked in italics, because Mr. Quartley evidently intended them as a set off to the Catholic doctrine he had been advocating in the preceding observations. We therefore ask Mr. Quartley, if we are baptised in infancy, what else is it but the opus operatum that applies to our souls the merits of Christ and saves us. We ask him, further, why he has not been pleased to explain a little the vague certain pre-requisite, with which baptism is, under certain conditions, an instrument employed in introducing us to the blessings of the covenant of grace. He could not explain himself without falling in with the Catholic doctrine of baptism, and therefore he is intentionally obscure. The Church of England, he says, supposes in her service that God is faithful to his promise, and this we deny flatly. If she supposed that Christ has fulfilled the promises which he made (Matthew 28, 20) of remaining with the primitive Church, all days even to the consummation of the world, and (Matthew 16, 18.) that the gates of hell should never prevail against it, there would be no such thing to-day as the book of Common Prayer or an Anglican Church service different from that of the Catholic Church.

THE RIGHT REV. DR. BORGH1.

As any intelligence of or from the Right Rev. Bishop of Bethsaida and Vicar Apostolic of Hindustan and Agra will, we are sure, be perused by his numerous friends in Bengal and the North West Provinces with gratification, we publish the following letter, received by the February overland Mail, from his Lordship, addressed to our venerated Archbishop:—

MY DEAR LORD,—Since four days I find myself confined within the walls of this Lazaretto, where I will be obliged to remain until the 30th instant. I am sorry when I reflect, that I am to repeat the same quarantine at Malta, but, in fine, I have no other resource than to have patience, and submit myself to this hard fate. I trust that your Grace will have already received my news from Aden, and in addition I am happy now to state that during my voyage, and until the present day, my health continues to be excellent. During my short stay at Cairo, I had the pleasure to see the Right Rev. Dr. P. Guaseo, Bishop of Yer, and Vicar and Delegate Apostolic of Egypt and Arabia, whom I found to be a very amiable and active Prelate. Amongst his successes with regard to the welfare of our holy religion, I was pleased to hear, that he had obtained four Vincentians and seven Sisters of Mercy for two schools to be established at Alexandria. He petitioned Ali Pacha in order to have a piece of ground in the centre of the said City for building his new intended establishments, and His Highness was pleased to comply with his request, by granting him an old and vast building with a ground of about 12,000 square feet, situated in the Quartiere Franco, and which is valued at about 20,000 Dollars. The Right Rev. Bishop, accompanied by the Marquis Lavallette, Consul General of France, went to present his thanks to His Highness for the munificent donation he had made to the Catholic Mission, and they were received by His Highness with the utmost cordiality and respect. During their conversation, among other expressions of benevolence, His Highness said to His Lordship, that it has been always his ardent wish to show himself favorable towards religion, because from this results the public, and social tranquility of the State. What sentiments in a follower of the prophet ? What a contrast between the liberality of a Mahommedan Prince, and the bigotry of a certain Government, which styles itself Christian !

The cause of religion in Egypt is going on very well : during the last four years the Armenian and Greek Catholics have built two spacious and fine Churches at Cairo, where they celebrate the holy mysteries according to their rites.

I stop here because I am very busy for the moment. I will write again to your Grace from Italy: Meanwhile please to present my compliments to your venerable clergy, to Messrs. Lackersteen, DeSpouza, Spence, and to all our friends, and I remain most respectfully,

My dear Lord,

Your most Affctc. Brother in Christ,

+ F. JOSEPH ANTHONY.

ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.

In addition to their previous severe losses, the establishment conducted by the Members of the Society of Jesus have, since our last issue, sustained two very heavy ones, in the persons of Mr. Wm. Weld and Mr. John Bond.

Mr. Weld has for some years been known to the inhabitants of Calcutta by his activity in the service of religion and of the establishments conducted by his religious brethren; and by the engaging amiability of his manners, which has done much to remove prejudices against our religion in general, and against the establishment he served in particular. We are indebted to his zeal for the new wing of St. F. Xavier's College, comprising a magnificent suite of school rooms, a study room and refectory. The establishment of Seal's College was mainly owing to his effort. He excelled as a teacher of Mathematics.

Mr. John Bond was one of the seven who arrived from England in the Bentinck last November. He had been employed in the useful occupation of teaching in Seal's College where he took the greatest interest in the improvement of his scholars. He was preparing for ordination, hoping to be able to spend his life in the service of the Natives of this country. He fell a victim to Cholera. God no doubt will reward his good desires.

We have been requested to give notice that the commencement of the Easter vacation at St. F. Xavier's College has been anticipated this year by a few days, and began on Friday the 29th to continue till the usual day for the reopening of schools, the Monday after Low Sunday, which this year falls on the 15th of April.

SECUNDERABAD MISSION.

The following extracts from a letter to the Archbishop V. A. B. will be read with interest. I hope sincerely that Father C. will be as successful here as at St. Thomas'

Mount. He has now seven adults for baptism and two were baptized since his arrival, which is little more than a month. He delights, he says, in baptisms, and I most cheerfully yield them to him. * * * Nearly all the Catholic soldiers have taken the pledge. They are now receiving the medals which Father C. brought. Their tea-parties, which are held quarterly, are most amusing. There the four cheers could be heard in the true genuine Irish spirit. The Teetotalers spend their evenings in the room, most usefully. They have a good collection of books, with the "Expositor," "Herald," "Examiner," "Evening Mail," and "Nation." We have been disappointed in not having received the "Tablet" before this. The room is situated in the Chapel compound, so that the men are enabled to attend night prayer, regularly and numerously."

We understand that a very complimentary and affecting address was presented to the Rev. C. Murphy by his late congregation at St. Thomas' Mount, on the occasion of his departure for Secunderabad. This is as it should be, and is equally creditable to the zealous and pious priest, who deserved it, and to the people who profited so well by his ministry and so justly appreciated his worth.

We shall have much pleasure in publishing the address as soon as we receive it.

COCHIN CHINA MISSION.

We have been favored with the following letter addressed to the Archbishop:

Mergui, Tenasserim Provinces, the 1st of February, 1844.

MY LORD,—I take the liberty to forward you two letters of the bishops, coadjutors of the Vicars Apostolic of West Tong-King and Cochin China, which give the latest accounts of those so desolated missions, that you may have them inserted in the Catholic Herald, if you judge they may be of any interest to the readers of that interesting paper. I send them as they were written, in French, for fear, if I presumed to translate them into English, of giving them un air trop Française.

I have the honour to be, with the most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and obedient servant,

J. RENIER, M. A.

Letter from Monseigneur Dominique Lefevre, Bishop of Isauropolis and Coadjutor Vicar Apostolic of Cochin China, to the Rev. Mr. Renier, Missionary Apostolic at Mergui.

MY DEAR BROTHER & FRIEND,—By the change of the Monarch, Cochin China, or rather the Christians of this Pagan kingdom, have experienced an exchange of one persecutor for another. You cannot be ignorant of the incarceration of five of our brethren in the prison of the royal city,—the arrest of Messrs. Galy, Berneux and Charrier, is of an old date, as well as, about a year ago, of that of Messrs. Miche and Duclos, who were taken on the mountains whilst on their way to preach the Gospel to the barbarians inhabiting those places, and to endeavour to open the gates of Laos. Time was when the imprisonment of so many virtuous and exemplary missionaries and confessors of the faith, would to their brethren be a subject, to say the least of it, of universal commotion, but now the repetition of these occurrences has so much accustomed our ideas to them, that they make but a slight impression on us. I am ignorant of the fate of these generous athletes, it is likely, they, loaded with chains, are still enduring imprisonment. The King is not graciously inclined towards us: he lately condemned to death a priest of Tong King. I am now on the borders of Cochin China with 25,000 Christians for my flock, a number sufficient for the exercise of my zeal. I have seven or eight Native priests to assist me. The Pagans seem anxious to be converted. On my arrival I had more than a hundred baptized. Oh! how rejoiced were we of the peace then existing; the people came in crowds for the purpose of being enlisted as the children of the Church. Monseigneur of Metellopolis, (the Vicar Apostolic of the Mission) has had upwards of 600 adults baptized in the course of last year, and this only in one province of his Mission. In Tong-King, Mr. Masson also makes mention of numerous conversions from infidelity. It is impossible to view these movements and not consider them as marvellous. It is the blood of the Martyrs so freely and generously shed that is now producing its effect. Glory be to God!

My health is very much affected. I have just recovered from an indisposition which carried me to the verge of the grave; it has, however, pleased the Almighty to spare me, blessed be His name, and yet perhaps it would have been better for me to part forever from the ills of this life. I feel its burden become heavier every moment, and I fear my weakness.

I remain,

Always yours in J. C.

DOMINIQUE LEFFEVRE,

Coad. Bish. of Isauropolis.

10th January, 1843.

Letter from Monseigneur Jean Denis Gauthier, Bishop of Emaus and Coadjutor Vicar Apostolic of the Western Mission of Tong-King, to Rev. Mr. Renier, Missionary Apostolic of Mergui in the Tenasserim Provinces.

SIR AND DEAR BROTHER,

The village where I am just now exercising my ministration, has been thrice surrounded by the Mandarins; on the last occasion it suffered a pillage of three days, and every thing that the soldiers, to the number of 2000, could not take away with them, was either broken to pieces or destroyed by fire. Two of the Chiefs of the village and three Priests received on this occasion the crown of martyrdom. The remains of the two chiefs are buried in their houses, and those of the Priests lie under the premises where the holy sacrifice of the mass was celebrated, the altar in the centre, and the ashes of the holy martyrs on the sides. The Almighty appears to vouchsafe a special care on this village, for in spite of the suffering and losses it has experienced, it is at present in a state of comparative prosperity—a prosperity, at least, which it never enjoyed before, especially in regard to religion—whereas its persecutors all around are seen reduced, dying by whole families, falling from comfort to the greatest penury and ending their days in prisons and in dungeons. All, even the most ignorant, see the finger of God in the miserable termination of the enemies of his holy religion. It is this that has animated the courage of our Christians. On every side we hear of remarkable conversions which almost seem miraculous. It is gratifying to see a great number of those, who before were considered wolves, become on a sudden docile and obedient sheep. With this, our care becomes no less urgent, but time and labourers fail us, so that we may say, messis quidem multa, operare autem pauci; rogate ergo &c. If we were blessed with peace, two hundred missionaries would have found work for them, the people themselves seem well disposed to receive “the glad tidings;” but unfortunately we are not enough for their succour; we must first look after those of the household and then after the strangers. We feel hardly able to administer to the wants of the Christians. Parishes comprising between five and six thousand souls, occupying a tract which requires a two days’ journey to visit; have but one native priest for each, and this priest again, as it sometimes happens, aged between 70 and 79, has the sole care and charge of so great a number of Christians; hence you can judge how much our means are circumscribed to enable us to labour for the conversion of strangers.

In our Colleges we have about 100 young men who study Latin. Messrs. Masson and Jeantet give instructions in theology to about 30 catechists, who will be ordained as priests in 2 or 3 years. A letter from the Curate of the capital of Cochin China announces that our five brethren, prisoners there, Messrs. Charrier, Miche, Duclos, Galy and Berneux, have been released and are now lodging in the house destined for the ambassadors from the neighbouring tributary kingdoms. Two of our native priests are still suffering imprisonment in irons. One of them who is very young, replied to the various interrogatories of the Mandarins with such readiness and intrepidity that he became a subject of much eulogium to all who heard him. One of our clerks condemned to be strangled to death, was much admired in consequence of one of his questions to the Mandarins eliciting an admission on their part that their ancient worship (one of their superstitions which is rather firmly rooted in their mind) is nonsensical, absurd and injurious alike to those who are subjected to it, as to those who practise it. A Mandarin, one of the most learned in the kingdom, spoke very highly of him and stated that he derived much gratification from the conversation he had with the Clerk. THIEN-TRI (the real king of Annam) has just proposed to four confessors, natives of the country—companions of Messrs. Galy and Berneux in their captivity, to apostatize; their replies are worthy of the truth and mighty power of the faith that is in them,—“We will die, if it be so required, but shall never trample on the Cross, the only means of our salvation.”

At the close of last year, the great Mandarin of this Province honored us with a Circular, in which he orders all the officials, and exhorts all the faithful and devoted citizens to exert their utmost for the apprehension of the Principal Instructors of Christianity, in order that they be subjected to the chastisement they merit. Nevertheless the circular has caused no great sensation among the Christians, who seem not at all intimidated by the circumstance, yet we have not been able to give full scope to our ministry, at least not to the extent we were enabled to do in our Church at Nerguy, where once I celebrated the Pontifical mass in the presence of upwards of three thousand Christians, besides a great number of pagans, among whom were some of the principal men of the place, so that it may be said that since the death of MINH-MENH if the fire of persecution has not been entirely extinguished, it has at least been much kept down. Still I do not think that the hour of persecution and martyrdom has past away, and I hope it has not. Pray to the Almighty to grant me the grace. It is in this expectation my prayers and the holy sacrifices are offered to evince my most sincere and heartfelt attachment.

Your very obedient servant,
JEAN, Bishop of Emaus, Coadjutor.

“THE HARVEST INDEED IS PLENTIFUL.”

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—It is stated on good authority, that in Calcutta, since your last issue, eight Protestants and two heathens were received in the Catholic Church; and seven other heathens presented themselves to a Catholic Priest, to be led into the way of salvation. Wonderful phenomenon! and, mind well, the Catholic Clergymen offer no situations, but say with the poor fisherman: “Gold and Silver I have none.” When so much is done whilst “the labourers are few;” what is not to be hoped, when they are many? Therefore let us pray “the Lord of the harvest, that he send labourers into his harvest.”

Yours respectfully,
Z.

GOOD FRIDAY

The day of great Christian sadness has arrived, the day on which the bells are hushed, the day on which the altar has no sacrifice, the day on which the sanctuary is in mourning and resounds with the voice of lamentation; the day on which mothers say to their children,—On this day our good Lord died; you also must do penance and eat dry bread with us: for on this day there ought to be mourning, not only round the altar, but in every Christian house. It is not enough for the canticles of joy to be hushed in the church, but there must be no mirth round the fire-side. In the capital, always so noisy and so bustling, it is not easy to perceive on this great day of sorrow that the bells have been hushed since the eve preceding; but in provincial towns the silence of the bells possesses a mournful solemnity; some of the public clocks do not strike, and it would seem as if time had staid its course because God is dead. On this day, in some countries, the iron tongue of time told only one hour:—

THREE O'CLOCK!

Hour of the death of the Redeemer! hour which heard the cry that made the earth quake, that split rocks asunder, that rent the veil of the temple, that made the sun hide his light, the tombs to open, the dead to rise—that great cry: “Consummatum est!” In many cities the inhabitants on Good Friday wear black, and we have seen fervent Catholics who would not ride in their carriages on the day that the Savior bathed the way of Calvary with his sweat and blood. In other days in the most Christian Kingdom (France) sadness spread from our old churches to our old palaces; and when the bishops of St. Denis and Notre Dame covered themselves with sackcloth and ashes, the successors of Celovis and St. Louis laid aside their crowns and clothed themselves in purple, the colour of royal mourning. Without wishing to blame these our days, we bewail our disinheritance of all these ancient and pious customs. In vain shall we seek for any advantage, any indemnity which earthly powers possess in having separated themselves from God: there is nothing but folly and madness in any such thought. It is a common opinion, received without contradiction throughout the church, that the apostles instituted the feasts which commemorate the mysteries that passed under their eyes. In this rank St. Augustin places the Passion, Resurrection and Descent of the Holy Ghost. But all agree that in the beginning, and indeed ever since the feast of the Passion or Good Friday, august as it always has been, was a feast of prayer, of labour and mortification, rather than of repose and rejoicing. The Latins shewed as much veneration as the Greeks for this holy day. In many places they ceased from labour. About the middle of the sixteenth century it was reduced to half a holiday, ending at mid-day after the office of the morning, together with holy Thursday and Saturday. Then they redoubled or prolonged the watchings, mortifications, spiritual reading and prayer. All the night was spent fasting in the assembly of the faithful: it was a custom derived from the apostles. No one but infants under seven years of age was exempt from fasting. The passion according to the four Evangelists was read and divided into twelve lessons: after the night the office of the day was continued to the usual time, but neither oblation nor sacrifice was offered. Nothing strikes the mind with so much sadness as the appearance of our churches. On the morning of Good Friday purple has not appeared a deep enough mourning: with black, black as if for us, have the altars of the immortal God been covered. On the pall is the crucifix exposed to our veneration. These words repeated with a slow and sorrowful tone often recur in the office of the day:—"Collocarit me in obscuris,—sicut mortuos seculi. Posuerunt super caput ejus causam ipsius scriptam, Jesus Nazarenus, Rex Judeorum. Christus factus pro nobis obediens usque ad mortem, mortem autem crucis." "He has placed me in darkness, as those that have been dead of old."

They put over his head the title of his condemnation—Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews. Christ was made obedient for us unto death, even the death of the cross.

Whilst these verses are being sung, all the priests are kneeling on the naked pavement of the sanctuary, and some acolytes cover the altar, which is without lights, without ornament, with the tabernacle empty and open, with a linen cloth. Then a chanter repeats the following prophesy of Osee:—"Thus saith the Lord, in their affliction they will rise early to me: come and let us return to the Lord. For he hath taken us, and he will heal us: he will strike, and he will cure us. He will revive us after two days: on the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight. We shall know, and we shall follow on, that we may know the Lord. His going forth is prepared as the morning light, and he will come to us as the early and the latter rain to the earth. What shall I do to thee, O Ephraim? What shall I do to thee, O Juda? Your mercy is as a morning cloud, and as the dew that goeth away in the morning. For this reason have I hewed them by the prophets, I have slain them by the words of my mouth: and thy judgments shall go forth as the light. For I desired mercy and not sacrifice, and the knowledge of God more than the holocausts. Lord, I have heard thy words, and was afraid: I considered thy works and trembled. Thou wilt appear between two animals; when the years draw near, thou wilt be known; when the time shall come, thou wilt be shown. When my soul shall be in trouble, even in thy wrath thou wilt remember thy mercy. God will come from Libanus, and the Holy One from the dark mountain. His majesty hath clouded the heavens, and the earth is full of his praise." After these prophecies the passion of our Lord is chaunted by three priests. This chaunt, which is very ancient, is in the form of a dialogue: the Jews, Pilate, Herod, the apostles, and Jesus himself, speak and answer in turn. When they come to these words, "Et inclinato capite reddidit spiritum," the chaunt ceases, profound silence reigns through the church, and nothing is heard but the sound of the faithful who fall down and kiss the ground, bathed by the blood of the Redeemer. After the passion the priest at the altar, genuflecting and extending his arms at each prayer, prays for all the world, for holy church, for the pope, for bishops, priests, deacons, and sub-deacons; for kings, catechumens, for all our wants, for heretics and schismatics, for Jews, Pagans, and idolaters. Between each of these prayers the celebrant says Flectamus genua, and the choir answers Levate; but at the prayer for the Jews, who killed the Son of God, the priest does not genuflect: by this the church expresses her horror against this-Deicide people. And now high and low, powerful and feeble, happy and miserable, rich and poor—all go to adore the cross. The priest is at the altar, and, uncovering to the people one of the branches of the tree of salvation, exclaims:—

and the choir answers:—

"In quo salus mundi pependit."

Then, advancing from the right side of the altar, and uncovering another branch of the cross, he again exclaims,—

"Ecce lignum crucis!"

and the choir again replies,—

"In quo salus mundi pependit."

Again, a third time, he says from the middle of the altar, raising his voice,—

"Ecce lignum crucis!"

The cross is then entirely uncovered and shown to the Christian crowd, who for many days, have seen it only veiled, and who now contemplate it with the head crowned with thorns, with the hands and the feet pierced with nails, with the side opened by the lance. And while the Son of Man is thus shewn, all bloody and bruised by the agonies of the passion the priest continues to sing:—Popule meus, quid feci tibi? in quo contristavi te? responde mihi:—My people what have I done to thee? or, in what have I grieved thee?—Answer me. Because I brought thee out of the land of Egypt, thou hast prepared a cross for thy Saviour. Because I was thy guide through the desert for forty years, and fed thee with manna, and brought thee into an excellent land, thou hast prepared a cross for thy Saviour. What more should I have done to thee and have not done? I have planted for thee my most beautiful vineyard, and thou hast proved very bitter to me; for in my thirst thou gavest me vinegar to drink, and piercest the side of thy Saviour with a spear. For thy sake I scourged Egypt with her first-born, and thou hast delivered me up to be scourged. My people, what have I done to thee, or in what have I grieved thee?—Answer me. I led thee out of Egypt, having drowned Pharaoh in the Red sea, and thou hast delivered me up to the chief priests. I opened the sea before thee, and thou hast opened my side with a spear. I went before thee in a pillar of cloud, and thou hast brought me to the court of Pilate. I fed thee with manna in the desert, and thou hast beaten me with buffets and stripes. I gave thee wholesome water to drink out of the rock, and thou hast given me gall and vinegar. For thy sake I smote the king of Canaan, and thou hast smote my head with a cane. I gave thee a royal sceptre, and thou hast given me a crown of thorns. By great might I raised thee on high, and thou hast hanged me on the gibbet of the cross.

Agius o theos !
 Agios ischiros !
 Sanctus fortis !
 Sanctus et immortalis, miserere nobis !

In profound grief the church looks on him, but has not words to cry out to God, O holy God—O holy mighty one—O holy immortal one,—have mercy upon us! Throughout the whole of this part of the office there reigns a paroxysm of grief, and in this anguish those simple and affecting words, “O my people, what have I done to thee,” often recur and strike the coldest heart. If there be kings present in the church, they may here take their part in the lesson which is given to the powers of the earth. If they have had cause to complain of their subjects; if their country has repaid with exile and proscription the good which they were anxious to do; if those who have fed, clothed, and housed the poor have no longer an asylum for themselves; if those who lived in palaces have not now a stone whereon to lay their heads, let them not complain too bitterly, but let them place their royal griefs at the foot of the Divine griefs of Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews, and Son of the Eternal Lord Jehovah, the God of empires and of armies! The dolorous hymns and versicles of the Passion are sung alternately, whilst the unveiled crucifix is exposed on a cushion, covered with black cloth, like a deceased king laying on his funeral bed of state. To come and kiss the hands and the feet of the Saviour which were pierced with nails, and the side that was opened by the spear, the highest in dignity and power, kings, archbishops, bishops and princes if any be present in the church, take off their shoes and adore with naked feet. The crowd follows and accompanies them, for he died for all; and the beggar, who holds out his hand for an alms at the door of the church, shares as largely the merits of the Redeemer's blood as the monarch and the pontiff. On the eve, when the blessed sacrament had been carried from the high altar to the chapel tomb, the sanctuary had displayed all its pomp. Copes, red with embossed gold, albs richly flowered with lace, eastern dalmatics, the silver cross and candlesticks, the purest incense of Arabia, the solemn tones of the organ accompanied the Pange lingua; but on Good Friday, in silence and sadness, without organ, without splendour, the holy species are borne to the sanctuary to be consumed by the priest. After communion the office is finished, and if the crowd still lingers, it is to go and kiss the cross. Throughout this day of death old men and young men, women and children, succeed each other in this adoration.* Before the crucifix stands a plate of silver or copper, in which rich and poor bestow their alms, for on the day of sorrow the unfortunate poor ought not to be forgotten. At seven o'clock in the morning, before labourers have gone to their daily work, the passion of our Lord has been preached; at three o'clock in the afternoon, the hour at which Jesus Christ died, it is again preached; in the city everybody is anxious to have his feelings stirred by the recital of the griefs of a God. For nearly 2,000 years has the passion of our Lord been preached to the faithful; with faith and love the Christian priest can still move to tears; he has springs which never can be dried up, narrations which surpass eloquence and art, study and human ornaments. I shall never forget having heard a missionary, a pilgrim, returning from Jerusalem, full of the recollections of the holy city; he related all the stations of the dolorous way of the cross, and his discourse, lively, simple, strong, and picturesque, fairly made his audience see the sweat, the tears, and the blood which had watered the way of Golgotha.† Whilst listening to him we had, so to speak, crossed the seas, the priest descended from the old crusading chevaliers. Imagined ourselves by turns now in the garden of Olives—now in the palace of Caiphas—now in the judgment-hall of Pilate; with him we became pilgrims, performing the stations; with him we climbed the steep ascent of Calvary; with him we groaned, repented, prayed, and hoped.

Good Friday closes with the chaunt of the Stabat Mater, that hymn of a mother's grief, which the women repeat in tears because they can conceive better than ourselves the anguish of the mother seated at the foot of the cross. It was not necessary for Pergolèse to compose his immortal master-piece in order to move our feelings; the simple chaunt of the church is, to my mind, full of grief and resignation. This recital of the griefs of Mary surpasses all the magic of art, all the pomp of the largest churches. In the hamlet, before the humble altar in mourning, the women, mothers, singing the verses alternately with the priest and the two choir boys, is enough to make the heart feel and the eyes to weep. Let not those who read this imagine that I wish to deprive our prayers of the wings which good music lends. I am rejoiced to see the arts sanctified by coming near the altar: the true mission of the fine arts is, to give glory to God. But I do wish that on entering the church, they leave their worldly air, and bring not into the sanctuary profane thoughts and recollections. The music which praises God ought to be new, so that they who hear it may not be able to say,—we have heard this elsewhere.—Orthodox Journals.

Monasteries in England are nearly no more; yet justice is due to an order of men, which was formerly an illustrious part of this nation, and abounded in persons eminent for birth, learning, and piety. The veil which death throws over the ashes of good and great men is sacred; and to cast dirt upon their shrine, is shocking to the most savage barbarian; yet some have made it a point of merit. Bishop Burnet says (and many after him repeat) “that the monks were become lewd and dissolute, when the order was suppressed among us.” But the Protestant Henry Wharton,† in his Specimen of Errors in Burnet's History of the Reformation, answers this slander in the following manner, p. 142: “God forbid

* It is needless to observe that, throughout this article adoration, when applied to the cross, is employed in the sense of veneration.

* M. l'Abbe Forbin, afterwards bishop of Nanci.

† Under the name of Anthony Hamer.

that any professors of Christianity, much less the greatest pretenders to it, should be guilty of such monstrous wickedness, or that any others should believe it of them, without evident proof. Surely if the monks had been guilty of such things, it could not have escaped the knowledge of their visitors, who searched and divulged all their faults with the utmost industry. Nor would it have been unknown to Bale, brought up among them, or omitted by him in his English Votaries, wherein he has set himself to defame the monastic order, and the unmarried clergy, with insatiable malice." It were to be wished, that they who claim greater indulgences, would seriously reflect, that the glaring irregularities of two or three members, bring an undistinguishing censure upon a whole body; make a noise, and alarm the world, as if all flesh had corrupted its way: whereas the sober, modest, and humble worth of a much greater number, who there in private follow the duties of the wise and good, must, in the nature of the thing, escape the notice of the world. Notorious disorders, how few soever are concerned, strike the senses of some, and affect the passions of many more; and by their senses and passions the gross of mankind generally judge of things; but it requires a greater degree of reflection, than the bulk of mankind will give themselves the trouble to make, to consider, that great numbers must have spent their time profitably, formed habits of a just way of thinking, and laid in that stock of knowledge and virtue, which they have produced into view in a more public sphere; that those vices, which they complain of, may not be the native growth of the place, but imported from irregular and undisciplined families; from schools,—and from the worst of schools,—the world at large. The same learned divine and historian, in an answer to another charge of Bishop Burnet, importing that the monks, about the end of the eighth century, had possessed themselves of the greatest part of the riches of the nation, shows (page 40) that the monks had not then probably gained the hundredth part, though, afterwards, in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, they increased exceedingly in number and possessions. "But after all," says he, "they will never be found to have possessed above the fifth part of the riches of the nation, and considering they were wont to lease out their lands for easy fines, and small rents, they did not in reality possess the tenth part of the riches of the nation. Then, for that other charge, that the best part of the soil being in such ill hands, it was the interest of the nation to have it put to better uses, it is altogether erroneous. From the beginning to the end, none improved their lands and possessions to better advantages than the monks, by building, cultivating, and all other methods, while they kept them in their hands. Of this Croyland is to this day a manifest instance. And when they leased them out to others, it was the interest of the nation to have such easy tenures continued to a great number of persons. To this it may be added, that they contributed to the public charges of the nation, equally with the other clergy; and the clergy always contributed in proportion with the laity, so that we cannot find to what better uses these possessions have been since put."

Bishop Tanner, and several other Protestant writers, also observe, that the Church lands, after the Conquest, contributed to all public burdens equally with the laity. Another celebrated Protestant historian, Mr. Mallet, in his History of the Helvetians, vol. i. p. 10, expresses his opinion of the services rendered by the religious to society, in the following terms:—"The monks softened, by their instructions, the ferocious manners of the people, and opposed their credit to the despotism of the nobility, who knew no other occupation than war, and grievously oppressed their subjects and inferiors. On this account the government of the monks was preferred to their's. The people sought them for judges; and it was an usual saying, that it was better to be governed by a bishop's crosier, than by a monarch's sceptre. The monks were engaged in useful employments; they cleared and cultivated desert and savage lands; and we find that in many places where those missionaries established themselves, agriculture, next to preaching, was their principal occupation. Was it possible that such men should not be venerated during their lives, and after their deaths?"

After the barbarians had overrun the whole of the Roman Empire of the West, all the learning and piety in Europe which had escaped their ravages, were chiefly confined to the monasteries they had spared, or after their conversion re-established. These had schools to which both laymen and persons intended for the Church resorted. In those schools were brought up the apostles of England, Belgium, Gaul, Germany, and the other countries of Europe towards the north,—St. Austin, Willibrod, Anscarius, Boniface, &c. &c. These holy prelates founded religious communities, which exhibited the eminent virtue and fervour of the primitive solitaries. Venerable Bede, St. Odo, St. Bernard, St. Thomas of Aquin, St. Bonaventure, St. Anselm, &c. were men who would have done honour to the most enlightened ages. It was in monasteries that the treasures of all sort of antiquities were found: it was in them that several precious works of ancient writers were discovered, which must have perished in the general confusion of barbarous ages, without these asylums where religion still threw out some light. It was there the holy Scriptures were preserved and copied with the greatest care, as were likewise the writings of the fathers, the canons of the Church, the public records, the titles of families, and all other precious manuscripts of sacred and profane literature, which have been so conducive to the revival of letters, and the liberal arts among us. In a word, the purest practice of the gospel was preserved in monasteries, whilst it was more or less corrupted in the world. It was a very important service rendered to religion and learning, carefully to have collected whatever concerned the belief and the manners of the Christians, the revolutions of empires, and succession of kings, during the space of several centuries: to have transmitted to us the laws and discipline of the Church; the names of the great men who have distinguished themselves either by their talents or their sanctity; to have copied their works and preserved those of ancient authors. And to whom are we indebted for all these precious advantages, but to religious? An Alexander, a Cæsar, a Homer, a Virgil, a Cicero, a Plato, a Demosthenes, a Tacitus, &c. would have remained entirely unknown to us, had it not been for the labours of poor religious, who neither wished for nor claimed the honour of adding their own names to those which they saved from eternal oblivion. It is by the continued researches of these pious solitaries that those precious collections of books were formed and first known in Europe. According to the rule of St. Benedict, each monastery was to be furnished with a library; and the religious houses which were destitute of one, were considered as a camp, destitute of the most necessary means of defence. Claustrum sine armario, quasi castrum sine armamentario. "A cloister without a library is like unto a castle without an armoury." And it is indeed from the libraries of monasteries that those precious manuscripts have been taken, which, since the invention of the art of printing, have enriched us with so many excellent works in every branch of sacred and profane literature. When the art of printing was unknown, the generality of the people and the nobles themselves could neither read nor write; the monks recorded the transactions of their times. In several monasteries, it was a constant practice to choose from among the members of the community the most learned of the religious, who wrote with exactness the most memorable events of each reign. At the death of this religious, the fruit of his researches and observations was laid before the general chapter, and after mature examination they were redacted into a sort of chronicle, which was kept for the instruction of posterity. "Had it not been for the labours of the monks," said Sir John Markham, "the English would be still but children in the history of their own country." What would Usher, Cave, Tillemont, Montfaucon, Mabillon, Fleury, Bingham, Gale, Spelman, and other historians, have done, if from Hugh, a regular canon of St. Victor in the twelfth century, up to Paladius, a monk in the fifth, monasteries had not supplied them with an uninterrupted succession of witnesses attesting the events of their age. In our own country, Bede, Ingulf, Turgot, William of Malmesbury, Matthew Paris, and Matthew of Westminster, have rendered this service; and many celebrated men in other countries, whom it would be too long to insert, have done the same. The Bulgarians owe their conversion to two monks,—Theodore Cepharias, who had been prisoner in Bulgaria for many years, and Methodius.*—This great work was accomplished by the following means. Bogoris, King of the Bulgarians, was inclined to the Christian faith by the assiduous and long persuasions of his sister, who had zealously embraced it at Constantinople, having been taken captive very young, and detained a long time in the court of the pious Empress Theodora. This prince had also several conversations with the monk Theodore; but the fear of exciting a revolt among his subjects, who were still strongly attached to their superstitions, prevented him from yielding to the voice of his conscience, till God was pleased to awaken him by a more powerful call. As he was passionately fond of hunting, he desired the Emperor of Constantinople to procure him a picture, which should be a curious hunting-piece. Methodious, according to the custom of many devout monks in that age (845) employed himself in drawing pious pictures, and was excellent in that art; he was sent, therefore, to the court of the king, who, having built a palace, was desirous of adorning it with paintings. He gave the good monk an order to draw him some piece, the very sight of which would strike terror into those who held it. Methodious thinking nothing more terrifying than the general judgment, represented, in the most lively colours and with exquisite art, that awful scene, with kings, princes, and people, standing promiscuously before the throne of the great Judge, who appeared armed with all the terror of infinite majesty and justice, and attended with angels ready to execute his sentence. Some were placed on the right hand and some on the left. This moving sight, and the punishment of the reprobate, which was represented also in the picture, and still much more the explication of every part of this dreadful scene by Methodious, made the deepest impression on the king's mind, and from that moment he began to fear God more than his subjects, and resolved to be baptised; but though the ceremony had been secretly performed during the night, the news of the king's conversion was soon noised abroad: the Bulgarians, enraged, took up arms and marched in open rebellion towards the palace. Bogoris, animated with a lively faith and undaunted courage, placed himself immediately at the head of his guards, forty-eight only in number, and taking a little cross which he carried on his breast sallied forth from his palace, attacked the rebels, and defeated them in an instant. This victory restored order and submission among the Bulgarians; and a short time after his people imitated his example, and embraced the faith. Methodious was not only a skilful painter; he was also a zealous apostle and an eminent scholar. Assisted by his brother Cyril, he brought about the conversion of the Bulgarians, Moravians, &c. Studowski, in his Sacra Moravia Historia, styles Cyril and Methodious the apostles of Moravia, Upper Bohemia, Silesia, Lusatia, Croatia, Circassia, &c., and almost all the Slavonian nations. The two brothers invented the Slavonian alphabet, translated the Bible from the Greek into the Slavonic tongue, and likewise the Liturgy, and instituted mass to be said in the same, which was approved of by Pope John VIII., to whom Methodious had repaired to give him an account of his mission among the barbarians; and the version is to this day used in all the Churches which adhere to the Slavonian rites. This is another instance of the ignorance of monks, and of the prohibition of the holy Scriptures to Catholics.

In the ages, called with scorn and derision the ages of ignorance and monkery, our illiterate ancestors did not confine their benevolence to those transient acts of generosity, so common and so much extolled in our days, and which, notwithstanding their boasted extent, have always left the poor to be supported by taxes levied upon the public at large. These good and virtuous men, in their enlarged views, provided for the present and future generations: they thought that they should draw down upon themselves and upon their offspring, the blessings of heaven, and merit the gratitude of their country and of posterity, in founding establishments, in which the praises of the Almighty should be sung, and his most holy law preached to the end of time. They imagined that, by erecting on their estates convents of both sexes, which was without the least expense to the state, they should afford (as they actually did, for many centuries) sure and permanent resources to the poor, harbours always open to the distressed, useful and ever-subsisting censors of public licentiousness, and sanctuaries where the humble and pure virtues of the gospel could be cultivated with security and peace. Whether our forefathers, or our contemporaries, have merited most of religion and humanity, let the reader decide! Since the beginning of the last century, London, Bath, Bristol, Liverpool, &c. have been increasing every day in riches, extent, and population. The streets, squares, gardens, and theatres, are beautiful and commodious. As for the places of religious worship, either of the Established Church, or other persuasions, it must strike the eyes of an observer how mean they are. Most of them low and narrow brick buildings, which would not be judged fit for concert-rooms; they are only distinguished from private houses by their despicable construction; erected more from a sordid speculation than from disinterested and noble motives of religion. The only thing thought of is, how many pews are wanted to afford a handsome benefit to the architect, and a sufficient salary to the clergyman who is to attend the divine service on Sundays: but whether their solidity, size, and architecture answer the religious purposes to which they are destined, is not the least regarded. And, indeed, if the actual inhabitants of London were now as punctual as they were in former times, in coming to church to hear the word of God, all the churches, chapels, and meeting-houses now subsisting, would not be sufficient to contain the tenth part of its population.

Our simple and plain ancestors, in monkish times directed by narrow-minded and bigoted monks, thought that no expense should be spared to erect the most majestic temples to the honour of the Almighty. They inhabited uncomfortable houses; but their genius, grandeur, and elevation of thought were displayed in the places of religious worship, with a taste and magnificence which have never been surpassed, and very seldom equalled, in modern times. Westminster Abbey, the Cathedrals of Lincoln, Salisbury, Wells, and York, are still subsisting monuments of this truth, and excite the admiration of lovers of the fine arts. What shall we conclude from this melancholy contrast? That egotism is always sordid, and truly narrow-minded in all its undertakings, and that religion being no longer considered by our politicians as the only solid basis of public prosperity, all that concerns religion, its influence, or preservation, is either entirely laid aside, or treated with the utmost indifference.

But it is objected against the monks, that they ~~had lost the spirit of their institute; that men who had made vows of poverty, inhabited palaces.~~

It must be acknowledged that their houses were stately buildings, their churches magnificently adorned, that all which served for divine worship was sumptuous and of the most exquisite workmanship. That the halls, chapter-rooms, and apartments destined for the abbot and guests, were nobly though simply furnished; the libraries abounding with works of the best ancient and modern writers in every language; the courts, cloisters, refectories, spacious and well-adapted to their respective uses; the gardens and orchards, producing all the riches with which a beneficent Providence always repays the labours of industry and perseverance but those who have assisted at the meals of the lords of these great estates, have found that they were satisfied with a homely fare, most of them living throughout the year on fish and vegetables; * they drank but the most common wines, in the countries where it is the beverage of the poor, as well as of the rich, and elsewhere, table-beer, or small cider. Our servants would bitterly complain if they had for their breakfast, what was judged sufficient for the dinner, supper, &c. of a monk. Those who have visited the rooms occupied by the inhabitants of these palaces, can testify that they were only little cells about ten feet square, without a fireplace, and without any furniture, but a plain bedstead, with a straw bed or mattress, a table, a praying desk, a crucifix, two or three chairs, a few plain engravings, and a book-shelf. The Petaus, Mabillons, Montfaucons, Kirchers. Malbranches, Houbigants, Calmets, Bourdaloues, and in our days, the Guerangers,—who corresponded with all the learned societies of Europe, who reckoned among their friends and admirers the greatest men of their age, and whose immortal works will be transmitted to the latest posterity, were not better accommodated.

MISCELLANEA.

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER'S DAY.—The annual celebration of the Feast of the great St. Francis Xavier, of the Society of Jesus, Apostle of the Indies, and Special Patron of the Association for the Propagation of the Faith, being transferred from the 3d, which was the first Sunday in Advent, was observed with marked devotion in the Church of St. Francis, in Gardiner-street, on Monday last. The high priest was the Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe, Coadjutor Bishop of Bengal, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Kavanagh and the Rev. Charles Young as deacons, and the Rev. Mr. Quin as master of the ceremonies. After the first Gospel, the Rev. Mr. St. Leger delivered a powerful and beautiful panegyric on the great Apostle of modern times.—Tablet.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY.—Thursday, the 30th ult., being the feast of St. Andrew the Apostle, was observed with the usual devotion in the Church of St. Andrew, Westland-row. This being the 34th anniversary of the consecration of the venerable Archbishop of Dublin, as usual, his attendance in this parish, of which his Grace was so many years the ornament and administrator, was anxiously expected. Indisposition of some day's standing, however, confined him to his room. He is, however, now perfectly convalescent. The Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe presided, and the Rev. W. Mulhall preached an eloquent and affecting sermon on the Life and Virtues of St. Andrew.—Ibid.

CATHOLIC MISSIONARY COLLEGE OF ALL HALLOWS, DRUMCONDRA, DUBLIN.—The Right Rev. Dr. Oliffe visited this establishment on the 28th and 29th ult., and celebrated Mass in the little chapel attached to the college on the morning of the 29th. Having administered the Holy Communion to ecclesiastical students, his Lordship delivered a moving and pious exhortation to these young aspirants to the Apostleship of foreign countries; two of whom, Mr. J. Martin and Mr. M'Carthy, left on Monday for the Cape of Good Hope, where they wait the pleasure of the V. A. the Right Rev. Dr. Griffiths. Two are about to leave for Calcutta, and two are leaving for the College of Gap, in France—previously to their departure for the vicariate of Agra—under the Right Rev. Dr. Borghi. There are forty students preparing for other dioceses. Rev. J. Hand has already received nearly 4,000*l.* for this good work.

RESTITUTION THROUGH CONFESSION.—John Reynolds, Esq., 16, D'Olier-street, acknowledges to have received 15*l.* restitution money, per the hands of the Rev. J. Smith, St. Michael and St. John's Chapel.—Mr. Patrick Sheehy, of Ballycannon, near Croagh, county Limerick, thankfully acknowledges the receipt of 8*l.* 10*s.*, restitution money, per the Rev. J. Mahon, R.C. C.—Freeman.

HEREFORD.—CONVERTS.—The conversion to the Catholic Church, of Mrs. Lamb and her two daughters, of Widemarsh, near the above city, and who are descended from an ancient and highly respectable county family of the name of Hereford, has produced a great deal of asperity and ill-feeling between the Rev. John Venn, Vicar of St. Peter's, and the Rev. Mr. Waterworth, the Catholic Priest. To convince these amiable ladies of their error on the one side, and to fortify them in their resolution of renouncing their Protestant principles on the other side, a meeting was held, by appointment, at their residence, when, after a five hours' discussion between Mr. Venn and Mr. Waterworth, they separated, without (to use the latter gentleman's own words), settling one single point! This is a pretty good proof of the inutility of religious disputations. Mr. Venn has since challenged Mr. Waterworth to a public controversy, which has been declined; but Mr. Waterworth commenced a reply to the allegations and serious charges made by Mr. Venn against the Romish Church, in his chapel, on Sunday last, which was not more than usually filled with hearers. The Catholic community at Hereford boast that they are continually receiving proselytes from the Protestant Church in that city.—Gloucester Journal.

ROME.—On Saturday last, 9th inst. the Rev. Dr. J. O'Connell left Dublin for Rome on business of importance to religion. This esteemed and learned ecclesiastic, who is the author of the able letter "On the True Mode of the Real Presence, or Transubstantiation," to Dr. Pusey, has been solicited by a noble and amiable Catholic lord to write another tract in answer to his reverend opponents. It may be expected to appear before his return from the eternal city.—Tablet, Dec. 16, 1843.

CONVERSIONS IN CONNECTICUT.—The New Englander states that within the last five and twenty years, no less than three clergymen of the Episcopal church in Connecticut have become Papists; viz. Dr. Kewley of Middleton, Mr. Barber of Waterbury, and Mr. White of Derby.—Baptist Record.—Slow progress! Twenty-five in three years to come will not satisfy us. However, we'll take what we can get!—Catholic Herald, Nov. 22.

SYDNEY.—ST. PATRICK'S CHURCH.—The stonework of this exquisite specimen of "Ecclesiastical Architecture" is now completed. It is, without exception, the most chaste and tasteful edifice—the best built church in the southern hemisphere. It reflects imperishable credit on all concerned and connected with the erection of this sacred temple. The building is 116 feet long, by 37 feet wide in the clear: it stands on a commanding site, given as a donation by Mr. William Davis, of Church-hill. An offer of from 2,000*l.* to 3,000*l.* was frequently made him for this valuable piece of building-ground, which he generously refused, in order to make a free-will offering of it to the service of the Almighty.—Australasian Chronicle, 29th June.

NEW YORK.—The Truth Teller quotes the Catholic Herald for the following appointments:—For the vacant see of Charleston, Very Rev. Ignatius Reynolds, Vicar-General of the diocese of Louisville; for the new see of Hartford, Connecticut, Very Rev. William Tyler, Vicar-General of Boston; as coadjutor to the Bishop of Boston, Rev. John Fitzpatrick, pastor of St. Mary's Church, Boston; as coadjutor to the Bishop of New York, Rev. John M'Closkey, pastor of St. Joseph's Church, New York; for the new see of Milwaukee, in Wisconsin, Very Rev. J. M. Henmi, Vicar-General of Cincinnati; for the new see of Chicago, Illinois, Rev. William Quarter, pastor of St. Mary's Church, New York; for the new see of Little Rock, Arkansas, Rev. Andrew Byrne, pastor of Nativity Church, New York; for the Apostolic Vicariate, Oregon Territory, Rev. Mr. Blanchet, Indian Missionary. We know but three personally—the Very Rev. Mr. Henmi, of this city, the Rev. Mr. Quarter, of New York, and Rev. Mr. Reynolds, of Louisville, and if the others are equally eminent in piety and learning, better selections could not have been made to sustain the honour of the episcopacy. These announcements are said to have been confirmed. We are pleased to find that the Bishop of Cincinnati has arrived by the Caledonia. We are disappointed in our hopes of the arrival of the Bishop of Pittsburgh. The Right Rev. Dr. Hughes administered the Sacrament of Confirmation in St. Mary's Church, on Sunday morning last, at eight o'clock Mass. About three hundred persons, males and females, were confirmed. Of this number some were converts to the Catholic faith. At half-past ten o'clock Mass, the bishop preached. His sermon was contro-versal, and forcibly pointed out the necessity of a Divine mission on the part of those ministers who preach the word of God.—Truth Teller, Nov. 25.

ALBANY.—Three respectable Protestants—a gentleman and two ladies—on last evening, at vespers, in St. Mary's Church, renounced their former errors, and audibly read their profession of the holy Catholic faith, and were received by the zealous pastor of St. Mary's into the "one fold."

PROGRESS OF CATHOLICITY IN PHILADELPHIA.—Previously to the year 1733 (but 110 years ago) the few Catholics in Philadelphia held meetings for religious worship in a private dwelling, and were occasionally visited by a minister from the Catholic colony of Maryland. In 1734 the Rev. Mr. Crayton was formally commissioned by the proper authority in Maryland to settle in Philadelphia; and by him a lot was purchased near Fourth-street, and south of Walnut-street, and a small chapel erected of one story. It was dedicated to St. Joseph, and afterwards enlarged to the dimensions of forty, by forty, as the Society increased in numbers. There are now—in 1811—four chapels, and it is computed there are 15,000 members in the city and suburbs. Thus it appears, that in 1733, when the population of Philadelphia was about 12,000, the number of Catholics was less than 500; that is, less than one to every twenty-five inhabitants. In 1811, when the population was 110,000, the number of Catholic was set down at 15,000 or one to every seven inhabitants. In 1840 the population was 250,000, and the Catholic portion of it estimated at more than 45,000, or one to every five inhabitants. So that in the last thirty years the whole population has but little more than doubled, while the Catholic portion of it has more than trebled. The increase in the number of Catholic churches has been in almost exact proportion to the increase in the Catholic population. St. Joseph's, the first Catholic church in this city, was as before stated, built in 1733. Of its dimensions I am only able to say, that it was less than forty feet square, to which size it was afterwards enlarged. In 1763, thirty years subsequently, St. Mary's was built on a lot extending from Fourth to Fifth-street, above Spruce (then out of the built-up part of the city, now in the very centre of the city, and worth probably 50,000 dollars). What was its original size I have no means of ascertaining; it was enlarged in 1810, and made 100 feet in length by 74 in width. Holy Trinity was built in 1789, twenty-six years after the building of St. Mary's; it is 100 feet by 61, and is without galleries. St. Augustine's, about 100 by 50, was built in 1800, eleven years after the building of Holy Trinity, by a Priest of the order of St. Augustine. This was followed by the enlargement of St. Mary's in 1810, and by the addition of twenty-seven feet to the length of St. Joseph's in 1824. In 1823 St. John's was built in a style of splendour and magnificence that surpassed every Church then in Philadelphia. This was followed by the rapid erection of St. Michael's, St. Francis's, the present St. Joseph's, St. Philip's, and St. Patrick's; the two last spacious and commodious, and built on the freest plan. There is now building in the Northern part of the city St. Peter's, for the German congregation; and St. Paul's, in the south-western part of the city, for the numerous Irish and native Catholics of that district. The last (St. Paul's) will be roofed in, in a few days, and is larger than any Catholic or Protestant Church in this city. It is 160 feet in length and 80 in width, and will contain more than 2,500 persons. So that in another year, there will be, for a population of 45,000 eleven churches, capable of containing 25,000 persons, while in 1811 there were for a population of 15,000, four churches, with room for about 6,000. The number of priests engaged in parochial duty in 1811, was five, or one to every 3,000 souls; there are, at present, besides those engaged in the seminary, seventeen performing pastoral duties; that is, one for every 2,000 souls. In the "Picture of Philadelphia for 1811," before referred to, it is stated that there were supported at the Orphan Asylum of St. Joseph's, (incorporated in 1807) fifteen orphans, being one for every 1,000 of the Catholic population; there were supported during the year 1842, at the Asylums of St. Joseph's and St. John's, more than 160 orphans, being one for every 350 of the present Catholic population. This, taken in connection with the support of a Seminary where, are educated and maintained thirty students for the ministry, is a striking evidence of the increased zeal and liberality of the Catholics of Philadelphia. A Spiritual Retreat for the Laity of this city, or a course of religious exercises, according to the method and spirit of Saint Ignatius of Loyola, will take place at St. Joseph's Church, beginning on Sunday next the 12th instant, and ending on the following Sunday.

AFRICA.—They write from Algiers that for the future priests will be sent with the hospital steamships that bring the sick from Africa to France, that these unfortunates may have the consolations of religion on their voyage. The Bishop of Algiers himself will prescribe a religious service to be performed on board these vessels; and the mess and allowance of the clergy so employed has been already arranged.

ACWORTH GRANGE—A BEAUTIFUL GEM.—The chapel at Acworth Grange, recently built by Lady Tempest (writes a correspondent), exceeds for beauty anything that I can describe. Greater richness, nay gorgeousness, was surely never seen in so small a compass; it is said to have cost upwards of ten thousand pounds, and does infinite credit to the noble lady by whose liberality this sweet sanctuary has been erected. Oh, for the honour of God, and the name we bear as Englishmen, may such acts of munificence as Lady Tempest's become extensively followed in this country by all those who have it in their power to "go and do likewise."—Tablet, Dec. 16, 1844.

DIVORCE IN NEW JERSEY.—Mary Ann F. Randolph from her husband Stelle F. Randolph. He was a Baptist preacher, but took it into his head one day, having a family of several children, to travel off with another woman. He wrote back a letter, stating that it was not his intention to return.—Irish Citizen.—The sang froid with which these things are done is frightful.—Catholic Herald, of Philadelphia.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1844.

[Vol. VI.]

AN EXAMINATION OF THE ARGUMENT CONTAINED IN A RECENT PAMPHLET by the Rev C. J. Quartley, entitled, May I Separate from the Church of England? BY THE REV THOMAS SMITH, Missionary of the Free Church of Scotland. Calcutta, 1844.

When we directed our readers' attention, about six weeks ago, to a tiny publication, entitled,—May I continue a member of the Church of England? we were right in thinking that it would create considerable sensation among the various classes of religionists in Calcutta. That little authorless, undated tract, of 12 small pages, with very little literary or theological pretensions, has been already the occasion of two rather lengthy pamphlets in disproof and in support of its views respectively.

This circumstance seems to indicate, that a sore point (if every point be not sore) in the Church of England's frame work and constitution, has been touched; and we deem it next to impossible, that the pamphlet whose title is at the head of this article, can be the last on the subject controverted. The Church of England, as by law in Calcutta established, and Rev. Mr. Quartley in particular, cannot allow the matter to rest where the Advocate of the half Kirk has placed it.

We consider the Rev. Mr. Quartley and the Rev. Mr. Smith very fit and proper representatives of their respective Churches; and as they appear to be pretty well matched in natural powers, clerical acquirements, and respectability of character, the controversy in which they are now fairly engaged, cannot fail to be interesting, however long continued.

Before we treat our readers to a specimen of Mr. Smith's views and arguments, we cannot help observing that we were surprised at the low estimation in which he holds his adversary personally. He seems to think that Mr. Quartley is a bad advocate, and that the Church of England, "notwithstanding her lack catalogue of evils," has reason to be dissatisfied with his defence. The truth or inaccuracy of this judgement will be best decided by a pamphlet or two more from each side. We now proceed to extract, what appears to us most interesting in Mr. Smith's answer to Mr. Quartley, and we leave the candid sincere Protestant to decide, whether the arguments of both jointly taken prove or not, that the separation from the Catholic Church, which took place in the 16th century, was unjustifiable in principle, and practically calamitous in its consequences, to the best interests of religion. War, without the prospect of a speedy and lasting peace, is the greatest temporal calamity; a religious war of that description is the greatest spiritual calamity; and who is there so inexperienced, so little read, so enthusiastically short-sighted as to foretell a peace, or even a truce, between the belligerent fragments of the Protestant reformation, among themselves. Mr. Quartley maintained that the Church of England, though bad enough, was quite as pure and immaculate as the Church of Corinth in the time of St. Paul, but the Missionary of the Free Church of Scotland thinks that there is no resemblance whatever between the two Churches.

"We would submit," says Mr. Smith, "that the state of the Church of England is in many respects as different from that of the Church of Corinth as two states can well be. It is a Church of long standing. It has been subjected to various vicissitudes in the providence of God: and throughout, it has retained much in its constitution, that all but its most blind and bigotted, or its most interested admirers, admit to be very evil. Attempts have been constantly repeated for nearly three hundred years to purify it, but almost in vain. There is no reasonable probability that it will be in any considerable degree reformed for a very long time to come. There is no power within the Church capable of correcting the abuses that exist in it; and in this respect it differs entirely from the Corinthian Church, whose members are addressed throughout by the apostle as having in their own hands the power, by an act of their own, to remedy all the evils in which they were involved. But on this highly important point we shall have more say in the sequel."

The following defence of the Catholic Church, against Mr. Quartley's calumny, is worthy of notice:—

"But how, it will naturally be asked, does Mr. Quartley justify the secession of the Church of England from Rome at the time of the Reformation? This very natural question Mr. Quartley sets himself to answer. His answer is one of the most unsatisfactory parts of his remarkably unsatisfactory work. He lays down the distinction, that, no matter how much evil of every kind there be in a Church, the mere existence of that evil can never justify separation from that Church; but that separation becomes justifiable when a Church not only teaches but imposes error; when it not only corrupts the faith, but *demand*s the profession of a false faith. 'For a long time' (says he), 'the Church of Rome, though corrupt even to the core, refrained from exercising this unbearable tyranny: even when her doctors, her priests and her bishops taught error, the symbols of faith were sound, and a christian man might remain within her pale. But when she insisted on sinful terms of communion,—when she insisted upon lying confessions as a test of membership—when the Bible-denying declarations of the creed of Pope Pius IV. were exacted as the belief of her members and her ministers—then did she impose a yoke grievous to be borne.'

"Now no one will deny that there is a difference in degree between the sin of teaching error and that of imposing error. But the difference of duty in regard to separating from the church that merely teaches error, and from that which imposes error, is entirely a fiction of Mr. Quartley's own mind. There is no foundation for it at all in scripture."

"Mr. Quartley professes to refer the whole matter to the word of God, and yet he introduces distinctions of his own which the bible does not acknowledge, and runs directly counter to the spirit and the letter of the divine word."

"But this same is a most unfortunate distinction for Mr. Quartley. The Creed of Pope Pius, according to our reading of Ecclesiastical history, was never imposed on the members of the Romish communion until it was so imposed by the Council of Trent; and that Council was held not before but after the Reformation in Germany, Switzerland and England. Mr. Quartley makes mention of the Council of Constance, but, so far as his argument is concerned, he might as well not have alluded to it at all. The Council of Constance did not impose any error. Its chief acts were the forbidding of the wine to the body of Christians in the sacrament, and the condemnation of Huss and Jerome. The former was merely abridging the privileges of the members of the Church, and therefore could not be on Mr. Quartley's principle any just cause of secession. If the condemnation of Huss and Jerome of Prague be considered as an imposition of error, it were difficult to find a time after the middle of the fourth century when error was not imposed. The Council of Constance, therefore, according to Mr. Quartley's principle, could not justify secession from the Romish communion, and nothing that occurred till the Council of Trent made separation justifiable. Now the imposition of error by the Council of Trent could not form any excuse for the separation that took place before it was held; and therefore the Reformation in Germany, Switzerland and England, is unjustifiable!"

The following extracts will show that, in Mr. Smith's opinion, there is as good and solid a reason for separating now from the Church of England as there was from that of Rome in the 16th Century.

"The evils that exist in the Church of England are a black catalogue. A few of them have been very gently, and at the same time very well, enumerated in the tract entitled 'Can I continue a member of the Church of England?' Mr. Quartley's argument did not in the slightest degree require that he should palliate or apologise for these evils. Yet he does strive to cast a cloak over those evils whose existence he cannot deny."

"As a Presbyterian we can make no distinction between the exercise of patronage in the appointment of ministers, and in the appointment of Bishops. And even to an Episcopalian the principle is just the same. Mr. Quartley attempts to throw all the blame of the improper use of patronage off the Church upon the patrons themselves. But, to take the lowest possible view of the matter, is not the Church at least a partaker of the sins of these men? Yea has she not grievously sinned in alienating her own inherent rights as a Church of Christ, to parties who possess merely a secular worldly qualification? In the opinion of almost all Christians without her own pale, and in that of a large number of the members of her own communion, she has. Nor have the checks that she has apparently kept in her own hand, been practically of the slightest avail. Is there any instance since the Reformation of a Dean and Chapter refusing to nominate the man whom the king or queen, that is to say the minister of the day, has 'given the leave to elect?' We believe not. Mr. Quartley intimates that the consequence of such a course of procedure would be a premunire. We are not enough of a lawyer to know the true and proper meaning of this term, but at all events it is a civil penalty. Or is there any instance of an archbishop refusing to consecrate the man presented by the mock-election of the Dean and Chapter? We believe none."

"Before parting with Mr. Quartley from this branch of his and our subject, we must repeat that all these abuses the Church as a church does sanction;—that she has consented to the alienation of all power in herself to remove them. No power in the Church can remove patronage from the Church of England. It has become part and parcel of the constitution both of the Church and of the State; and there is no human probability that the burden will ever be removed, until an entire and complete change be effected in the relation that subsists between the Church and the State. But such a change the members of the Church of England, as long as they continue such, are precluded from seeking after. Patronage is part of the Royal prerogative, impeachment of which is declared by the second Canon to subject a man ipso facto to excommunication. Did the Apostle Paul separate from Barnabas on account of a single instance of patronage? And are men to be asked whether they may separate from a Church which by its unalterable law makes it as punishable an offence to speak against patronage, as to deny the truth of the Bible, or to blaspheme against the Holy Ghost?"

O ye Church of England-men, hear ye that? Your Church, by its unalterable law, makes it as punishable an offence to speak against patronage, as to deny the truth of the Bible or to blaspheme against the Holy Ghost. This is what Mr. Smith, a Protestant Presbyterian clergyman, offers to prove against the Church of England, and what can so well deserve the attention of every Protestant in Calcutta? If the Church of England believes at all in the inspiration of the Bible, or in the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, this cannot pass without notice. Poor, unhappy children of the reformation, erring and plunging into error, tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine, for ever learning and never coming to knowledge of the truth, come back to the one fold of the one Shepherd, and you shall find peace to your souls. Mr. Smith's judgement on the Book of Common Prayer in our next.

LIBERALITY

We have great pleasure in giving publicity to a correspondence between our much esteemed Archbishop, and two enlightened and highly respectable Zemindars, Moonshees Fuzulall Kurim and Buzlul Ruheem, the sons of the late Moonshee Amcer of Scaldah, in the suburbs of Calcutta. Prompted by that spirit of well-directed charity which is peculiar to benevolent hearts and enlightened minds, these Native Gentlemen, although differing from us in faith, have, with a disinterested magnanimity of disposition, responded to the call of our Pastor, and in the most liberal manner allowed to the orphans, under the care of His Grace, the free use of an upper-roomed house in the neighbourhood of the College of St. John. From what we have learnt, this is only the first development of the regard with which these gentlemen view the charitable Institutions under the care of His Grace. The beginning, we are led to believe, of a series of benevolent acts which the wealth of these opulent Zemindars places within the reach of their means, and which their liberal education and enlightenment inclines them to perform. The charity displayed by these Gentlemen of the Moslem faith is truly that of the good Samaritan, whose example is held up for our imitation by the Blessed Saviour. Here are two strangers to our faith, who ask not after the religion of him who requires relief. They see the orphan lying by the side of the road, and they pour upon his wound the balm of consolation, whilst many who bear the name of Christian, hear the cries of the orphan ring in their ears, and pass him without even lifting up their Pharisaical eyes from the sacred and mysterious volume which they pretend to study and to expound to the people of Israel. Whilst the good Samaritan or the stranger opens his purse strings to feed the orphan, many of those who belong to the tribe of Levy use their knowledge of the sacred volume to sow discord and dissensions among the children of Abraham, by misrepresenting our doctrines and practices. We trust the good example set by the respectable Native gentlemen, whose charitable act we have noticed, will not be lost on our Catholic as well as separated brethren.

To Moonshees Fuzulall Kurim and Buzlul Ruheem.

DEAR SIRS.—I find that you have a small upper-roomed house at Intally, situated at the south of the premises of St. Joseph's Orphanage. This institution has been established for the support and education of orphan children, both male and female. Voluntary contributions from the public are the only means by which the poor children protected in this institution, are supported and educated. It is in consideration of these circumstances that a pious and benevolent individual has presented the premises on which the institution now stands.

But the number of children required to be lodged with comfort and decency in those premises requires more accommodation than the existing buildings afford. I am, therefore, compelled to solicit from you the use of the upper-roomed house I have mentioned. The house is at present totally out of repair and partly in a dilapidated state, so that if it be not immediately put in order it will be altogether ruined. If you will, in consideration of the charitable object for which I require it, allow me the use of this house, free of rent, I shall get it repaired and made habitable; whilst at the same time I shall jointly with the widows and orphans, who will be benefited by your charity, pray to Almighty God for your happiness and welfare in this, as well as the world to come.

I am, Dear Sirs,

Your most obdt. Servt.

Archbishop, V. A. B.

Calcutta, 27th March, 1844.

To His Grace, The Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

MY LORD,—We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Grace's letter of the 27th instant, requesting the use of an upper-roomed house situated near St. Joseph's Orphanage for the use of the widows and orphan children committed to your care. The bestowal of charity, especially on poor helpless orphans, is, according to every religion, an act of the most exalted virtue, acceptable in the sight of God, and the care and solicitude which your Grace bestows on orphans, shall not go without due reward from the Almighty Father of the fatherless. Impressed with this conviction we feel great pleasure in having an opportunity afforded to us of aiding in the charitable work which engages the thoughts of your Grace, and delighted should we have been, if it lay in our power to assist the orphans to the full extent of our desires, but there are circumstances, that need not be mentioned here, which hinder us at present from allowing to your Grace the full use of the house you mention, beyond the period of one year: your Grace is welcome to occupy the house immediately and to make in it such repairs as you may think fit, for the preservation of the building and the comforts of those whom you may place in it.

Accept of our sincere thanks for your good wishes and the prayers of the orphans, which are always calculated to secure the blessings of Heaven.

We are, My Lord

Your obdt. Servts.

THE BENGALI CATHOLIC MANUAL.

It will be in the recollection of many of our readers that some time ago Mr. Crow undertook the translation into Bengali of Dr. Plunket's Catechism, and that afterwards it was found necessary to enlarge the work by making several additions which were considered necessary for the instruction and use of the Native Catholics of this Vicariate. This delayed the completion of the work for some time longer, but it has at length been published, and we have received our copies.

The work is now entitled "The Bengali Catholic Manual, containing an abridgment of the Christian Doctrines, and a selection of instructions, devotions &c. adapted to the use of the Natives of Bengal, compiled and translated from approved Catholic works."

The translation was made under the superintendence of the late Very Rev. Mr. Moré, the Rector of St. Francis Xavier's College, and was examined by the Rev. Mr. Goiran. It bears the Approbation of His Grace, the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, to whom it is Dedicated. In the Preface, which is given both in English and Bengali, the objects of the work are briefly set forth, and the difficulties which were experienced in its preparation are explained. The Translator himself candidly admits that the work is susceptible of great improvements, and that therefore only a small number of copies has been printed for this its first edition. It is intended after some time to print a larger and improved edition both in the Bengali and the Roman characters. We much approve of this modest diffidence in the translator. In a language like the Bengali, the literature of which has as yet been a stranger to the influence of Christian doctrines and Gospel morality, that degree of perfection, which is desirable in catechetical works on Christian Theology, cannot be attained without much labour and repeated exertions. The principal fault of those who have before now attempted similar undertakings appears to have been an undue degree of confidence in their talents and in the means they possessed of doing justice to a work of this kind. They do not appear to have been fully aware of the difficulties and dangers that beset their path, and therefore too hastily got through a task which, from its very nature, required a far greater degree of familiarity with the Bengali language, and much more patient industry than they appear to have bestowed on the work they undertook to perform in.

Besides the translation of Dr. Plunket's Catechism, the compilation before us contains the substance of an admirable little pamphlet called the Christian Mentor, which was published here some time since. In it the leading arguments for the existence of God, the necessity of a revealed religion, the evidences of Christianity, and the rule of Faith, by which Catholics are guided in the choice of their religion, are laid down in a concise yet clear manner. To these are added the morning, evening and other devotions used among Catholics, as well as instructions for assisting at the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, for Confession and Communion, &c. &c. The compilation is as complete as it can be desired for the class of people for whom it is intended; and we trust it will soon receive all those improvements of which its compiler thinks it to be susceptible.

We shall conclude this notice by strongly recommending the printing of the second edition in Bengali as well as the Roman character, each of these portions has its peculiar usefulness and advantages. If the Bengali character be most useful for the Native converts and those foreigners who have learnt to read and write in that character, the Roman character will be found equally useful for that numerous portion of the Catholic community of Calcutta and other parts of Bengal, who from mere habit can understand and speak the Bengali language, without being able to read and write in its vernacular character. A work like the one before us would be of the greatest use in the hands of most Masters and Mistresses of families who have native domestics under their charge or are otherwise brought in communication with them. If they could but read this little work, they would all have it in their power to teach the principles of the pure Religion of our blessed Saviour to the heathens by whom we are surrounded. Therefore, next to the translation of such a work in the Bengali Language, its being printed in the Roman characters is the only means by which the accomplishment of so great a desideratum can be secured.

We have been requested to state for the information of those who contributed towards the printing &c. of the Bengali Catholic Manual, that when the binding of the remaining copies has been completed, a Statement of receipts and disbursements will be published.

SINGAPORE CHURCH.

We beg to remind our town readers that to-morrow, Easter Sunday, there will be a collection on behalf of the erection of the new church at Singapore, in all the Catholic Churches at Calcutta.

THE MISERERE.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—The following description of the Miserere, as sung at St. Peter's, from the pen of a Protestant Lady, is likely to be new to some of your Readers: "After a deep and most impressive pause of silence, the solemn Miserere commenced; and never by mortal ear was heard a strain of such powerful, such heart-moving pathos. The accordant tones of a hundred human voices, and one which seemed more than human, ascended together to heaven for mercy to mankind, for pardon to a guilty and sinning world. It had nothing in it of this earth, nothing that breathed the ordinary feelings of our nature. It seemed as if every sense and power had been concentrated into that plaintive expression of lamentation, of deep suffering, and supplication, which possessed the soul. It was the strain that disembodied spirits might have used who had just passed the boundaries of death, and sought release from the mysterious weight of woe and the trembling of mortal agony that life had suffered in the passage of the grave. It was the music of another state of being. It lasted till the shadows of evening fell deeper, and the red dusky glare, as it issued stronger from the concealed recess whence the singing proceeded, shed a partial, but strong light upon the figures near it. It ceased; a priest with a light moved across the Chapel, and carried a book to the officiating Cardinal, who read a few words in an awful and impressive tone. Then again the light disappeared, and the last, the most entrancing harmony arose, in a strain that might have moved heaven itself, a deeper, more pathetic sound of lamentation, than mortal voices ever breathed. Its effect upon the minds of those who heard it, was almost too all-powerful to be borne, and never, never can be forgotten. One gentleman fainted, and was carried out; and many of the ladies near me were in agitation even more distressing, which they vainly struggled to suppress. It was the music of Allegri; but the composition, however fine, is nothing without the voices who perform it here. It is only the singers of the Papal Chapel who can execute the Miserere. It has been tried by the best singers in Germany, and totally failed of effect. There is never any accompaniment, though at times the solemn swell of the softened organ seemed to blend with the voices. This music is more wonderful, and its effect more powerful, than any thing I could have conceived."

Selections,

THE LATE MR. WELD.

We cannot suffer the lamented death of Mr. W. Weld, late of St. Xavier's College, to pass without a few words of observation upon the serious loss which the cause of rational instruction has sustained by this sad event. Mr. Weld was a scion of one of the most ancient Catholic families of the north of England, which numbers among its members one of the College of Cardinals. He had been but a short time in the country, but his labours as a teacher had been attended with much success; his method of communicating knowledge, particularly in his own peculiar department of mathematics, being that of simplifying its means of attainment. It is a process which no teacher could succeed in, who had not studied the art of teaching, which is, we have often observed, an art by itself; for it is much more simple to lay a book before a scholar, and make him teach himself, than lecture on the subject matter of the book, and show the mode of explaining the mysteries of the science it deals with out of itself. Of this important art Mr. Weld was completely master, and thus brought the mass of his sound and extensive knowledge to bear with infinite effect upon the course of his teaching. He was enthusiastic, energetic, and of great ability; his style of conversation in secular society was as pleasing as were his manners: his attainments in his own chief branch of study might, had it been so willed, have classed his name hereafter with those of a Jacquier, or a Boscovich.

St. Xavier's College has been most unfortunate in the loss of this able teacher, following so immediately after that of Dr. Irvine, who had not the occasion of displaying his great practical knowledge of mechanical science, ere he was attacked by the illness which proved fatal. We trust for the cause of education's sake that the Society may depute men able, to fill the place of those that are gone.—Calcutta Star, April 1.

THE ADVOCATE'S CHRISTIANITY.

The Calcutta Christian Advocate gives insertion to a letter which only could appear in a religious journal, and then it must be circulated by men who elect themselves as the only true and faithful among men. The writer is alarmed at a report "that it is in the contemplation of Government to apply to Parliament to grant a sum of money to be employed in the payment of Roman Catholic Priests in India." He trusts for the honor of Protestant England it may prove unfounded. This writer will be infinitely more distressed to hear that the propriety of paying all Catholic Priests in Ireland is to be submitted to Parliament. We do not expect it will be very long, if the Union is to be preserved, before this is acceded to, and we shall be in luck happy when, instead of a pittance, Priests will be liberally paid wherever we have subjects who need them. As long as Church and State are one, it is disgraceful that it should be otherwise; whether they should be severed is a question into which we need not now enter. The writer indulges in the usual slang about the Roman Catholic Church, and the impossibility of its existing without persecution or desiring to persecute, and of the arrogance of the Romish Priesthood, as if our own Establishment were not a thing of worldliness, rank, titles and grasping wealth, and a persecutor of pockets, since it makes people pay, though their consciences may compel them to dissent from its ordinances, doctrines and practice. He asks,—“How can Clergymen or Missionaries go about their work, when the moment they mention Popery (as they must occasionally, if faithful) they will be met with the astounding reply, ‘why do you preach or speak against Popery, which your own Christian Government is paying?’ This is like a certain class of men who look upon religion as a trade—the paying, which this gentleman puts into italics, is ever uppermost in their mind it is the first thing that occurs to them, and the dread of a rival is shocking to their prejudices in favour of self. To a man strong in the simple doctrines of Christianity, the ready answer to the above astounding question would be—“There are those who hug the delusion of a false faith from which we hope to convert them as we trust to rescue you from heathenism, but to deny them spiritual assistance till they will take it from our hands, and to force them to take it before they are converted, or to go without any, would be a violation of the injunction of that God we preach, who tells us to be a merciful and charitable and to do unto others as we would be done by.” He might add—“they are not only our fellow-creatures, but our fellow subjects, obeying the same Government, paying the same Government, and fighting for the same Government. Would it be just then that we should deny them Ministers of their religion, or is it just to say we approve because we pay, that we encourage priestcraft because we do not persecute it?” The speaker might say this and a good deal more, and he might keep in the back ground how nearly in fact we approach persecution of those who differ from us; until lately how thoroughly we reached it. This Calcutta Christian Advocate is alarmed because if the Irish Priesthood are paid by the English Government such a step would have the immediate effect of causing a fresh influx of priests into this country. “Of course it would” he exclaims, “and Papists know it well.” Here again is the confession, a thousand times made, of a distrust in the Protestant Faith which it were better never to make. This cry against Roman Catholic Priests—what is it but an alarm that they are to teach something that will be more readily listened to than the doctrines and the exhortations of our Protestant Clergy! Cannot we meet them in a fair field—a heathen country—with all the advantages that belong to an establishment pushing a State religion, and betray no fear? Do we not proclaim that truth is great and must prevail? We shout it very lustily, and then change our note to one of alarm and warning, that if the Roman Catholic be allowed a Minister to marry, wed, comfort or bury him, he will convert the heathen to Romanism, preach Protestants never so stoutly. Not a syllable is ever written to meet the question,—if a Protestant Church and State will have Roman Catholic subjects, and take their money, their labour and their blood, should they not leave them their religion, until they can win then to a better? No to pay a shilling to a priest is to aggrandize the Papal Hierarchy, to aggrandize her funds, to aggrandize her power. In these very words this writer, whose letter we are considering, argues against the Roman Catholic soldier in India being allowed by the Government he is fighting for, the consolation of that religion in which he has been born and bred,

We know not that we should have noticed this subject but that we wrote lately upon it from a very different text. It is with deep regret we see in any publication, much less in one affecting a religious character, the style of article and correspondence that so frequently discredit the Christian Advocate. There is no charity for any man who differs in opinion from its conductors and their friends—there is no truth but in their dogmas, no justice but in their judgments—they will take nothing from a man from whom they dissent but his money. Give, give, give is their constant cry—to their Churches, their Chapels, their Societies their Schools, their Periodicals; and people do give, give liberally—but give elsewhere, and it is mis-directed generosity at least; to give the means of religious worship, if it be not their religion, is a crime.—Ibid. 2d April.

HOLY SATURDAY.

When the mind is once buried in the depths of the great week, when the soul has once given way to the inspirations which the ceremonies and the offices of the time call forth, we feel truly overwhelmed with so much grandeur. The psalms which we have read, the hymns which we have heard chaunted, the lamentations of Isaias and Jeremiah, which we have heard have kindled strong emotions and high thoughts in our minds. We have lived, so to speak, with the prophets and kings of Israel; we have been raised with them high above the things of the earth, and we feel pained to return to the vulgar words of life. But Holy Saturday still makes us dwell in these high regions: few days in the Christian year so abound with symbols as this. On this day the church honours the mysterious repose which Jesus Christ observed in the tomb, and, at the same time, recalls the descent into hell of the Conqueror of Death, when he went to withdraw from the darkness of Limbo the souls of the patriarchs and the just who had awaited and foretold the Messiah. The burial of our Lord, says the historian of the festivals of the church, is a mystery which the church seems to have wished to celebrate only by her silence, for the office relative to His burial terminates with None. Moreover, as the vigil of Easter surpasses all other vigils in dignity, and abounds more in practices and observances, its offices have been advanced to the preceding day. In the early ages of the church, this vigil continued among all ranks of the faithful till Sunday morning, the greatest part of them remaining fasting from the previous Friday, or the collation of Thursday. They were carefully warned not to conclude this celebrated vigil till the crowing of the cock. Sacrifice was then offered, the faithful communicated, and the fast of Lent ceased. Thus, the faithful remained in the church from sunrise to sunrise. This custom has been discontinued among the Latins since the offices of the vigil of Easter day have commenced with Tierce on Saturday; but it still prevails among the Greeks.

The feast of Holy Saturday is now left to the individual devotion of the faithful: it is no longer observed as a holiday. Holy Saturday is too near the greatest of Christian festivals to be celebrated with great pomp, so that if you enter one of our churches on that day, notwithstanding the poetry and imagery of the ceremonies, you will not find it so crowded as on the preceding days. What formerly attracted great crowds on the office of Holy Saturday was the baptism of the catechumens. Towards mid-day they were brought to the church, they were catechised for the last time, and they had to show that they were sufficiently instructed to be admitted into the communion of the faithful. They recited aloud the apostles' creed and the Lord's prayer; then the bishop passed along their rank, making the sign of the cross on each one's forehead, and then, laying his hands upon them, he exorcised them. In this ceremony he imitated what our Saviour had done; he touched their ears and their eyes with spittle, saying, Epheta, that is, be ye opened. Then the eyes which had been closed to divine light, and the ears which had been shut against the words of salvation, saw and heard; and those who had desired it with earnestness, and who had lived with purity, were admitted to our sacred mysteries. And to show to all the world that these new Christians were ready to fight for the faith which they had embraced, and that they had become soldiers of Christ, on their breasts and between their naked shoulders the bishop spread the oil of unction, the oil which makes strong in battle. After the benediction of the founts, baptism by immersion took place; the young boys were presented by the godfathers, the girls by the godmothers: the priest received them from their hands, and with the chastity of the sanctuary knew how to remove all inconveniences. Those who were strong underwent the triple immersion, those who were weak and feeble a single immersion, with all due regard to purity. On leaving the laver of regeneration, all those who had been baptized were presented to the minister of the altar, who anointed them with the holy chrism, making with his thumb the sign of the cross on the crown of the head. Then the new Christians were clothed in long white robes, without spot or stain, emblems of innocence and virginity. Thus clad, and pure as angels, these young men and women were brought to the bishop, who said over them the prayer of confirmation, invoking on these children of the church the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost! Purified by baptism, strengthened by confirmation, the neophytes came singing the litanies of the saints—the saints whose brethren they had become, to assist at mass, during which they all communicated. These ceremonies of baptism and confirmation were observed ever since the eighth century on Holy Saturday, and they contributed more than anything else to the religious pomp of this day. Now-a-days that we have no young catechumens with their white robes and bandages of linen; now that baptism is not administered by immersion, and that our churches have none of those great founts in which those being baptized were thrice plunged, the office of the vigil of Easter has been greatly simplified: still it retains the blessing of the founts, and of new fire, and the paschal candle: all of which recal a high antiquity. The new fire is blessed after None: then the officiating priest, robed in a purple cope, and accompanied by the deacon and subdeacon, walks down the church and, near the porch, blesses fire which has not been used for any profane purpose, the fire which has to burn in the lamp before the saint of saints. "O God, who by thy Son, the corner stone, hast bestowed on the faithful the fire of thy brightness, sanctify this new fire produced from a flint for our use; and grant that, during this paschal festival, we may be so inflamed with heavenly desires that with pure minds we may come to the solemnity of eternal splendour, through the same Christ our Lord." "Creator of all light, bless this! O God, who wast the light of Israel! O God, who wast a pillar of fire in the desert! O God, bless this new fire!" Then an acolyte puts some of the fire in the censer, and the priest sprinkles it with holy water, saying: Asperges me Domine, hyssopo, et mundabor; lucabis me et super nivem dealbabor. Then the deacon, putting on a white dalmatic, takes a rod with three branchlets, forming a triangle; then, having lighted one of the candles, he walks towards the altar singing; Lumen Christi. He then asks the blessing of the priest that he may be worthy to announce the pasch. Then follows the benediction of the paschal candle. The paschal candle dates from the sixth century. It was originally used to give light on the vigil of Easter, the most solemn of all vigils. The faithful placed a high column of wax in the centre of the church, and from it the light spread around. It was looked on as a symbol of Jesus Christ standing in the middle of his church to enlighten and to guide it. The prayers said at this benediction are full of poetic enthusiasm: "Let now the heavenly troops of angels rejoice; let the divine mysteries be joyfully celebrated, and let a sacred trumpet proclaim the victory of so great a king. Let the earth also be filled with joy, being illuminated with such resplendent rays; and let it be sensible that the darkness, which over-spread the whole world, is chased away by the splendour of our Eternal King. Let our mother the church be also glad, finding herself adorned with the rays of so great a light; and let this temple resound with the joyful acclamations of the people!" The deacon then fixes five grains of blessed incense in the candle. In the early ages of the church, the paschal candle was used only on the vigil of Easter. At present it remains in the sanctuary before the altar till ascension day. As it is a symbol of Jesus Christ, it is not withdrawn from the church until our Lord went up to heaven. In some countries, when the year commenced at Easter, the cycles, the principle epochs, the great anniversaries of religious events, were written on the paschal candle. When the deacon, with one of the three candles on the rod, lights the paschal candle and the lamps of the church, he says: "We beseech thee, therefore, O Lord, that this candle, consecrated to the honour of thy name, may continue burning to dissipate the darkness of this night, and being accepted as a sweet smelling savour, may be united with the celestial lights. Let the morning star find it burning!"

After this ceremony, the clergy, clothed in purple, read the prophecies. What a continuity of magnificent pictures in these inspired pages! There is God seated in his power, and, before all time, fructifying chaos that he might make the world therefrom; the earth with its trees, its rivers, and its mountains; the sea with its depths and its abyss; the firmament with its stars, moon, and sun, and light created by a word! There is the patriarch Noah, saved from the deluge, and the great waves which rise, and the ark which swims upon them, and the crew which was lost, and the dove which returned bearing an olive branch! There is God demanding from Abraham a sacrifice which He would not have asked of a mother; there is the angel staying the arm of the father of Isaac; there is Isaac saved! There is the God of armies, the eternal Jehovah, looking down himself from the height of the fiery cloud, and spreading terror and death among the Egyptians, and swallowing up in the waves horsemen and horses, chariots, king, and an entire army! There is God telling Israel that if the wicked forsake his way, and the unjust man his thoughts, and return to the Lord, He will have mercy on him, for the thoughts of God are not as the thoughts of men, nor the ways of heaven like the ways of earth: for as the heavens are exalted above the earth, so are the thoughts of God above the thoughts of men. And as the rain and the snow come down from heaven, return no more thither, but soak the earth and fertilize it, so the word of God, which has gone forth from His mouth, shall prosper and bring forth fruit. As far off the Prophet Baruch cries out, "How happeneth it, O Israel, that thou art in the enemies' land? How is it that thou art grown old in a strange country, thou art defiled with the dead; thou art counted with them that go down into hell? I know it well: it is because thou hast forsaken the fountain of wisdom. For if thou hadst walked in the glory of God, thou hadst surely dwelt in peace for ever. Learn where is wisdom, where is strength, where is understanding, that thou mayest know also where is length of days and life, where is the light of the eyes and peace. Where are the princes of the nations, and they that rule over the beasts that are upon the earth! that take their pastime with the birds of the air, that hoard up silver and gold? They are cut off and are gone down to hell, and others are risen up in their place! O Israel! how great is the house of God, and how vast is the place of his possession! It is great and hath no end: it is high and immense. There were the giants, those renowned men that were from the beginning, of great stature, expert in war. The Lord chose not them, neither did they find the way of knowledge: therefore did they perish. Who hath gone up into heaven and hath taken wisdom, and brought her down from the clouds? Who hath passed over the sea, and found her and brought her preferable to chosen gold?" After Baruch there is Ezekiel! Ezekiel, who had his great vision of the dead. Listen! "In those days, the hand of the Lord was upon me, and brought me forth in the spirit of the Lord: and set me down in the midst of a plain that was full of bones. Now they were very many upon the face of the plain, and they were exceeding dry. And He said to me, 'Son of man dost thou think these bones shall live?' 'O Lord God thou knowest.' Prophe cy concerning those bones and say to them: ye dry bones hear the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord God to these bones! Behold I will send spirit into you, and you shall live. And I will lay sinews upon you, and will cause flesh to grow over you, and will cover you with skin: and I will give you spirit, and you shall live, and you shall know that I am the Lord.' And I prophesied as he had commanded me, and as I prophesied there was a noise, and behold a commotion, and the bones came together, each one to its joint. And I saw, and beheld the sinews and the flesh came upon them: and the skin was stretched out over them, but there was no spirit in them. The Lord said to me, 'Prophecy, O son of man, and say to the spirit, thus saith the Lord God; come, spirit, from the four winds, and blow upon those slain, and let them live again.' And I prophesied as he had commanded me, and the spirit came into them, and they lived: and they stood upon their feet an exceeding great army. And he said to me: 'Son of man, all these bones are the house of Israel; they say, our bones are dried up, and our hope is lost, and we are cut off. Therefore prophecy, and say to them, thus saith the Lord God; behold I will open your graves, and will bring you out of your sepulchres, O my people, and will bring you into the land of Israel. And you shall know that I am the Lord when I shall have opened your sepulchres, and shall have brought you out of your graves, O my people: and shall have put my spirit in you, and you shall live, and I shall make you rest upon your own land.' After this vision another prophet succeeds Ezekiel: he sees the earth deprived of men, and women lamenting their widowhood. But soon the bud of the Lord shall grow from the midst of the ruins, and shall be in magnificence and glory, and the children of Israel that have escaped the misfortunes of their nation shall be filled with joy. Every one that shall be left in Sion, and that shall remain in Jerusalem, shall be called holy, and their names shall be written by the angel in the book of life. Jonas comes in his turn; the Lord has commanded him to denounce woe, woe to Ninive: now Ninive was a great city, of three day's journey, and Jonas began to enter into the city one day's journey, crying aloud in the streets and squares, before palaces and temples: "Yet forty days and Ninive shall be destroyed." And the men of Ninive heard the words of the prophet, and believed in God: and they proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth, from the greatest to the least. And the king, having learned what was passing in the city, rose up out of his throne, and cast away his robe from him, and was clothed with sackcloth, and sat in ashes. And he caused it to be proclaimed and published in Ninive from the mouth of the king and of his princes, saying, "Let neither men nor beasts, oxen nor sheep taste anything: let them not feed nor drink water." And all Ninive having fasted, wept and prayed, God had regard of their penance and repentance, and it was saved! God had mercy on his people. The words of Moses come after those of Jonas. After Moses had written the words of the law in a volume, he commanded the Levites, who carried the ark of the covenant, saying, "Take this book and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord our God, that it may be there for a testimony against thee; for I know thy obstinacy, and thy most stiff neck. While I am yet living in the midst of you, you have always been rebellious against the Lord; how much more when I shall be dead? Gather unto me all the ancients of your tribes, and your doctors, and I will speak these words in their hearing, and I will call heaven and earth to witness against them that transgress. My soul becomes sorrowful when I reflect that after my death you will quickly turn aside from the way that I have commanded you. Israel! Israel! thy iniquity will kindle the anger of God." We are no longer in Nineve, no longer in the camp of Moses; we are carried in spirit to Babylon the proud, to Babylon the fallen of nations. Attend: "In those days king Nebuchadonosor made a statue of gold of 60 cubits high and 6 cubits broad, and he set it up in the plains of Dura, of the province of Babylon. Then Nebuchadonosor the king sent to call together the nobles, the magistrates, and the judges, the captains, the rulers and governors, and all the chief men of the provinces, the people from town and country, rich and poor, high and low, to come to the dedication of the statue which king Nebuchadonosor had set up. And when all this multitude was assembled in the plains of Dura, the heralds cried with a strong voice: To you it is commanded, O nations, tribes and languages, that in the hour that you shall hear the sound of the trumpet, and of the flute, and of the harp, and of the sackbut, and of the psaltery, and of the symphony, and of all kinds of music, ye shall fall down and adore the golden statue which Nebuchadonosor hath set up. But if any man shall not fall down and adore, he shall the same hour be cast into a furnace of burning fire. Upon this, therefore, at the time when all the people heard the sound of the trumpet, the flute, and the harp, of the sackbut, and the psaltery, of the symphony, and of all kind of music, all the nations, tribes, and languages fell down and adored the golden statue which king Nebuchadonosor had set up. And presently, at that very time, some Chaldeans came and said to the king,—O king, live for ever: thou, O king, hast made a decree that every man that shall hear the sound of the trumpet, the flute, and the harp, of the sackbut, and the psaltery, of the symphony, and of all kind of music, shall prostrate himself, and adore the golden statue: and that if any man shall not fall down and adore, he shall be cast into a furnace of burning fire. Now there are certain Jews, whom thou hast set over the works of the province of Babylon, Sidrach, Misach, and Abdenago: these men, O king, have slighted thy decree: they worship not thy gods, nor do they adore the golden statue which thou hast set up. Then Nebuchadonosor, in fury and in wrath, commanded that Sidrach, Misach, and Abdenago should be brought; and, when they were before him, Nebuchadonosor the king spoke to them, and said, is it true that you do not worship my gods, nor adore the golden statue that I have set up? Now therefore, if you be ready, at what hour soever you shall hear the sound of the trumpet, flute, harp, sackbut, and psaltery, and symphony, and of all kinds of music, prostrate yourselves, and adore the statue which I have made: but if you do not adore, you shall be cast, the same hour, into the furnace of burning fire; and who is the God that shall deliver you out of my hand? Sidrach, Misach, and Abdenago answered, and said to the king,— We have no occasion to answer thee concerning this matter: for behold our God, whom we worship, is able to save us from the furnace of burning fire, and to deliver us out of thy hands, O king. But if he will not, be it known to thee, O king, that we will not worship thy gods, nor adore the golden statue which thou hast set up. Then was Nebuchadonozor filled with fury: and the countenance of his face was changed, and he commanded that the furnace should be heated seven times more than it had been accustomed to be heated; and he commanded the strongest men that were in his army to bind the feet of Sidrach, Misach, and Abdenago, and to cast them into the furnace of burning fire. And as the king had ordered, these three children of Israel were bound, and were cast into the furnace of burning fire, which was heated exceedingly, with their coats, and their caps, and their shoes, and their festive garments. And the flame of the fire slew those men that had cast in Sidrach, Misach, and Abdenago. But the three Israelites who had been thrown bound into the furnace, walked in the midst of the flame, praising God, and blessing the Lord."

Certs, what a succession of pictures, full of poetry! It has given me pleasure to go over them, for many Catholics who enter our churches on Holy Saturday have no conception of the sublimity of the office on that day. If this office be read with attention, it must appear that the church, at the time of celebrating the great feast of the resurrection, has desired to show, by the deeds of the past, the power of God, who is so soon to break the stone of the tomb and triumph over death. Better to secure adoration to Jesus Christ she goes over the history of Jehovah, and puts the prodigies of the ancient law by the side of the mercies and the hopes of the new law. After this long list of prophecies, intermingled with prayers, the celebrant proceeds to the blessing of the font: again the prayers are beautiful and affected. "O God, whose spirit in the very beginning of the world moved over the waters, that even then the nature of water might receive the virtue of sanctification. O God, who by water didst wash away the crimes of the guilty world, and by the overflowing of the deluge didst give a figure of regeneration, that one and the same element might in a mystery be the end of vice and the origin of virtue. Look, O Lord, on the face of these waters, and sanctify them!" Here the priest, touching the water with his hand makes over it the sign of the cross, and adds: "May this holy and innocent creature be free from all the assaults of the enemy, and purified by the destruction of all his malice: may it be a living fountain, a regenerating water, a purifying stream; that all those that are to be washed in this saving bath may obtain, by the operation of the Holy Ghost, the grace of a perfect purification. Therefore I bless thee, O creature of water, by the living God, by the true God, by the holy God, by that God who in the beginning separated by his word from the dry land, whose spirit moved over thee." Here the celebrant divides the water with his hands, and throws some of it towards the four quarters of the world, saying: "Who made thee flow from the fountain of paradise, and commanded thee to water the whole earth with thy four rivers. Who, changing thy bitterness in the desert into sweetness, made thee fit to drink, and produced thee out of a rock to quench the thirst of the people. I bless thee also by our Lord Jesus Christ, his only Son, who in Cana of Galilee changed thee into wine by a wonderful miracle of his power. Who walked upon thee dry foot, and was baptised in thee by John in the Jordan. Who made thee flow out of his side together with his blood, and commanded his disciples, that such as believed should be baptised in thee." Here breathing upon the water the celebrant says: "Do thou with thy mouth bless these clear waters, that, besides their natural virtue of cleansing the body, they may also be effectual for the purifying of the soul." Here the priest sinks the paschal candle in the water at three different times, saying each time: "May the virtue of the Holy Ghost descend into all the water of this font, and make the whole substance of this water fruitful, and capable of regenerating!" The priest then thrice drops wax into the water from the paschal candle in the form of a cross, saying: "May this font be sanctified and made fruitful in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost!" The priest, then pouring some oil of catechumens into the water three times, says: "May this mixture of the oil of unction and of the water of baptism be made in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost!" Then, pouring holy chrism into the water, he says: "May this mixture of the chrism of sanctification, and of the oil of unction, and of the water of baptism, be made in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost!" And the faithful answer, Amen. Perchance this word is lightly pronounced by many, but if those who say it were to reflect, they would find it serious on this occasion; for the water which has just been sanctified in their presence, and at the blessing of which they have assisted by their prayers, this water will be poured on the heads of their children, when they come into the world; when they themselves shall be lying on their death bed, and the death rattle of their agony shall cause tears and lamentations around them, some pious hand will sprinkle some of this same water over their already stiffened limbs. There is nothing useless, nothing which does not awaken reflection in the ceremonies of Catholicity; the water which is found at the doors of our churches in basins of marble, or stone, or large shells, is destined for the cradle and the tomb, the living and the dead! When the font has been blessed, the litany of the saints is sung at the altar; the church invites all the saints of heaven to the great festival on the earth. From the moment that the host was carried to the sepulchre chapel on Holy Thursday, all the towers, all the belfries, all the steeples of the churches have been silent; no ringing has been heard in the cities, but when the priest has intoned the Gloria in excelsis, volleys of cannon are fired from every parish and accompany the Allotua, which already announce the feast of the following day. This is the true end of the forty days mourning; for the gospel has announced the resurrection. Formerly those who had been newly baptized communicated after the priest and the clergy, they were followed by all the people. The history of the feasts of the church adds, "Infants at the breasts, who were baptized on the vigil of Easter, did not receive the body of Jesus Christ under the appearance of bread, since they had not as yet begun to eat. They were content to communicate them with the precious blood which was carried to them in the chalice, with a spoon to introduce it into the mouth; they afterwards made them, as well as the others baptized, take a little ordinary wine, which usage prevailed in the fourth century." In this custom of communicating little children is found a lively remembrance of the tenderness which our Saviour showed for children: the apostles, the disciples, those living at the same time as our Lord, having seen him, during his passage on earth, allow little children to come unto him; he having taken them on his knees and blessed them, have been anxious after his death, to continue this predilection for the innocent creatures whom the Son of Mary had loved, and whom baptism had rendered as pure as angels. An infant baptized, who has not as yet been able to sin, is an angel on earth: his innocence is worth more than very many of our virtues — Orthodox Journal.

EASTER DAY.

This is the day which the Lord has made, the great day of the Christians, the day of deliverance! There is in the air, above cities, and above the country, as it were, one great canticle, one sounding hymn of joy. From the dawn of the day the bells have joyously announced the festival. The earth, too, wrapt for forty days in penance, mourning, awakens with joy; and every one goes forth from his home, arrayed in his most costly dress. On this day our largest churches are too small, for the most indifferent on this holy day think themselves bound to go to the solemnity. It is true religion has exhibited all her pomp: the altars have re-assumed their splendour, their flowers, their reliquaries, their candlesticks of gold; the saints are no longer veiled, nor are the adoring angels concealed. The clouds of incense rise in the sanctuary, the priests are again arrayed in velvet and red brocade; the mitre adorns the brow of the bishop, and the crozier glitters in his hand; lights burn on each side of the tabernacle, above which rise the radiant eucharist; the deacons and subdeacons, the canons and acolytes, carry lighted torches, and sing as they move through the serried ranks of the crowd in procession round the church: "An angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and coming rolled back the stone and sat upon it; then, speaking to the women, he said: Fear not, for I know that you seek Jesus: he is risen: come and see the place where the Lord was laid. Alleluia! Alleluia! And, entering into the sepulchre, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, clothed with a white robe: and he, seeing them afraid, said to them: Be not affrighted, for I know whom you seek; he is risen. Jesus Christ being now risen from among the dead, dieth now no more. Death shall no more have dominion over him. He died for our sins, but now he lives for God! He died once for our sins, and he is now risen for our justification. Was it not necessary that Christ should suffer what he has suffered, and thus should enter into his glory? The Lord is gone forth glorious from the tomb. For the love of us he was fastened to the cross, and behold he is risen. Alleluia! Alleluia." In this manner is the great news of the resurrection announced to the people by the priests as they descend from the sanctuary and pass through the middle of the faithful in the great nave and in the aisles and apsis. This word Alleluia, which means praise be to God, has become a Christian word, which is well understood by a Christian crowd, and it is repeated by them with a sort of holy delirium, and it is really something enrapturing to hear the old vaulted roofs of our cathedrals re-echoing with the cry with which the Hebrews once made the depths of the sea resound when the Almighty opened a passage to them through the suspended waters. Now, as then, it is the cry of deliverance. The death and the resurrection of Christ open to us a passage to another promised land,—to heaven, to which Christ has ascended. "After the Sabbath, which followed the day of our Lord's death, Maria Magdalen, Maria, the mother of James, Salome, mother of the sons of Zebedee, who, in their return from Calvary, had brought perfumes to embalm the body of Jesus, set out from Jerusalem on the following day at an early hour, and arrived at his sepulchre before the sunrise. They carried with them the perfumes which they had prepared. But, as they approached the tomb, they said one to another, Who shall roll away the stone of the sepulchre, which has been sealed? Whilst they were yet speaking, there was a great earthquake, and at the same moment an angel of the Lord descended from heaven and rolled away the stone from the sepulchre. The countenance of the angel was brighter than lightning, and his robe was whiter than snow. The soldiers who had been stationed to guard the sepulchre saw the angel, and became as men dead, so great was their fright. The women, seeing the stone rolled away, entered the sepulchre, but they found not the body of the Lord. Great was their surprise; and Mary Magdalen began to run towards Jerusalem to inform Peter and John and the other apostles of what had happened. Peter and John immediately went forth from the city, and bended their way in great haste to the sepulchre. Both ran: but John, running faster, arrived first, and, leaning down into the tomb, perceived the winding-sheet on the ground. . . . but he waited for Peter that the might enter with him. When they entered, they saw the winding-sheet in which the body had been wrapped, and the handkerchief which had covered the face of our Saviour. Both imagined, as the women had previously, that the body had been taken away, for they did not as yet know what the scripture teaches: that he must rise again from among the dead. Seized with astonishment, they returned to Jerusalem to tell the other apostles what they had seen. But the women remained at the door of the monument. Maria Magdalen, melting into tears, wept bitterly as she looked into the empty sepulchre; suddenly in its shade she beheld two angels clothed in white, sitting in the place where the body of Jesus had been placed, one at the head and the other at the feet. And the angels said to Maria Magdalen: Woman, why weepest thou? She answered: They have taken away the body of my Lord, and I know not whither they have carried it. As she said these words at that instant she beheld Jesus standing near her: and he asked her, saying: Woman, why weepest thou? And as the sepulchre was in a garden, Maria Magdalen at first thought that he who spoke to her was the gardener; and she said: If it be you who have taken away the body of my Lord, tell me where you have laid him, and I will carry him away. No sooner did Jesus say Maria! than she knew him, and, stretching out her arms towards him, cried out Rabboni! that is to say, My Master. Do not touch me, our Lord replied. I have not yet ascended to my Father. Go, tell the disciples that you have seen me: tell them that I am going to ascend to my Father who is your Father, to my God who is your God. Magdalen went to tell the disciples, who were in affliction, that she had seen the Lord, and told them what he had said; but they were so dispirited that they did not believe, although she affirmed that he was living, and that her own eyes had seen him. The other holy women, seized with affright, stood trembling by the sepulchre. The two angels said to them: "Be not affrighted; you seek Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified: why do you seek among the dead him who liveth? He is not here, for he is risen, as he foretold. Remember the words which he spoke whilst yet in Galilee: "It is necessary for the Son of Man to be delivered into the hands of sinners, to be crucified, and to rise again on the third day: come and see." The holy women remembered the words of Jesus, and, going forth from the sepulchre, agitated with joy and fear, they hastened to bear the great tidings which they had just heard to the apostles and disciples. As they walked hastily along, praising God from the depths of their hearts, Jesus met them on the road and blessed them. There appeared in him such goodness and mildness that they dared approach him and kiss his feet. And our Lord spoke to them, and said: "Fear not, but go and tell my brethren to go into Galilee; they shall see me there." When they came to the room in which the apostles were assembled, they recounted to them what they had seen and heard; but their account, like that of Magdalen, was treated as a dream. Now some of the soldiers who had been placed to guard the sepulchre went into the city and told the chief priests what had taken place. At the news of these prodigies the princes of the priests assembled with the men of Pilate and Herod to take advice what was necessary to be done, and it was resolved by the enemies of Jesus to give a large sum of money to the soldiers, to induce them to tell the people that the disciples of the Nazarean had stolen away their master during the night. The soldiers, having received the money, did as they were ordered; but, in spite of their lying, the truth was known: our Lord appeared to St. Peter and to the disciples of Emaus, and Thomas himself was convinced.

Such is the history of the great feast of the Resurrection. There is in this narration, made by eyewitnesses, an irresistible tone of truth. A man wretched enough not to wish to believe must yet be constrained to admire the plan and simple details of this great history. On the day of the resurrection of Jesus Christ the church has fixed her most imposing solemnity: she calls it the day of the Lord, the feast of feasts, the day of deliverance. St. Gregory Nazianzen says that the feast of Easter is as much above the other feasts of our Lord as these feasts are above those of the saints. Pope St. Leo said that among all the days which were honoured by religious worship in the Christian religion that of Easter was the most excellent and the most august: he looked upon it as the main point of all the discipline of the great Christian republic, on which hung the ceremony of divine worship and the sacraments of the church, because the resurrection of our Lord is the foundation of our religion and of our hopes. And, in truth, had we loved the Son of Mary in the manger, had we adored him with the magi of the east, had we listened to him in the temple with the doctors, followed him in Judea with the disciples, and admired him in all his miracles, all this would have been of no avail had he not risen on the third day. The stone of the sepulchre, which was broken open, cries out more loudly than all to proclaim the divinity of the crucified of Cavalry. This passage from the grave to life has given to the feast of the Resurrection the name of pasch, which, as every body knows, means passage. The pasch of the Hebrews was in memory of the passage from slavery to liberty; the pasch of Christians is in memory of the passage from death to life—the passage from the darkness of the sepulchre to the glories of heaven—the passage from the servitude of sin to the liberty of children of God. When the Hebrews had passed the sea in the midst of the divided and immoveable waters, when they found themselves on the opposite bank, separated, delivered from their enemies, they felt a great joy, and, in a holy enthusiasm, they sang to the Lord hymns of deliverance. The Christians, on the day of the pasch, likewise sing similar hymns.

Ye dear bought Christians! come and sing
The paschal praises of your King;
That spotless Lamb, who more than due
Paid for his sheep, and those sheep you.

The guiltless Son has wrought your peace,
And made his Father's anger cease.
Life has, with death, the battle fought,
And each to strange extremes was brought.
Life died, but soon reviv'd again,
When lo! by Life e'en Death was slain!

Say, happy Magdalen! O say,
What object saw you on the way?
I saw the tomb of my dear Lord:
I saw himself, and him ador'd.
I saw the napkin and the sheet
That bound his head and wrapt his feet.
I heard the angels witness bear
That Christ was risen, "He is not here."
Go, tell his brethr'n they shall see Theirs and thy Hope in Galilee."

We, Lord, with faithful hearts and cheerful voice
On this thy glorious rising day rejoice.
O thou! whose conqu'ring power o'ercame th grave,
By thy victorious grace us sinners save.

Amen, Alleluia.

All the office of this great solemnity breathes gladness and enthusiasm; but there is nothing extraordinary in the ceremonies. High mass and vespers resemble those of other great feasts, except the addition of the paschal candle within the sanctuary: in the evening it is carried round the church, and I can assure you that, to those who understand this symbol, to those who understand what is meant by this candle, the broad flame of which shines above the heads of all the crowd, it presents a subject of deep thought and reflection. It is the light of faith which has civilized the world—that light of which the paschal candle is but a shadow. What efforts has not hell made to extinguish this flame, which came from heaven. When you are in the church you behold the paschal candle leave the altar, advance into the sanctuary, descend the steps; then, on turning into the side aisles, its sacred light suddenly disappears behind a row of pillars, but it soon re-appears through an arch; then again it disappears behind other pillars, and at some distance is again seen, and at last you see it return resplendent to the altar. This is a faithful image of the changes which the torch of Catholic faith has experienced: at times it has shone with great splendour; at times its light has been concealed, but never extinguished; and at the end of time it will ascend pure and sparkling to heaven, like the paschal candle returns to the side of the altar. During this procession of the paschal light the priests sing:—

When Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a barbarous people:

Judea was made his sanctuary, Israel his dominion.

The sea saw, and fled: Jordan was turned back.

The mountains skipped like rams; and the hills like the lambs of the flock.

What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou didst flee: and thou, O Jordan, that thou wast turned back?

Ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams, and ye hills, like lambs of the flock?

At the presence of the Lord the earth was moved, at the presence of the God of Jacob.

Who turned the rocks into pools of waters and the stony hills into fountains of water.

Not to us, O Lord, not to us: but to thy name give glory.

For thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake: lest the Gentiles should say: Where is their God?

But our God is in heaven: he hath done all things whatsoever he would.

The idols of the Gentiles are silver and gold, the works of the hands of men.

They have mouths, and they shall not speak: they have eyes, and they shall not see.

They have ears, and they shall not hear: they have nostrils, and they shall not smell.

They have hands, and they shall not feel: they have feet, and they shall not walk: neither shall they cry out through their throat.

Let them that make them become like unto them: and all such as trust in them.

The house of Israel hath hoped in the Lord: he is their helper and protector.

The house of Aaron hath hoped in the Lord: he is their helper and their protector.

They that fear the Lord, hath hoped in the Lord: he is their helper and protector.

The Lord hath been mindful of us: and hath blessed us.

He hath blessed the house of Israel, he hath blessed the house of Aaron.

He hath blessed all that fear the Lord, both little and great.

May the Lord add blessings upon you: upon you, and upon your children.

Blessed be you of the Lord, who made heaven and earth.

The heaven of heaven is the Lord's: but the earth he has given to the children of men.

The dead shall not raise thee, O Lord: nor any of them that go down to hell.

But we that live bless the Lord, from this time, now, and for ever.

Glory be to the Father, &c.

Ant. Alleluia, alleluia, alleluia.

Such songs of gladness and triumph are well suited to the solemnity of Easter, and we have seen men of talent and feeling transported with enthusiasm on hearing the Catholic thousands singing, under the vaults of one of our old churches, the canticle of the delivered Israelites. After this poetry of the psalms, the church, on Easter-day, has her hymn "O Filii et Filie!" For this metrical history of the resurrection our fathers composed an air which our children know and which our grand-children will sing. Oh! I know no heart so cold which will not throb better when all the faithful, answering the clear and sonorous voice of the choristers, repeat the burden of the song, Alleluia! Alleluia! The echo of our cathedrals, of our village churches, and of our hamlet chapels, repeat well this air which they have known so long. For a solemnity like that of Easter our fathers were not content with a single day: the Monday and Tuesday which follow the Sunday of the resurrection were for a long time festivals of obligation. At present these days are no longer kept as solemn holidays; but the people still sanctify them. Eastertide is full of religious rejoicings. As the feast of the resurrection comes with the return of fine weather, this is the time when the artisans and workmen of towns stand in need of fresh air out of their narrow streets and stone inclosures: nature which has been, during winter, as it were dead under her winding sheet of snow, appears also to revive at this time of the year: it is also the beginning of the festivals outside the city. The people go to sing the hymn O Filii et Filie in the country churches, and to dine at the village. This is the season when the father and mother of a family clothe their children anew; the season when magistrates, men of business, and scholars have short vacations. The days which border on Easter have been found too sacred for labour. Christmas has had its joys under the grey and rainy clouds of December by the fireside: Easter has its rejoicings when the trees begin to bud forth, when cowslips open their flowers, and when the heavens expand their blue. When we pass in review all the holy joys which Catholicity spreads around life, we cannot but complain of cold and sceptical men who do not observe festivals as holidays: I write not for them: they to whom I dedicate my book do not disdain the pure joys which come from on high ; on the contrary, they seek them. They wish not the cold shades of death ; they believe in the resurrection. Not only in the resurrection of Jesus Christ, but in the resurrection of society. Yes, we boldly predict society will not remain as it is ; it will be in vain to wish to make it remain in the sombre regions of death : it will be in vain to place guards to prevent it going forth from the tomb : it will roll away the stone, it will break the seals, it will come out resplendent, and will unfurl to the breeze of heaven the standard of the cross. For it is by this sign that it will have conquered. Let us, men of good will, who firmly believe that this great day of resurrection will dawn on the world, endeavour to hasten its coming. The Sinner, you see by myself, may labour to bring back this glorious day : only holy hands can labour in the reconstruction of the temple.

Let us go then through the country, and when we see scepticism increase, when men shall be found willing to believe only what they can explain, when pride shall rise up against all mystery, when the spirituality of the soul is with difficulty acknowledged, because it cannot, like the body, be dissected ; when we see men take proud airs, and pull their hats over their eyes when they see a cross borne by a priest pass by, when a profane statue is stupidly raised over the ashes of the dead instead of the sign of Christianity and the resurrection ; when we see such things, let us cry out, ancient faith of our fathers, sacred belief, come forth from among the dead, arise ! arise ! When the followers of egotism boldly profess their withering doctrines, when they shrug their shoulders on hearing related a trait of devotedness, when they sneer at duties and sacrifices, when the baseness of the morality of interests, like the waves of an ocean of stinking water, shall roll, and swell, and rise, and threaten to overwhelm society, then, loudly invoking the morality of duty, let us cry out with all our might, noble doctrine of denying ourselves, great devotedness, generous sacrifices, come forth, come forth from among the dead, arise ! arise ! Alas ! they would like to make a new country, despoiled of traditions, and barren of monuments ; if our fathers have had renown, it must be forgotten ; if they have had glorious tombs, we must leave only the ashes ; whatever dates from a Christian age must be as if it never had been. Such is the wish of the impious ; but we will never submit to such a stupid wish. We will regret in our country places the old abbeys, with their high bellfries, their vaults, their arches, their cloisters, and their pinnaced roofs ; the strong castles with their numerous towers, their deep ditches, their drawbridges, their threatening portcullis, and when we behold a black and sacrilegious band lay their vandal hands on these ornaments of Catholic France, when we walk on the white dust of all these monuments, we will cry out, saints, hermits, pious pilgrims, valiant cavaliers, followers of arms, bards, troubadours, come forth from the dead, arise, arise ! Every true Christian must labour at the resurrection of what was holy and what has been destroyed. Alas ! we know that it is not by calling aloud to kings, pontiffs, hermits, arise, arise ! that we shall make them rise from their beds of marble and clay : we know well, that the voice of man cannot cry loud enough to wake the dead ; but what we can, and ought to do, is to make honoured the doctrines and principles of religion, of honour, of freedom, of loyalty : let us restore to the present what there was of good in the past, and thus secure the good of the future. And when we have once put our hand to the work, let us not be disheartened. And when we shall meet with obstacles, let us remember,—we who wish to obey what the God of our fathers has enjoined, we who wish society to be like the houses of the children of Israel, marked with the blood of the paschal lamb, that God in his anger may no more decimate it : let us remember that the Hebrews at the pasch were standing, with shoes on their feet, and with their loins girt, and with staves in their hands ; let us imitate them, let us be in readiness to begin our march, let us remember that we are travellers, that the softness and pleasures of repose are not made for him who wishes to reach the goal which has been marked out for him : and if on our journey we find many wild lettings, that is to say, many bitter things, let us not murmur, let us not be cast down : God has not said that the travellers on this earth shall not be fed but with milk and honey.—Orthodox Journal.

MISCELLANEA.

NORTHERN AND WESTERN DISTRICTS OF ENGLAND.—CARDINAL SPADA.—In the congregation of Cardinals, held at the Propaganda on the 27th of November, the Rev. William Riddell was appointed coadjutor Bishop to the Right Rev. Dr. Mostyn. The right rev. prelate completed his theological studies in this college. He was for some time secretary to the late Cardinal Weld, and has for some years distinguished himself as a zealous and efficient missionary at Newcastle-on-Tyne. The appointment has been confirmed by his Holiness. The sacred congregation held its sitting for the month of December on the 18th, in which the Very Rev. Dr. Baggs was unanimously elected Vicar-Apostolic of the western district of England, which appointment was on the following day most graciously confirmed by his Holiness. The right rev. prelate is the third rector of this college who has been elevated to the episcopal dignity. Cardinal Spada is dead. He died most exemplarily, and left a great portion of his vast property to pious uses. He was a prince in his own family right.—Tablet, Jun. 6.

ALGIERS.—THE TRAPPISTS.—We read in a letter from Algiers : “ I have already spoken to you of the establishment of the Trappists ; you can imagine nothing more admirable. Three religious have undertaken the truly Christian work of adopting three hundred young Arab orphans, rendered such by the war, and who were wandering in destitution and misery about the mountains ; they support and instruct them, and will make them agriculturists, in order that when they grow up they may be settled in the surrounding villages. Are you not moved at the mere recital of this noble enterprise of charity ? ” —Univers.

CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

AN EXAMINATION OF THE ARGUMENT CONTAINED IN A RECENT PAMPHLET by the Rev. C. J. Quartley, entitled, May I Separate from the Church of England? BY THE REV. THOMAS SMITH, Missionary of the Free Church of Scotland. Calcutta, 1844.

We do not well know what to think of Mr. Smith's judgment on the Book of Common Prayer, and we are therefore disposed to submit it, in his own words, without much preface. We have no hesitation, however, in saying, that Mr. Smith admirably exposes the inconsistency of the Church of England, (no very difficult task to be sure), and perhaps this is the only point in which he has succeeded well. If the Free Church of Scotland were obliged to stand on the defensive, instead of the Church of England, we strongly suspect that Mr. Quartley would be no less successful than Mr. Smith in the discovery of doctrinal inconsistencies and unscriptural practices; and we see no reason why it should seem to be a maxim, that the Kirk of Scotland, free or enslaved, must be the pure and scriptural Church, if the Church of England be proved corrupt and unscriptural. Might not both be equally corrupt and equally unscriptural; and, though they are diametrically opposed to each other, may not one of them be Scylla and the other Charybdis? May it not happen thus, that though the passage from one to the other is short, it is only the track that runs exactly between them, without inclining to either, is safe? we think, and we hope that Mr. Smith will prove, for the satisfaction of the seceding member of the Church of England, whose pamphlet he defends, that the free Kirk is not only free from the trammels of State-patronage, but free from religious error. But it is now time to hear Mr. Smith's judgment on the book of Common Prayer.

The Church of England's inconsistency in denying the right of private judgment—the fundamental principle of the reformation.

"We come now to the part of Mr. Quartley's pamphlet in which he treats his opponent's objections to 'some portions of the authorized formularies of the Church;' and to this part of the subject we approach with fear and trembling. We know not how we can speak of Mr. Quartley's reasonings upon this subject, without expressing feelings which we should wish never to be obliged to entertain, or called to express, regarding a minister of the gospel of Christ.

"The first point that Mr. Quartley undertakes to defend, is that part of the 20th article, which states, that the Church has power to decree rites and ceremonies, so long as they are not opposed to scripture. Now this would appear if taken alone to be very proper. But when we know from other sources the full meaning of the term 'decree,'—and when we know that the parties who decree the ceremonies reserve to themselves the sole power, in this respect, of judging as to what is, or what is not, opposed to scripture,—we shall see that what at first sight appears harmless is in reality an evil of fearful magnitude. The fourth canon at once shows what is the interpretation to be given to the term 'decree,' and substantiates what we have just stated with respect to the rule of judgment as to what is or is not accordant with scripture. 'Whoever shall hereafter affirm that the form of God's worship in the Church of England, established by law, and contained in the Book of Common Prayer and administration of sacraments, is a corrupt, superstitious, or unlawful worship of God, or containeth any thing in it that is repugnant to the scriptures; let him be excommunicated ipso facto, &c.' The article then permits the Church to decree any thing that is not opposed to scripture, and the canon at once shews that what is decreed is made a term of communion, and takes away all power of judging as to whether what is decreed be in accordance with scripture or no. This is no imaginary grievance. It is one which has driven from the communion of the Church of England hundreds and thousands of the best men that ever were in it; and it is one that bears and presses upon the consciences of multitudes who are still within its pale."

The Church of England defends superstition by the penalty of excommunication, and thus not only teaches but imposes error.

"The sign of the cross in baptism is one of the rites decreed by the Church. No scripture can possibly be pleaded in its favor. It seems, to say the least of it, to be superstitious, and we believe scarcely any one will have the hardihood to deny that it was originally introduced with a superstitious view, and with a superstitious signification. Hardly any one will deny either, that it is very frequently turned to a superstitious account. But merely saying that it is superstitious, subjects a man ipso facto to excommunication, as much as would the commission of the most grievous sin. On Mr. Quartley's principle, then, and on the admission of all that he has said as to the distinction between the teaching of error and the imposition of error, let us ask whether this very thing, little as it may seem, do not constitute a sufficient ground of separation. To declare that that which is confessedly the invention of superstition, and for a superstitious end, is superstitious, subjects a man ipso facto to excommunication. If this be not imposing of error, let Mr. Quartley tell us what would amount to that sin."

Mr. Quartley's defence of tradition.

"The passage which Mr. Quartley quotes from the second epistle to the Thessalonians, was written before the canon of Scripture was complete, and when probably many portions of the Scripture that were written, had not reached the Thessalonian Church. Now the Scripture itself contains all that is needful, in order to render the 'man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.'"

Mr. Smith's answer to Mr. Quartley on this point, every one must see, is a miserable failure. If it be true, that the entire canon of scripture is necessary as a rule of faith, does it not follow evidently, that the Bible alone was not always and from the beginning the rule of faith at all? And if it be true, that the second epistle to the Thessalonians, from which Mr. Quartley quotes in defence of tradition, was written before the canon of scripture was complete, is it not equally true, that the second epistle to Timothy, from which Mr. Smith quotes in support of the sufficiency of Scripture alone, was written before the New Testament was completed? And what is more fatal still to Mr. Smith's Protestant rule of faith, the Scriptures, which St. Paul declares can instruct unto salvation, are the Old Testament alone; the only Scriptures which Timothy could have known from his infancy. Mr. Smith's argument, therefore, completely saps the foundation of the Protestant rule of faith, but the defence of error must ever involve inconsistency, no matter who defends it. But let us hear Mr. Smith in continuation.

The Church of England will be visited by the plagues mentioned in the Book of Revelation.

"A plain man finds in his prayer-book this heading. 'The order how the rest of Holy Scripture (besides the psalter) is to be read.' Under that heading he reads thus, 'The Old Testament is appointed for the first lessons at morning and evening prayer; so as the most part thereof will be read every year once, as in the calendar is appointed.' Well, to the calendar he turns in order to receive the morning or evening portion provided for him by the church, and from the 27th of September to the 24th of November, he finds that what the church calls the Old Testament is the apocrypha. What parent is there who, if his son ask for bread, will give him a stone; or if he ask a fish will give him a scorpion? The Church of England does so to her simple and confiding sons. This is an error, a grievous error; if it be not the sin that is the subject of the curse in the last chapter of Revelation, the sin of adding to the things written in the word of God—we are unable to conceive how this sin could be committed;—and this error is not only taught, but imposed."

Mr. Quartley is suspected of blasphemy,—Mr. Smith's challenge.

"We pause before we proceed to remark upon Mr. Quartley's vindication of the Ordination-service, and consider whether there be any other explanation of which it is capable than that which at first view appears to be its meaning. But we cannot find any sense in the passage but this, that because certain words were right and proper as said by Jesus Christ, the Eternal Son of the Eternal Father, therefore they are right and proper when spoken by any Bishop whatsoever of the Church of England. We trust and hope this may not be Mr. Quartley's meaning, and therefore we refrain from bringing against the passage the charge of blasphemy. We therefore leave this main point of the argument, as being, according to the only interpretation that we can put upon it, too monstrous to bear any remark; and merely allude to some of the misstatements that occur in the carrying out of the argument. It is not, as Mr. Quartley states, 'a historical fact that Apostolical succession exists in the Church of England.' We challenge him to prove that it does."

Baptism in the Church of England.

"We are far from denying, that there is an analogy between circumcision and baptism; but the fact, that children suffered from their parents' neglect of an ordinance which it was fully in their power to observe, can never be any justification of parents or sponsors in making a vow on behalf of their children, which it is, and ever must be, absolutely impossible for them to fulfil. This also is error imposed. No parent can enjoy the privileges of a member of the Church of England, unless he will consent to the vowing of a vow which cannot in any case be fulfilled."

Mr. Smith's mysterious doctrine of Infant Baptism, and useless adult Baptism.

"We do not deny that regeneration may be effected simultaneously with baptism. When the parties to be baptized are infants, we ought always to pray most earnestly that it may be effected in them, if it has not been effected before. But if the candidates for baptism are adults, we know no authority that we have from scripture for baptizing them at all, without having good grounds of hope that they have been already regenerated."

If this be the doctrine of the free Kirk of Scotland, certainly Church of England Protestants can never want a motive to shun it, nor an argument to pierce it. Our Saviour puts water first in the order of regeneration, but Mr. Smith would not give the water at all, except he had good grounds to hope that the work of regeneration was already completed. "Amen, amen, I say unto you (said Christ) unless a man be born again of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God," (St. John 3. 5.) but no, says Mr. Smith, the water may be dispensed with, and the regenerated souls of infants and adults may, notwithstanding, enter the kingdom of God. Which side shall we take?

CHRISTIANS ARE AS MUCH BOUND TO LEAVE THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AS THE REFORMERS WERE BOUND TO LEAVE THE ROMISH COMMUNION.

"The assertion which the Church of England requires of her ministers to make respecting every child that is baptized, is, in a large proportion of instances, a falsehood, as the subsequent lives of the individuals shew, according to the only scriptural criterion. But if it were only ministers that are involved in the falsehood, the call for separation upon the members of the Church would not be so urgent. The fact is that this falsehood is not only taught but imposed. Every candidate for confirmation must repeat the same assertion with respect to himself. By Mr. Quartley's rule then we are entitled to hold that Christians are as much bound to leave the Church of England, as the Reformers were bound to leave the Romish communion."

Fast-days and Holy-days of the Church of England.

"Mr. Quartley rests the defence of Fast-days, Holy-days, &c. on the assertion that their observance is not compulsory. We freely admit that he might naturally be supposed to know the truth on this point better than we; but, at the hazard of appearing presumptuous, we would ask him if the following Canon do not make their observance compulsory, 'All manner of persons within the Church of England, shall from henceforth celebrate and keep the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, and other holy-days, according to God's holy will and pleasure, and the orders of the Church of England prescribed in that behalf.'—Canon 13."

The Supreme head of the Church of England may be an Infidel or an Atheist.

"That there ought to be a connexion between Church and State we are as willing to maintain as Mr. Quartley himself;—but the particular kind of connexion which subsists between the Church of England and the State, we think worse than no connexion at all. In fact, on this point our Churchmanship is much higher than Mr. Quartley's. The Church of England has all along seemed to represent it as a favor conferred on her by the Sovereign, that he condescends to be her head. We would have her take this ground, that it is the greatest honor of the Sovereign to be a Member of the Church of Christ, and that he is bound to employ all his constitutional power, authority and influence, in her service, and for her protection and extension. The Church ought to claim all these services gratuitously and without a single compromise of her own independent authority, which she has received directly from her glorious Head and King; instead of this she has purchased certain privileges by the sacrifice of her independence, and by unwarrantable submission to temporal authority and power. This submission has been a grievous hindrance to her all along. At the time of the Reformation it kept her so near to Rome, that her sons now find that a few short steps can take them back. It has bound the burden of patronage on her shoulders so closely that it cannot be thrown off. It has destroyed discipline in the Church, and placed the most solemn services of our holy faith under the control of a man who may be an infidel or an atheist."

We have omitted several passages of Mr. Smith's pamphlet, which we previously marked for insertion, but we trust that enough has been given to show, that in Protestantism there is neither consistency nor certainty, and that while the adversaries of our holy Church dispute about what they do not understand, they jointly prove the necessity of returning to her bosom for peace and instruction.

CHINA.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—I send you an extract of a long letter which I have received from the Right Rev. Dr. E. J. C. Desfleches, Coadjutor of Sut-chuen (China.) Perhaps it may prove interesting to your readers.

I send it in the original French, as I have neither the leisure, nor even the ability, to make a good translation of it.

Receive the expression of my esteem for your constant and generous labours in favour of religion, and believe me, Dear Sir,

Yours very sincerely,

Agra,
26th March, 1844. F. FRANCIS, A. M.

China, Province of Sut-Chuen, September, 1843.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—I received only this year, by the arrival of our courier, your short but most agreeable letter from Kurnaul, dated 14th November, 1841. What a great pity that the many preceding letters from you should not have yet reached me. In fact this is the only one I have received from you since my departure from France.

I have so much to tell you, that in truth I do not know how to commence. You know that, after having remained one year in the Foreign Missionaries' Seminary, I was destined for China, and went to Bordeaux for that purpose; this was in 1838. At the end of the year I was at Macao waiting for a favorable opportunity to penetrate into the interior of this vast empire. The difference between the Chinese and the English immediately followed, and there was every reason to fear from the threat expressed, that the Mandarin and Envoy, Imperial Lin, would burn down Macao. We were in consequence sent to perform a quarantine at Manilla, where I remained until November, 1839, occupied with the instructions of two young Coreans. On my return to Macao, I determined anew upon penetrating into the interior of China accompanied by three lay-brothers. The blessing of the Almighty attended our journey: on our way I was often subjected to close examination and search, but was never found out, and in the beginning of February, 1840, we arrived at Sut-Chien safe and in health. The study of the Chinese language was any thing but agreeable to me, it caused much vexation and disgust. The language is very insipid; and yet by the ensuing September I was able to commence with my visits to the Christians. Here, each has his district, more or less extensive. The one I visited, during the three years, consists of twenty six stations, sufficiently distant from each other, comprising together a space of about twenty miles. It is nevertheless one of the smallest districts and yet the most important in regard to the number of Christian Inhabitants. The adults alone are about nineteen hundred, most of whom are faithful in their duties, that is to say, with the exception of about thirty or forty. In fact we will find some questionable characters in every community, and I dare say there are a few such among your flock. The most fatiguing part of our ministry is the visit to the sick; the Chinese entertain a great veneration for the Extreme-Union, they come from a distance of ten, twenty and sometimes even of thirty miles, for a priest to administer the Sacrament. When there is an Epidemic raging, we find our exertions insufficient for all. In my first year here I administered Extreme-Union to one hundred and thirteen. At first my visits were on foot, but eventually I was obliged to engage a palanquin. In consequence of the weak state of my health, I shall go to another district, where requisitions for confession and visits to the sick are less. During the hot season we pitch our tents in the most central situation of the grounds inhabited by Christians, whence we do not stir out but for the purpose of visiting the sick. The Christians are obliged to observe great secrecy in their attendance at Mass and to instructions, to elude the suspicion of the pagans. We make use of the largest house procurable for these our Christian purposes, and furnish and ornament it in the best manner possible, especially in the celebration of the feast days. I am writing this in our vacation time, that is to say, the time when our visits to the different districts are suspended, but it is coming to its close, when each one will resume his journey. We have no regular Church in any of the stations, but on our visits we establish ourselves in one of the houses belonging to the Christians, and there administer to the wants, both temporal and spiritual, of our flock. It has been my habit to hear ten confessions a-day, besides the urgent ones requiring our immediate attention, this engages my time up to the hour for dinner. In the evening, I look into and regulate the affairs on hand, fix upon the lessons and instructions to be given the next morning, read, recite my breviary, &c. You must have seen in the Annals, that no liberty is allowed us, the Edict which proscribes the Christian religion is always brought forward as a bulletin of the law to justify the persecutions we are subjected to by the Mandarins, and yet we have less to complain of than our brethren in Tonquin and Cochin China. The persecutors are not at our heels and do not follow our track, only we must be careful not to rouse the slumbering cat. The war between the English and the Chinese has been very profitable to religion. I say profitable, because it has been the means of throwing open to us the gates of many a place inaccessible before. If the English were to establish themselves permanently at the different ports ceded to them for the purpose of commerce, we might, under their auspices, extend our labours with greater security.

Your Vicariate Apostolic of Agra is really immense. How many Missionaries are there to clear away such extensive uncultivated tracts?—and Thibet, with all its provinces, is it not also under the jurisdiction of Monseigneur Borghi?—that is the intrenched fort of Satan—it is there all eagerly assemble to adore the great Ho Fou. The account of the importance of this place, which appeared in one of the numbers of the Annals, must have been read with astonishment, and the Missionaries of Set-Chuen were about going to preach in the Boutan province of Thibet—that is to say, a country subject to its jurisdiction. This was once a place where naturalists and others were sent for the improvement of science and for discoveries, but now nothing of the kind is thought of. This fine country is reserved for you, and you will not meet with much difficulty to enter it. Do our Chinese go to your quarter of the globe for commercial purposes? and how do you find them? You can influence proselytism among them with much more facility than among the Indians. We send books annually to our brethren at Idam for the Chinese Christians who muster strong there. What population, dear friend, in this kingdom! it is incalculable. In this our province of Set-Chuen alone there are at least thirty to forty millions of souls; judge from this, of other provinces. God! if we were allowed a little liberty, how many souls would we be the means of saving from perdition! You are aware how very weak-minded the Asiatics are, the least fear of persecution is enough to deter them; were it not for this, we would, with the grace of God, have annually added many thousands to the number of our catechumens. We have lately been much consoled by the conversion of a small number of adults, who will be able to secure the baptism of the infant pagans—infants who being below the age of reason are in articulo mortis. We send to all parts, persons who, practising as physicians and vendors of medicines, have more facility in introducing themselves to the people without exciting any suspicion. Last year there were 20,068 baptized. Here is a bulletin of the last administration, 679 stations:—37,539 annual confessions; not confessed and not visited 2,573; adults baptized 389;—Boys' Schools 39;—Girls' Schools 93.—There are nine French priests and more than twenty Chinese, but amongst the latter there are some too old to venture on a mission.

Give me a detail of every thing that concerns you currante calamo. It appears that our former school-fellows have preferred the Ocean and the society of Mary. How rejoiced am I at their success. May their Patroness Mary our good mother enable them to open the eyes of the poor savages. What a vast number of Islands in the Ocean! they require ships full of missionaries to be sent to them, and thus are we dispersed all over the globe, far, far away from our country and our homes, to pass our days in the midst of a barbarous people; but the same heaven protects us all, may the same heaven also one day unite us all! O quando lucescet trues qui nescit occasum di es, o quando sancta se debet quæ nescit hortem patria. And we, dear friend, must fight the fight of our Lord. I beg you will offer my very humble respects to Monseigneur Borghli.

I must tell you that it is the desire absolutely to make me a Bishop. I had intended to keep this from you in order that there be no restraint in your communication with me, a circumstance that would really give me much pain:—but on reflection I think we should always be plain and candid with a friend, and besides you were sure to hear of it by some other opportunities sooner or later. It is as well, therefore, that you should have the information from me. I am named Bishop of Sinite and Coadjutor of Set-Chuen, from the commencement of June last, but, in consequence of my age, I will not be consecrated before 1844, on the third Sunday after Easter. The fire of persecution, which had done some damage in the province of Fou Koung, contiguous to ours, seems now subsided. Here they have left us quiet. There are various orders to search every where for certain persons, but our Mandarins do not attend to them. The arrest of our brother Mr. Taillandier on his way to Set-Chuen would have been fatal to us, had not the circumstances consequent upon the war sufficiently engaged the attention of the Mandarins, so as to preclude their looking into the affairs of religion. The Jesuits who have arrived in China are labouring in the province of Nankin, where they had before a most flourishing mission. The Lazarites, a sufficiently large number, occupy the missions of the Portuguese and of others, amongst whom are a great many of our school-fellows.

Adieu, Adieu, dear friend, assist me to attain Heaven.

Always your devoted friend,

E. J. C. DESFLECHES,

Bishop elect of Sinite.

PROPAGATION OF FAITH.

A letter of the Rev. Mr. Beurel written at Singapore, on the 26th March last, to the Rev. N. Missionary Apostolic in the Bengal Vicariate, gives the following very interesting news:

“Two of our brethren of Bangkok, the Rev. Mr. Grandjean and the Rev. Mr. Vachal, have happily reached the Capital of Laos, on the 18th January last. It is called Xiong-Ma-i. They have been well received by the Laosian King and Princes, who have built at the Government expense a house for them. No Catholic or Protestant Missionaries have yet penetrated thither.”

ORIGINAL POETRY.

Præbe, fili mi, cor tuum mihi.
MY SON, GIVE ME THY HEART.

Proverbs 23. c. 26. v.

How sweet, my good Lord, and how lovely thou art!

Dost thou do me the favour to ask my poor heart?

'Tis worthless and stained, but tis' all I can give,
'Twill be safe in thy keeping and pure if I live.
I gave it to many, but 'twas thine all the while,
It wept for thy loss, it is cheered by thy smile;—
Like a stray child it mourned its father in thee,
'Twas mine, but I lost it—'tis thine, take it from me.

Selections,

THE SISTER OF CHARITY

She once was a lady of honour and wealth,
Bright glow'd on her features the roses of health;
Her vesture was blended of silk and of gold,
And her motion shook perfume from every fold:
Joy revell'd around her—love shone at her side,
And gay was her smile, as the glance of a bride;
And light was her step, in the mirth-sounding hall
When she heard of the daughters of Vincent de Paul.

II.

She felt in her spirit, the summons of grace,
That call'd her to live for the suffering race;
And heedless of pleasure, of comfort, of home,
Rose quickly like Mary, and answered, 'I come;'
She put from her person the trappings of pride,
And passed from her home, with the joy of a bride,
Nor wept at the threshold, as onward she moved,—
For her heart was on fire, in the cause it approved.

III.

Lost ever to fashion—to vanity lost,
That beauty that once was the song and the toast—
No more in the ball-room, that figure we meet,
But gliding at dusk to the wretch's retreat,
Forgot in the halls is that high-sounding name,
For the Sister of Charity blushes at fame;
Forgot are the claims of her riches and birth,
For she barbers for heaven, the glory of earth.

IV.

Those feet that to music could gracefully move,
Now bear her alone on the mission of love;
Those hands that once dangled the perfume and gem,
Are tending the helpless, or lifted for them;
That voice that once echo'd the song of the vain,
Now whispers relief to the bosom of pain;
And the hair that was shining with diamond and pearl,
Is wet with the tears of the penitent girl.

V.

Her down-bed a pallet—her trinkets a bead,
Her lustre—one taper that serves her to read;
Her sculpture—the crucifix nail'd by her bed,
Her paintings—one print of the thorn-crowned head;
Her cushion—the pavement, that wears her knees,
Her music—the psalm, or the sigh of disease;
The delicate lady lives mortified there,
And the feast is forsaken for fasting and prayer.

VI.

Yet not to the service of heart and of mind,
Are the cares of that heaven-minded virgin confined,
Like him whom she loves, to the mansions of grief,
She hastes with the tidings of joy and relief.
She strengthens the weary—she comforts the weak,
And soft is her voice in the ear of the sick;
Where want and affliction on mortals attend,
The Sister of Charity there is a friend.

VII.

Unshrinking where pestilence scatters his breath,
Like an angel she moves, 'mid the vapour of death,
Where rings the loud musket, and flashes the sword,
Unfearing she walks, for she follows the Lord.
How sweetly she bends o'er each plague-tainted face,
With looks that are lighted, with holiest grace;
How kindly she dresses each suffering limb,
For she sees in the wounded the image of Him.

VIII.

Behold her, ye worldly! behold her, ye vain!
Who shrink from the pathway of virtue and pain;
Who yield up to pleasure, your nights and your days,
Forgetful of service, forgetful of praise.
Ye lazy philosophers—self-seeking men,—
Ye fireside philanthropists, great at the pen,
How stands in the balance your eloquence weighed,
With the life and the deeds of that high-born maid?

ST. JOSEPH'S ORPHANAGE.

The Catholic Herald publishes a short correspondence between Dr. Carew and Moonshees Fuzulall Kurim and Buzlull Ruheem. The Archbishop applied to these gentlemen for the use of an unoccupied house belonging to them as additional accommodation for St. Joseph's Orphanage, and they readily acceded to the request. The generous act would have been more complete, had the occupation not been limited to one year, as the house is in a bad condition, and will have to be repaired, but it is sufficiently good to lead us to expect, that the Christian Advocate will feel considerable indignation on the occasion, and we shall be told, as we were the other day, that it is aggrandising the Papal Hierarchy! The Christian Advocate's doctrine would appear to be, that we can do good to no man, woman, or child who differs from us in faith, without being false to our own.—Eastern Star, April 8th.

AUSTRALIAN TRACT SOCIETY.

The publication of the Report of some Society with this name, really reminds one of the good old times of John Wesley and Lord George Gordon; and at the reading of their report (for some of it we did read,) we could not, in spite of the anticatholic sort of times we have, help inwardly smiling.

"Laugh and be fat," says the proverb: and we should have felt rather obliged to the "grave and reverend signors," who put forth the report, had they but left us Catholics out of it: but classing us as they do, with Idolaters and Mahomedans, in one place: and in the next breath, as a set of poisoners, with Puseyites or infidels, we should be deficient in respect to that august assembly, did we silently receive such particular honors.

What singular phases we papists have undergone! At one time under a baby pope of eight years old, by act of the English Parliament we were idolaters—under Mary, by an act of the same English Parliament, we were no idolaters, but true believers—then again, by the same Parliament, under Elizabeth, idolaters again?—now by the act of 1829 abolishing the test oaths, the Parliament says, we are once more not idolaters! We burnt London in 1666! (see old inscription on monument); then in 1675 we did not burn it, (inscription erased!)—in 1688 we burnt it once more! (inscription re-inscribed) in 1829 we did not burn it at all: (inscription erased once more!)—Whether again we shall burn the city is still hidden in the womb of futurity! and only time can reveal! There can be no doubt, if the orange conspiracy against the young Victoria had succeeded, and King Ernest the First been on the throne we should have burnt it once more, long ere now.

Luther used to ask in amaze, why it was that the Pope, the Devil, and the Emperor hated him so much, (perfect being as he thought himself;) borrowing no doubt from so great a master, they used of old thus to make out the trio—"the Pope, the Devil, and the Pretender." But now, though there is no pretender, our worthy neighbours, the Tractarians of Australia, have found us companions—they make the trio Popery, Puseyism, and Infidelity! (They are fond of triplets.)

"If we might be so bold, we would like to be told" why they want to shift the paternity of the bantling, infidelity, upon us, by thus clapping him and us into a pile?—Is not infidelity the genuine, regular, real offspring of their church's chere amie private judgement (a sort of lady with whom Catholics have no intercourse): therefore we think, so far, infidelity is much more congener with the Tractarian party themselves than with popery. As for Puseyism, sending it amongst us to find a home, is coming it "rather strong," (as Sam Weller says); for Puseyism claims to be the true (and only true) Church of England: and besides is quite tractarian, and (if not the elder) is at least a brother of theirs, and a true son of the aforesaid lady, private judgement.

It is enough for us papists to bear our own sins without having the laches of "sound Protestants" affiliated upon us—we must beg of them either to keep their offspring or send him to the parish—he is none of ours.

Propos of tracts—we often have heard that it is by the bible—the bible only, that Protestants are to be saved, but new light has sprung up: it seems the bible, which is all truth, cannot teach all truth!—the bible is not (as was long believed) the best thing to persuade mankind of the truths of christianity—tracts are better! So we have got two best things, the bible, and the tracts! We have heard of a sailor, who being asked, what three things he most desired to have; replied, "why, plenty of brandy!" "What next?" "Why, plenty of tobacco," "What thirdly?" "My eyes more brandy!" So with our tractarian gentry, (as seems:) first, to convert mankind, there must be plenty of bibles, next, plenty of tracts, and thirdly (what else?) more bibles!

We remember a story told us by an old friend, a Surgeon Milton, who happened to dine at the mess of the 18th or Royal Irish Regiment of Foot, in Galway, to which the London Hibernian (or some cognate) society had sent bibles in the Irish character (one for each soldier:) they were piled in the corner of the mess-room, as there was no other convenient store: when Milton, astonished at the enormous heap of books, asked the Colonel what they were? Irish bibles! Irish bibles? "Yes," said he. "Such a society," (naming it) "knowing we were the Royal Irish, conceived, of course, that we could speak and read Irish, and have sent me these 750 bibles for the regiment; although there are not 200 men among them who speak Irish, nor one who can read it in any character, still less in the old celtic: nor is there a man in the regiment who does not know and speak English, I wrote them, however, a letter of thanks, saying how much they had stopped swearing and drinking in the regiment, and stating the men's gratitude, &c.: I could not do less."

Such is a sample of the way in which the money of the old spinsters at Exeter Hall and elsewhere is managed. Happening to meet a passage in Blackwood, touching on tracts, we give it, that our Australian friends may see what sort of things these same tracts are; these great co-workers with the bible in man's slavation.

"These good people," says Blackwood, "our tract-mongers, inundate the country with a vast quantity of the most execrable trash that ever disgraced the press of an enlightened land. Whether it be, that the conceit of the directors of these institutions commonly lead them to suppose, that it is their duty to write, as well as to distribute them, we know not; but it is certain, that the works they do distribute are the most abominable outrages upon good taste and good sense, and, in not a few instances too, upon sound religion, which have ever happened to come under our inspection. Vulgar, drivelling, incredible histories, of imaginary conversions of milkmaids, boatswains, drummers, pedlars, and pickpockets; with now and then (for diversity) of an Arab Scheik, a Brahmin, or daughter of some Rajah—drawing, nauseous narratives of the gossipings and whinings of religious midwives and nurses, and of children two or three years old, already ‘under concern;’—sickening hymns, composed by men in whom poetry and piety seem to have been twin births;—horrible and blasphemous stories of sudden judgments upon card players, swearing soldiers, or beer drinkers, &c. &c., not a word of which is true. Such are the greater part of the mystic leaves which these doting sybils, the Tract Societies, are perpetually dispersing over the surface of a justly thankless land.”

So far Blackwood. We are getting tired of the weary, stale and unprofitable subject, and fear our readers will be so as well: but one idea thrown out, is so choice—so original, so racy, that one cannot let it pass—the exchange of pulpits! This is rich! it is tres bon! Shade of John Knox! could any disciple of thine hear the proposition and his hair not stand on end,

Like quills upon the fretful porcupine!

Thou who calledst episcopacy the mark of the beast! and one of whose noble martyrs on the scaffold, cried out, “bear witness, Christians, I die with an heart-hatred of popery, prelacy, and of all superstition whatsoever!”

Time was, in days of yore, when as far South as London—

Even oyster wenches lock'd their fish up,
And trudged about to cry—no Bishop!

Hæu pietas! hæu princeps fides! We are surely fallen on evil days!—But we forget.—This is no affair of ours,—and being a matter of taste, admits of no argument: de gustibus non est disputandum—(there is no disputing tastes.) We hope, however, the gentlemen tractarians will have the good taste to keep their own offspring, infidelity, to themselves: we know him not, and desire not his company.—Sydney Morn. Chron. Jan. 20.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

The following very interesting letter from the Very Rev. Dr. Fleming, Vicar Apostolic of Newfoundland, who, as our readers know, is now in Dublin, appeared in the Freeman of Saturday.

STATE OF RELIGION IN NEWFOUNDLAND.

Church of St. Francis, Merchant's-quay.

“VERY REV. AND DEAR SIR.—Your connection with that glorious institution, the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, to which the foreign missions of our holy church are so deeply indebted, together with the zeal you have always manifested for the extension of God's kingdom on earth, prompt me to address you, in order to lay before the Catholic public, through you, the present state and condition of the mission of Newfoundland, as well as to inform you of the hopes and prospects that are before us—the great inducements that present themselves on every side to increased exertion to unfold the pages of the Book of Life to a people who ‘thirst with a thirst divine’ after the truths of religion, but whose poverty and the lowliness—the isolation of their position, debar them at present, in a great measure, from the attainment of religious instruction, or those sacramental aids to salvation that are with facility rendered available in dense communities.

“I should not at present enter upon this task, had I not been forced to yield to the kind suggestions of a sincere friend—a distinguished prelate of the Irish Church, because (exclusive of many other reasons) in doing this, it may be necessary to speak of myself, and the exertions I have hitherto made—the difficulties that were required to be obviated, before religion was brought to its present state of forwardness; yet, shall I not feel in the slightest degree apprehensive, that in doing so any person will deem me actuated by feelings akin to egotism, but confiding in that spirit of Christian charity which distinguishes the Irish Catholic people, I shall divest myself of that mistaken sensibility which would seem to prompt me to pass them over lightly, and describe to you as briefly as possible the present state of religion in that interesting colony.

“The population of Newfoundland, as it has been represented by the census taken in 1836, amounts to 75,094, the Catholics being enumerated as 37,718, the Church of England Protestants 26,740, and the various denomination of Dissenters 10,636. This enumeration is now admitted by all to be incorrect, and there is very little doubt, indeed, that there are not fewer than 100,000 inhabitants in Newfoundland. Indeed, I have every reason to know that the Catholic congregations number over 60,000; yet, from the circumstance of this number being sprinkled along the shores of an island larger than Ireland, it presents many difficulties, in a missionary point of view, to the perfect establishment of religion. The interior of the country is not alone uninhabited, but literally unexplored, in so much that there is not a house in the island six miles distant from the sea, nor was there a mile of road in the entire country till some years after my consecration, although within the last few years roads have been made between some of the principal settlements within the districts of St. John's and those of the nearest districts of the north and south: but with the exception of these three districts the rest of the island may be said to be in its primitive state, so that, except during summer, there are no means of communication but by water, and in winter through wilds and forests, and over frozen morasses and lakes covered with pathless snows; hence, at every season, the transit from one harbour to another is attended not only with difficulty, but often with imminent danger of death.

"Upon my appointment to the spiritual Government of that vicariate, in 1830, I found the whole country divided into five great districts, and in the whole island only seven priests, and of these seven ecclesiastics the venerable and sainted vicar-general, Doctor Yore, one of the first founders of the mission, was fast sinking under the weight of labour and years; the second was dying of consumption, a third was labouring under mental weakness, and a fourth more disposed to retard than advance the good of the mission. The smallest of these districts, under the care of the above number of ecclesiastics, comprehended a length of shore not less than 150 miles, while the more remote embraced some ten, twenty, or more great bays, each of which included a large number of inhabited harbours, coves and creeks, some of them from ten to forty miles from the nearest settlement.

"Thus in the capital, a concentrated population of fourteen or fifteen thousand; in three other towns, 4,000, 3,000, 2,000; in two or three other places, about 1,000; and in no other place more than 500, while, for the most part, you find them scattered, here 60, there 40, at a distance of twenty miles 20, perhaps thirty miles further four or five, and in many isolated harbours two, sometimes only one family, cut off from all communication with man save the precarious high way of the ocean, a path that is closed against them for six or seven months of the year by impassable barriers of ice. The consequence was, that a great portion of the population was utterly abandoned—the morning of their days unblest by the saving waters of Baptism, the springtide of their life unenlightened by spiritual instruction, their marriages unblest by the sacramental unction, their death-struggle unsupported by the soothing sacraments instituted for the comfort of the dying sinner, and they have sunk into the grave without those holy rites of our religion, which give promise of awakening the mercy of a bountiful God in life everlasting.

"These wants I have gone far towards surmounting. The mission now is divided into fifteen districts served by twenty-four priests. In the central district, Saint John's, I have placed four priests. In that of Harbour Grace three, in others two, and in the more remote, one priest. From the birth of that mission until the year 1830 there was no settlement or town in Newfoundland in which the holy sacrifice of the mass was offered daily; nay, even in St. John's the congregation was frequently obliged to be contented without an opportunity of hearing mass. But the places in which it was regularly offered every Sunday of the year, and on week days pretty generally, were only two, viz.; St. John's and Harbour Grace; and now let me pray you to mark the difference. Mass is said every day of the year at the following places, viz.: at Saint John's, at Harbour Grace, at Carbonear, at Northern Bay, at Trinity, at Bonavista, at King's Cove, at Tilton Harbour, at Brigus-by-North, at Harbour Main, at Witless Bay, at Ferryland, at Fermuse, at Trepassey, at Saint Mary's, at Great Placentia, at Little Placentia, at Merashen, and St. Burin. On each Sunday of the year mass is celebrated in the following places, viz.; in the district of St. John's seven masses, one at the Presentation Convent, three at the Church of St. John's, one at Portugal Cove, one at Torbay, one at Petty Harbour; and the nearest of these little villages is about nine miles from St. John's. In the district of Brigus-by-North mass is said, at Brigus-by-South, at Port de Grace, at Harbour Main, and at Holy Rood. In the district of Harbour Grace, two masses at Harbour Grace, two at Carbonear, and one at Spaniard's Bay. In the district of Northern Bay, mass is said at Northern Bay and at Western Bay. In the district of Trinity, at Trinity Harbour one mass. In the district of King's Cove, one mass at King's Cove, one at Bonavista, and one at Catalina. In the district of Tilton Harbour, one at Tilton Harbour, and one at Jobat's Arm. In the district of Bay Bulls, one at Bay Bulls, and one at Witless Bay. In the district of Ferryland, one at Ferryland one at Brigus-by-South, one at Fermuse, and one at Renewes. In the district of Trepassey, one at Trepassey. In the district of St. Mary's, two at St. Mary's. In the district of Great Placentia, two. In the district of Little Placentia, two. In the district of Merashen, one; and in the district of Burin, two masses. Here are thirty-two localities, or little towns, where mass is offered on every Sunday of the year (and where the inhabitants of three times as many more harbours and coves attend), and in some of them two masses; whereas, before the year 1830, the congregations of Jobat's Arm, Tilton, King's Cove Harbour, Bonavista, Catalina, Trinity, Northern Bay, Western Bay, Spaniard's Bay, Brigus Harbour, Main, Holy Rood, Portugal Cove, Torbay, Petty Harbour, Bay Bulls, Witless Bay, Brigus-by-South, Renewes, Fermuse, Trepassey, Saint Mary's Little Placentia, Merashen, would feel happy when they could get mass twice or thrice in the year upon a week day, and some of them even not enjoying that happiness oftener than once in three years; and I have known, while a curate at St. John's, three of these places above named not to have had mass for six years. Thus will you perceive, that, notwithstanding the great advances we have made, there are many wants yet to be supplied, but from the eminent success that has already crowned us, I have the utmost confidence in the goodness of God, and in the charity of our Christian brethren in other countries, that we shall be yet able to bring a knowledge of the faith to the wanderer from the true fold, the comfort and consolation of the sacraments to the faithful in places the most lonely, the most isolated.

"Having thus given you an account of the progress of the Newfoundland mission, I must now close, for I have already extended this letter to too great a length, and in my next I shall confine myself principally to the subject of our churches, but to our cathedral in particular, because I consider it to be one of the greatest importance to religion, and because, in the relation of some of the particulars connected with it, you will see developed the zeal, the ardour, the enthusiasm of the whole population in a cause which they feel sensible to be vitally interwoven with the best interests of religion. I have the honour, &c., "MICH. ANTONY FLEMING, O.S.F.

Bishop of Carpiac.

MISCELLANEA.

IRELAND.

WATERFORD.—At an ordination held at the Roman Catholic Cathedral, on Saturday last, by the Right Rev. Dr. Foran, Messrs. Patrick Power and James O'Gorman were ordained priests, and Mr. Denis Byrne received deacon's orders.—Waterford Chronicle.

THE PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.—The receipts of the Association for the Propagation of the Faith, for the preceding month, exceeded 600*l*. This will make upwards of 7,000*l*, for the year from poor, but faithful Ireland. We say to other and more prosperous nations, "Go ye and do likewise."—Tablet.

SPAIN.

One of our contemporaries (El Mundo) gave a notice of considerable importance last week. It stated that Mgr. Cappaci, internuncio from the Court of Rome, in Portugal, is expected here (at Madrid) immediately, to arrange the ecclesiastical affairs of Spain. We know not what degree of confidence should be placed in this statement; but it is, at least, probable, though perhaps premature, as the present Ministry have certainly charged their envoy to Rome, Senor Hoyos, to reconcile this court to that of Rome, if possible.—El Catolice.

AMERICA.

CONFIRMATION.—The Bishop (Hughes) administered the Sacrament of Confirmation in Transfiguration Church on Sunday, the 10th Dec., to one hundred and ninety-three persons, several of whom were converts. Previous to the ceremony, the right rev. prelate explained the nature of the Sacrament, and the benefits resulting from its reception to those duly prepared. At the High Mass the bishop preached from the Gospel of the day (Matt. xi. 2--10), on the necessity of always maintaining the Christian strength and firmness of character received at Confirmation. The discourse was heard by a very large congregation.—New York Freeman's Journal.

CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT LIBERTY.—The Olive Branch prophesies the dangerous influence, which, ere long, Popery is destined to wield in the United States, and speaks very positively as to its dangerous tendency to arbitrary power. The Olive Branch is in error in saying that the eight new bishops owe allegiance to any foreign power or potentate; all the gentlemen named are citizens of the United States, and if he has no fear of the pillory before his eyes, he should have some regard for truth and morality as the conductor of a religious journal. Now, we challenge the Olive Branch to show in the whole history of the Catholic Church, a single authorised or unauthorised edict, or expression, of a man high in authority or the confidence of the rulers of the Church, or of those rulers in any age, collectively or individually, to compare with the ferocious intolerance of John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, who declared "that Popery should not be tolerated by any Government, Pagan, Christian, or Mahomedan," and who also volunteered to raise an independent corps, to aid George III., in putting down the North American Colonies in their struggle for equal rights. Who was then the friend of oppression, Louis, the Catholic King of France, or Wesley, the apostle of Protestantism?—Boston Pilot.

AN EPISCOPAL WAGER.—An unscrupulous correspondent of the Cincinnati Atlas having asserted that "Jesuitism bound a man by a secret oath to commit the worst crimes if the Pope commanded;" the Right Rev. Bishop Purcell, in a communication to the same paper, makes the following proposition:—"I hereby declare that I will deposit five hundred dollars in the hands of any respectable citizen, provided that an equal amount be deposited by your correspondent. If he can prove his assertion, let him take the money and bestow it in charity—if he cannot prove it, let the same privilege be extended to me. I am willing, should it meet with his approbation, to have the question decided by the Rev. Mr. Perkins, who I trust will pardon me for mentioning his name, because in general estimation his character for sincerity and scholarship cannot be impeached. I do not know his opinion on this subject, but I will abide by his judgment." This is fair enough, but we are afraid it will result in nothing. The man who could deliberately write such lies as that above, from the Atlas, is far too cunning to attempt to prove them. He knows a trick worth two of that. Add half-a-dozen other and worse falsehoods, fly off from the point at issue and season with a sufficient quantity of abuse of your adversary, especially, if he should be a clergyman, and more especially, if a bishop—and the thing is done.—New York Freeman's Journal.

SPARRY.—I am sorry that that active friend of our faith, the notorious ir-rev. Sparry, has been prevented from doing us any more good by his sudden arrest for an infamous crime in the State of Pennsylvania. He preached here a few years ago, but, like the unskillful murderer, who overdoses his victim with poison and thereby produces often a beneficial instead of a deadly effect, from retoration, Sparry helped the cause he intended to injure and destroy. He was preaching about blood and Popery, when "Stop," exclaimed a sharp, stern, Protestant voice from one of the aisles, "we have had enough of blood, devilry, lies, and anti-Christian sport for one night; I move that we all go home, and that the deacons close the church." The motion was put and carried almost unanimously. He lived in the same hotel with me; and on his return from church, I congratulated him on the effect of his sermon, and asked about the amount of his collection. The latter question touched the tender spot; he could evidently stand anything but that; he started from the chair, took a lamp, and, amidst the roars of laughter of the company, he left the room; not without turning round at the door, however, and fixing his fiendish eyes upon me, exclaimed, with a most kind Christian heart, "You d—d Papist!" Oh, good night, friend, said I, take care you are not robbed of the collection to-night—lock your door. The breakfast-table was minus of his company next morning; and after inquiries I found he had eloped—absquatulated—left the city, never, I hope, to return. This is the "reverend scoundrel" who has published pretended extracts from "Dens' Theology," which he has laboured to spread for the money it procures him, as well as for the abuse of the Catholics.—Catholic Herald of Philadelphia.

PERTH AMBOY.—A new Catholic church is about to be erected at Perth Amboy. The evidences are thus constantly accumulating of the advancement of religion, and the regard of Catholics for their faith. In sections far remote from the crowded cities, places of worship have been long wanting, the Catholic is incessantly employed in the endeavour to dedicate a church to the service of his religion. The Catholics of Perth Amboy are but few in number, but incited by that zeal which never tires, they have bought a piece of land for a burial ground, and are endeavouring to collect a fund to erect a small chapel thereon. Interments after the first are to be free of expense, and the church itself will be in conformity to ancient custom, without pews, but benches will be provided for the aged and infirm. —New York Truth Teller, Dec. 9.

THE POOR MAN'S CHURCH.—I am happy to tell you that, on passing the door of a church at the western end of London this morning, I saw the following notice posted on its walls:—"Notice is hereby given that in future no fees will be demanded for the registration of baptisms in this parish." This is a good beginning, for it confesses past error, and promises amendment, though the word "demanded" is not quite in the true penitent style; but I am curious to know whether any payment is or will be "demanded" for churchings in that parish! for otherwise the poor will still find that their poverty, instead of being recognised as giving them a most indisputable right to share in the ministrations of the church, most unchristianly excludes them.—Correspondent of the Times.

A SLIGHT MISTAKE.—A correspondent states that a rather strange occurrence took place at the parish church of M—, on Sunday week. Two children being brought to be baptised, the parson commenced the marriage service instead of the baptismal one, and had gone as far as the question, "Wilt thou have this woman for thy wedded wife," &c., before he found out his mistake.—Carnarvon Herald.

STAINED GLASS.—The Bishop of Norwich has presented to the Cathedral four figures in stained glass, executed by Mr. Yarrington, of that city, which have been inserted in the upper bays of the centre window of the chancel. Four other figures are in progress for the same window, at the cost of his lordship.—Tablet.

NEWCASTLE.—The Puseyites of Newcastle had a field-day on Christmas-Day, much to the horror of all good Evangelical Low Churchmen. The churches of St. Andrew and St. Peter, and in St. John's, Gateshead Fell, were profusely decorated with evergreens, with laurels, with holly, ivy, and yew trees; as was described, the ivy and the yew branches to indicate sorrow and death; laurels as emblematic of peace and victory, and with evergreens to represent the undying bloom of immortality. It was described as a very ancient Christmas custom, which, doubtless, is quite true; but those who can recollect the ridicule and contempt poured from these same channels, some fifteen or twenty years ago, against the ceremonies in our Holy Church on Palm Sunday, must, indeed, marvel at the great revolution that is passing in what is termed the "religious world around."—Ibid.

A POLICEMAN SHOT BY A CLERGYMAN.—The Rev. Mr. Brogden, of Childwick Hall, near St. Alban's, shot policeman Wintle, of the Herts Constabulary, on the last night of the old year, in the belief that he was a robber, yet he was in the public road, and sixteen yards from the outer gates of the rev. gentleman's premises. —Ibid.

AMERICA.—THE CONTRAST.—The salary of the Right Rev. Bishop Onderdonk, of the Episcopal Church, is five thousand dollars. At a recent meeting of the vestry of Trinity Church the Bishop laid before the vestry the absolute necessity he was under of an addition to his salary of fifteen hundred dollars. Twelve hundred was finally added. At the same meeting a coloured Episcopal Church, which had been struggling with great difficulties, asked for a donation of 100 dollars and were denied.—New York Journal of Commerce.—Bishop Hughes, of the Catholic Church, receives fifteen hundred dollars a year. Our Protestant brethren pay dear for their preaching.—Boston Pilot, Dec. 16.

BISHOP OF PITTSBURGH.—We have much pleasure in announcing the safe arrival of the Right Rev. Bishop of Pittsburgh, Dr. O'Connor. He came passenger in the packet-ship, Queen of the West, at this port on Sunday last. We learn that Dr. O'Connor has brought with him one clergyman, several students, and six "Sisters of Mercy." —New York Freeman's Journal.

NUNS AND MONASTIC INSTITUTES.

Monasteries in France, the Netherlands, and other countries which fell under the yoke of the French tyrants, have shared the destiny of monasteries in England. These noble and pious establishments, which had been for so many years the asylum of virtue, around which deserts had been changed into rich meadows, fruitful fields, populous hamlets, villages, and towns, are nearly levelled to the ground, their peaceful inhabitants have been driven into the wide world, to drag on a miserable existence in wretchedness and grief: their possessions, which, in great part, were the property of the poor, have passed into other hands, without enriching their unjust purchasers. Nothing remains but here and there some stately ruins, which loudly proclaim the taste, munificence, and piety of their founders, and the rapacious cruelty and vandalism of the present age. This destruction of monasteries was celebrated with complacency by Protestant writers, as the triumph of reason over superstition, and as the forerunner of the downfall of popery; whilst in reality it was only the beginning of that deluge of calamities which laid waste the greater part of Europe. The same principle which justified this destruction, led to the plunder of the property of the secular clergy, nobility, gentry, and all the rich, and paved the way to that military government in France, which, during a space of twenty-two years, occasioned the death of ten millions of men at least. With the riches of the religious, it was said by their enemies, that all the debts of the nation would be paid, and scarcely any taxes in future would be necessary; but a general bankruptcy ensued, and taxes ten times heavier than they were in the most distressed times of the monarchy were imposed. If to this we add what happened under the reigns of Henry VIII., Elizabeth, and James I., we shall have an evident proof that the dissolution of monasteries never was of any service to the states which resorted to that impolitic and unjustifiable measure of intolerance and arbitrary power. It has been maintained by several Protestant authors of reputation, that the legal provision made for the poor by the last parliament of Queen Elizabeth, was rendered necessary by the dissolution of monasteries in the reign of her father. Before this event took place, the wants of the indigent were relieved by the charity of the monks; and Dugdale remarks, that while the convents stood, there was no act for the relief of the poor, so amply were they provided for by those houses; whereas in the next age, there were no less than eleven bills brought into the House of Commons for that purpose. That monasteries afforded relief to the poor, is a position maintained by Smith and Blackstone, the latter of whom attributes to the dissolution of these monasteries, the numerous statutes made in the reign of Henry VIII. and his children, for providing for the poor and impotent. From the twenty-second of Henry VIII. to the thirty-third of Elizabeth, hardly a parliament met, in which some laws that regarded the poor were not enacted. But if we reckon up (to use the words of a Protestant writer) the superabundance of men and women who devoted themselves to the welfare of their neighbours, we shall be forced to acknowledge, that the suppression of convents was of no service to society, but even an irreparable loss.

We will not speak here of the number of celebrated men whom religious orders have produced: scholars, poets, historians, critics, mathematicians; divines, metaphysicians, astronomers, politicians, commentators, moralists, orators, &c., who, by their profound meditations and researches, knowledge of antiquity and learned languages, discoveries and genius, have promoted the progress of literature and the polite arts, established the evidences of Christianity with the greatest perspicuity and strength, and preached the morality of the gospel with an eloquence equal to that of the most famous orators of Athens and Rome. Neither will we mention the number of colleges governed by religious, as nothing very positive can be ascertained from the testimony of historians; all we know is, that in Spain, the religious of St. Basil had four colleges in each province; that all the different congregations of St. Benedict dedicated themselves to the education of youth, and that the Jesuits had establishments all over Europe, &c. &c. As for women, it is known that they were all brought up by nuns. We will content ourselves with giving an idea of the indefatigable labours of religious of both sexes, in relieving the wants and necessities of suffering humanity; for even this imperfect sketch will be sufficient to remove the prejudices of those who are willing to be undeceived.

Distinguished by different rules and denominations, but all tending to the same end,—the exercise of benevolence and charity,—an immense number of religious of both sexes had divided among themselves the various distresses and sufferings which form the long and melancholy catalogue of woes that afflict the poor, in order to give to each of them a more speedy and effectual assistance. Some took for their department the care of the sick under the most contagious disorders. There are reckoned in Christian Europe about four thousand three hundred cities and towns;* of these, three thousand two hundred and ninety-four are of sufficient extent and population, to be supposed to have had each an hospital; (a calculation rated much too low, for in Catholic countries there was scarcely a village of any note, without a religious establishment for the sick and the poor) therefore you will have three thousand two hundred and ninety-four hospitals, more than the two-thirds of which were served by religious. Now taking upon an average that each of these hospitals contained a hundred beds, it will be found that about three hundred and twenty-nine thousand and four hundred of our fellow-creatures were every day, for more than a thousand years, attended and relieved in their various diseases, by religious of both sexes. If to this we add the numberless poor who were not in hospitals, and were nevertheless attended, relieved, and assisted with food, raiment, and medicines by religious associations, during a period of fifteen centuries, the aggregate amount of charities of every description, bestowed upon the distressed and destitute, will be beyond the power of calculation. Other religious dedicated their whole time to the bringing up orphans and foundlings. In every capital and large town, there were asylums and houses of refuge for those unfortunate women, whom want or libertinism had led astray from the paths of innocence. There you would have admired women of unblemished chastity, under the sweet name of "the daughters of the good Shepherd," devoting themselves to reclaim from vice, and bring back to sentiments of virtue, these melancholy victims, whom the world abandons to infamy and distress, after having first corrupted them by its pernicious maxims and examples. In order to secure their perseverance in their good resolutions, they were taught to work, and a small sum of money was given them to settle in the world. They were not even interdicted the hope of embracing a religious life. They were informed that, if after imitating Magdalen in her disorders, they took her for a model in their penance, many sins would be forgiven them, and even that they might aspire to the same favours which this great saint received from Him "who came not to call the just, but sinners to repentance." Luke v. 32.

On the highest Alps; on the summits of Mounts St. Gothard and St. Bernard; in those dreary regions covered all the year round with perpetual ice and snow, which do not contain a single shed, nor produce a single tree,—where nothing is heard but the roaring of the winds, nothing to be seen but numberless pieces of rock, which are all precipitated from the surrounding peaks, and where you cannot move a step without almost insurmountable difficulties and fathomless precipices,—there the charitable disciples of St. Bernard of Menthon and of St. Francis have established themselves, in order to give assistance to the benighted traveller. Bernard of Menthon was born in the Genevois in 903, and descended from one of the most illustrious houses of Savoy. Having embraced the ecclesiastical state, he employed himself in missions among the unconverted Pagans, who inhabited the mountains, and converted them to Christianity. Having witnessed the hardships and dangers encountered by the French and German pilgrims, in their passage to Rome over the Alps, this benevolent monk founded two monasteries or hospitia for their relief on Mount Joux, called from him Great and Little St. Bernard. These were peopled by canons-regular of St. Austin, and Bernard himself became their first provost. He obtained several important privileges from successive popes, and his convent acquired great popularity and large possessions. Bernard died at Novara, at the age of eighty-five, and was canonized. His institution has undergone a variety of vicissitudes, and lost great part of its riches, but it still subsists, and is eminently useful. There are ordinarily between twenty and thirty monks belonging to the convent; eight of whom are usually dispersed among the Alpine parish churches, under their patronage; ten or twelve, whose age and health are able to bear the keen atmosphere of the mountain, constantly reside at the convent; the few others, who can no longer bear it, are permitted to reside with the aged provost of the whole, in a house belonging to the convent, and situated at Martigny below. The monks of the mountain are industriously employed in the prosecution of their private studies, in the instruction of their novices, in the education of some scholars who are sent to board and lodge with them, and in managing the temporal economy of the whole. They have a prior, the deputy of the provost, and governor of the convent in his absence; a sacristan, who takes care of their chapels: a cellarer, serving as purveyor, comptroller of the kitchen, and managing all the exterior concerns of the monastery; a clavender, who keeps the keys, and dispenses the requisite articles to the monks and to the travellers; and an infirmarian, who takes care of the sick, in the apartment appropriated for them. The cellarer keeps twenty horses constantly employed during the summer, in fetching the magazines of flour, bread, cheese, liquors, and dried fruits, for themselves and for their guests, and forage for their milch cows during winter. Their fire-wood, of which they use a great quantity, is brought to them on the backs of mules, from the distance of twelve miles, and by a steep path, that is passable for six months only during the whole year. Before the winter sets in, they send down their horses for the season to a farm which they have on the northern side of the Rhone. With equal attention they relieve both their own countrymen and foreigners. They make no distinction of state, sex, or religion, and ask no questions concerning the country or creed of the wretched sufferer. In winter and spring their solicitude has a larger range of attention and activity. From the first of November, through the winter, to the first of May, a trusty Alpine servant, who as an Alpine, is denominated a Maronnier, and one or two dogs of an extraordinary size accompanying him, are constantly engaged in going to meet ravellers a considerable distance down the Val-lais. These dogs possess an instinct, and are trained in a manner to render them peculiarly useful in their employment. They point out the road to the guide and to travellers, through fogs, tempests, and snow; they have also the sagacity to discover travellers who, having lost their way, have fallen, amidst the drifts of snow, and who are lying there, wearied and exhausted. The monks themselves accompany the guide, and aid him in administering necessary relief. Apprised of the benumbing and stupifying effect of extreme cold, they rouse the sleeping travellers, and exert themselves in a variety of ways to preserve and recover them from approaching and apparent death: and in doing this they expose themselves to great danger. In order to avoid the numbness occasioned by the cold, they carry with them short thick staves, armed at the end with iron, and with these they continually strike their hands and feet. About three miles below the convent, on the road of Hannibal's ascent, they have built a small vaulted room, called the Hospital, which is intended for the casual refreshment of travellers benumbed, and to enable them to reach the convent. The trusty maronnier visits it frequently, in order to meet the traveller; but principally at the approach of night, and on his return leaves bread, cheese, and wine. On extraordinary occasions, when a storm subsides, he sallies forth to this building, with his stock of meat and wine, and assists all whom he finds distressed. The monks themselves are often seen on the tops of their rocks, watching opportunities for the exercise of their humanity. When the snow is deep on the ground they employ themselves in making roads through it, and thus, by timely vigilance, prevent many fatal accidents; but notwithstanding all their charitable efforts, scarcely a winter passes in which some traveller is not brought to the convent with his limbs benumbed and frozen. The traveller is sometimes quite overwhelmed, and sunk into the mass of descending snow. When he is not very deep, the dogs discover him by the scent, and when they fail, the monks engage in the laborious office. They range themselves upon the snow, and sound it with long poles; and thus they have rescued many from imminent danger of being lost. In order to avoid repetition, we shall only add, that the Capuchins who live in the Hospitium on Mount St. Gothard perform the same offices of charity, encounter the same difficulties, and are exposed to the same dangers.

From the summit of the Alps, let us pass to the new world: and the miracles of heroic charity which we have admired on Mounts St. Bernard and St. Gothard, we shall behold displayed with equal zeal and danger in the mines of Mexico and Peru. Peter of Betancourt, a friar of the order of St. Francis, residing at Guatemala, a town and province of South America, was moved with compassion at the distressed situation of the negro slaves, who in their maladies were left destitute of every assistance. By begging alms, having made the acquisition of a small and mean house where he kept formerly a school for the children of the poor whom he educated, he built himself near it a kind of infirmary, which he covered with rushes, in order to give a shelter to and attend the slaves who might be abandoned by their merciless masters. He soon met with a poor negro woman of that description. As she was so infirm as not to be able to walk, he took her on his own shoulders, and, proud of his burden, he carried her with joy to this miserable hovel which he called his hospital: and by the alms which he obtained, he provided for all her wants. She did not survive long, but died blessing the indefatigable care and charity of her benefactor. *The rich inhabitants of Guatemala could not resist the example of this humble and charitable friar: they opened their treasures, and, under the management of Peter of Betancourt, the mean house of the poor negro woman was changed into a magnificent hospital. He died young: the love of humanity had consumed his feeling heart. As soon as the report of his death was spread, all the poor and slaves ran to the hospital to see once more their tender benefactor. They kissed his feet, cut pieces from his clothes,—nay, they would have torn his body to pieces to have had some portion of his relics, if they had not been prevented by the military whom the governor was obliged to station round his coffin. One might have imagined that it was a tyrant who was thus protected against the hatred of his people. *No; it was only the corpse of a poor friar, which it was necessary to save from the effects of the gratitude and love of the poor and the distressed! Soon after the death of Peter of Betancourt, his order greatly increased, and the whole continent of America was covered with hospitals, served by his disciples, who took the name of Bethlemites. These religious have hospitals at the bottom of the silver and gold mines, and thus they bury themselves alive in the bowels of the earth, in order to afford spiritual and corporal help to the unfortunate Indians doomed to be deprived of the light of the sun, in order to procure for us those metals which are the occasion of so many crimes. The form of their vow was: "I, brother N—, make a vow of poverty, chastity, and hospitality, and oblige myself to attend the sick who are poor, though they may be Infidels, and attacked with contagious disorders."

It was in South America that a Spanish monk, Bartholomew, of Olmedo, first taught that religion ought not to be preached sword in hand, but by instructions which would enlighten the mind, and by good examples which would gain the heart. A Spanish monk we must therefore reckon among the first defenders of religious liberty, and one of the first and most zealous adversaries of persecution. It is related in the History of America, that Fernando Cortes, animated with intemperate zeal, had commanded his soldiers to overturn the altars, and to destroy the idols, in the chief temple Zempoalla. After his victory over the inhabitants of this town he went to Tlascala, and the people of the country yielded themselves as vassals to the crown of Castile, and engaged to assist him in all his future operations. Cortes endeavoured to persuade them to embrace the Christian faith; but finding them at first ready to yield to his argument, he had recourse to threats, and was actually proceeding to violence, when he was restrained by the interposition of Father Bartholomew of Olmedo, chaplain to the expedition. Accordingly he left the Tlascalans in the undisturbed exercise of their own rights, requiring only that they should desist from their horrid practice of offering human victims in sacrifice.—Robertson's History of America.

The religious of the orders of the Blessed Trinity, and of our Lady of Mercy, for the redemption of captives, founded by St. John of Matha and St. Peter Nolasco, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, to the three solemn vows common to all religious, added a fourth, namely to give up their substance, and even their liberty, if necessary, for the ransoming of slaves. These charitable religious led a very austere life: among the Trinitarians a third part of the revenue was always set apart for the object of their institution. As soon as they had collected a sufficient sum of money, they set off for Tunis and Algiers. Neither the fatigues of so long a journey, nor the unwholesomeness of the country (almost always infected, more or less, with the plague), nor the ill-treatment they frequently met with from barbarians, who bear an inveterate hatred to the Christian name, nor even the danger of death under its most horrid shape, could deter them from accomplishing with zeal the laborious task imposed upon them by their Superiors; nay, they courted it as a singular favour, and esteemed themselves happy to suffer ignominies and torments, and even to lay down their lives for the deliverance of their fellow-creatures. Truly animated with the spirit of the Gospel, they sought for no other witness of the heroic acts of patience and charity, which they daily performed, but Him who sees in secret, and expected no other reward but from Him alone, and from the consolation of having rescued from the most cruel slavery men, with whom they were entirely unacquainted, and whom they were never to see again. For although, during a space of six hundred years, hundreds and hundreds of thousands of slaves have recovered their liberty, and been restored to their friends and native land, through the unabated zeal and courage of the Trinitarians, and the fathers of our Lady of Mercy, the particular name of each of these benefactors of mankind has not been transmitted to posterity. After having accomplished the object of their hard mission, they retired silently to their convents; they hid in the obscurity of their solitude the long train of their charitable deeds, and prepared themselves, by prayer and mortification, to undertake again new journeys for the same purpose with equal fatigue and danger. There were in Catholic Europe before the revolution two hundred and fifty houses of Trinitarians, and several of the fathers of our Lady of Mercy. These two orders subsisted during six centuries, and were constantly engaged in redeeming slaves: accordingly, what an immense number of our fellow-creatures have they not restored to liberty and to the comforts of life!

[VOL. VI.]

THE EFFECT OF THE REFORMATION ON CIVIL SOCIETY AND RELIGIOUS MORALS.

A custom has long prevailed with modern writers, who make mention of the Reformation, to commence by drawing the most hideous caricature which their pencils can trace, of the tyranny of Popes, and of the ignorance, superstition, and immorality of the clergy and people of Christendom previous to that event taking place. With respect to the alleged ignorance of the ages in question let us look into the works that have come down to us from these ages, and we shall find writers, who have been no strangers to the merit or to the compositions of Virgil, Ovid, Horace, Cicero, Seneca, Livy, and many other classical authors. And moreover we shall maintain that these were to be found in those ages which have been so unjustly reproached with ignorance, many writers who displayed more good sense and solidity of judgment, as well as greater impartiality and love of truth, than most of the celebrated writers of modern times. Can it for a moment be supposed that those ages have been destitute either of learning or taste which produced and knew so well how to admire

Anselm, a Bernard, an Aquinas, a Gerson, Petrarch and a Chaucer? Supposing, after having surveyed the state of literature in those ages, which have been spoken of with much derision and contempt, we should for a moment turn our eyes to the condition of the arts, we will no doubt find in the mouldering monuments of them specimens capable of humbling our pride at the present day, with all our superior advantages; look at the works of Wykeham and of Fox; survey Lincoln Cathedral or York Minster, and remark what sublimity of invention, what mathematical precision and combination, and what delicacy of execution were requisite to make these sacred edifices what they originally were. Amongst other arts or useful inventions, for which we are indebted to the middle ages, are printing, the mariner's compass, gunpowder, artillery, telescopes, bells, organs, the musical scale, clocks, watches &c. Nor are we less indebted to them for what they abolished, namely, slavery, gladiators, wars of extermination, &c. The most important point to which we direct the attention of our readers, is that which regards the state of religion and morality during the middle ages. They are represented by modern writers as sunk into superstition and vice, and as it were extinct, and no longer to be found on the earth, until they were revived by the agency of such reformers as Luther, Calvin, Henry the 8th, Cranmer, the Duke of Somerset and Queen Elizabeth. Is not such an idea revolting to all who are conversant with the history of the ages in question? We entreat of our readers to turn over to the canons of the councils that were so frequently held in those ages, and examine whether the vital principles and the genuine spirit of Christianity were not strenuously maintained and rigidly enforced in those representative assemblies of the universal Church. Read the works of the most celebrated ascetical writers of the times, of a Bernard, a Bonaventure, an Antoninus, and a Thomas of Kempis. Peruse the history of their lives and tell us, whether the practice of all the Christian virtues, so strongly inculcated by our Saviour on the mountain, could have been more earnestly or more strongly recommended, both by precept and by example, than they were by the writers and the holy personages whom I have mentioned. Suppose we grant for a moment that a spirit of irreligion and immorality, extended its baneful influence more profusely for a considerable time previous to the Reformation, than at a former period, the question is now whether this spirit contributed to produce this event, as a cause which produces its effect, or merely as an occasion, viz. by exciting men of piety and morality to counteract it? In order to decide this question, we cannot make use of a better criterion than that which is laid down in the gospel, viz. to judge of the tree by its fruits. If then the authors and abettors of the Reformation were found to be persons most distinguished in each country for their piety and purity of life, or if even a visible amendment in their religious and moral conduct was the consequence of their embracing it. In a word, if the great bulk of the people who went over to this cause were proved to be thereby more devoted to prayer and alms deeds, more chaste, more temperate, more meek and patient, more submissive to their lawful superiors, and more amenable to the laws of the respective states under which they lived, than they had been whilst they were Catholics, this will form a strong presumption of their being influenced by motives of religion and genuine reformation in the choice they made, and that this was truly the work of God. But if it appear that the Reformation was, in every place where it prevailed, attended with precisely the opposite consequences, we shall leave our readers to draw the conclusion. To elucidate this important subject, we will not have recourse to Catholic works, but to the fathers, founders, and chief abettors of this very cause. Let us first hear Martin Luther, who is well known to have set on foot these religious changes in Germany, in the year 1517.

Some of his words to the present purpose are these: "The world grows every day worse and worse, it is plain that men are much more covetous, malicious, and resentful, much more unruly, shameless, and full of vice, than they were in the time of Popery." (1) "Formerly, when we were seduced by the popes, men willingly followed good works, but now all their study is to get every thing to themselves; by exactions, pillages, theft, lying, usury." (2) "It is a wonderful thing, and full of scandal, that from the time when the pure doctrine was first called to light, the world should daily grow worse and worse." (3) Amongst some of Luther's immediate disciples we shall content ourselves with one, the learned and famous Bucer's testimony to the same effect: "The greater part of the people seem only to have embraced the gospel, in order to shake off the yoke of discipline, and the obligation of fasting, penance, &c. which lay upon them in the time of popery; and to live at their pleasure, enjoying their lust and lawless appetites without control. They therefore lend a willing ear to the doctrine that we are justified by faith alone, and not by good works, having no reliah for them." (4) The next testimony which we shall deduce is from the second great patriarch of the Reformation, equally forcible: "Of so many thousands seemingly eager in embracing the gospel, how few have since amended their lives? Nay to what else does the greater part pretend, except by shaking off the heavy yoke of superstition to launch out more freely into every kind of lasciviousness?" (5) The next evidence we shall deduce to prove the salutary effect of the Reformation on civil society and religious morals, is from Erasmus, who is ranked amongst the principal authors of the Reformation as well as restorers of literature. There can be no doubt that he was an eye witness of the effects of it on the manners of the greater part of Europe that adopted it, there is his evidence: "What an evangelical generation is this? Nothing was ever seen more licentious and more seditious, nothing is less evangelical than these pretended gospellers." (6) "Take notice of this evangelical people, and show me an individual amongst them all who, from being a drunkard has become sober, from being a libertine has become chaste; I on the other hand can show many who have become worse by the change." (7) "Those whom I once knew to have been chaste, sincere, and without fraud I found, after they had embraced this sect, to be licentious in their conversations, gamblers, neglectful of prayer, passionate, vain, as spiteful as serpents, and lost to the feelings of human nature." That the state of morality was not rendered better, but rather infinitely worse, when the Protestant religion was fully developed and established, we have abundant and undeniable evidence in the confession of the most zealous advocates and abettors of that cause.

PUBLIC PRAYERS.

On last Sunday, at the Cathedral, His Grace the Archbishop, on ascending the Pulpit, addressed the congregation in regard to the injunction given that day week for prayer and supplication and daily attendance at the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, to avert the scourge with which the Almighty has been pleased to visit this city. The many afflictions we have been almost daily subjected to, by the dreadful, and in many cases fatal, maladies prevalent at present, make it incumbent on us, who have yet been spared, to supplicate heaven for mercy: and accordingly His Grace exhorted his hearers and endeavoured to impress on their minds the necessity and importance of daily attendance at the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, until it shall please God to remove from among us, the scourge with which this community is at present afflicted; and for this purpose the Collect to avert sickness, is said after the Collect of the day, in order to propitiate heaven, and turn away the wrath of the Almighty—that our humble offering may be a sacrifice of reconciliation between the creature and his offended Creator—an atonement for our past transgressions, and an earnest of our sincere repentance and amendment for the future. His Grace added that, if all the members of a family be unable, from various causes to attend, a member of each family should be daily present at Mass to supplicate the mercy of God on himself, his family and the community. On Fridays in particular, he requested the congregation to assist at Church, that all may unite in the repetition of the Litany of the Saints, that the prayers of the elect in heaven may arrest the anger of the Almighty towards his creatures on earth. His Grace also suggested the assembling at home in family prayers, that God would turn away his wrath, and thus, seeing our humility, would be graciously appeased. In visiting us with such affliction the Almighty exercises not only his justice but likewise his mercy. Justice—called forth by our sins, especially those of pride, envy and uncharitableness;—mercy—that we may be humbled and be more mindful of the duties and the obligations we owe to him. Seeing that we are all his creatures, made to adore and serve him, that in this world we are but on our pilgrimage, and that therefore in the forgetfulness of him, all our aim to earthly possessions, and the pride consequent thereto, only serve to obstruct the way of our journey to the goal which should be our sole object to attain. Let us, then, continued His Grace, humble ourselves and with prayer and supplication look up to heaven for mercy, and, like the men of Nineve, when Jonas, at the bidding of Almighty God, prophesied to them “that yet forty days and Nineve shall be destroyed,—covered themselves with sack-cloth and ashes and cried to the Lord with all their strength, turning from their evil way, and from the iniquity that was in their hands; saying, who can tell if God will turn and forgive, and will turn away from his fierce anger, and we shall not perish. And God saw their works that they had turned from their evil way, and the Lord God had mercy on his people.” Let us, like them, prostrate ourselves before the throne of mercy that the Almighty would in like manner look on us with pity and have compassion on his people.

REQUIEM.

A solemn High Mass will be sung at St. Thomas's Church, on Saturday next the 28th instant at 7 o'clock, for the repose of the souls of the late Messrs. Weld and Bond, of St. Xavier's College.

SYDNEY.

In publishing the following letter from the Most Rev. Dr. Polding, Archbishop of Sydney, to the address of our venerated Archbishop, we cannot but express a hope that the day is not far distant when Bengal, like Sydney, will also be erected into an Archbishopric.

Sydney, January 17, 1844.

MY DEAR LORD ARCHBISHOP,—I avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate your Lordship on the well merited approbation of the Holy See, which enables me thus to address you. May the Almighty continue his gracious assistance and bless your labours. Cheering indeed is it to witness the rapid progress our holy religion makes in every quarter of the globe. It is however towards the East that all eyes are now turned; great cause is there for rejoicing and much consolation; for it would seem that the Lord had determined to show mercy. Happy are they whom He has chosen to effect this gracious design.

I should have been fully gratified, if the Holy See had erected some city of your Grace's jurisdiction into an Archbishopric. This has been done here, and I am much anxious that the example should be followed throughout. It is a favorite design of the present race of Anglicans to erect the holder of the See of Canterbury into a Pope for the English possessions, and thus work up a claim for the title of Catholic, which they are ambitious to have. The plan of governing by Vicars Apostolic, with the Episcopal title from, “part: infid.” favours, or is deemed by them to favor, this design: accordingly my assumption of the title of Sydney was followed by a Protest which, however ridiculous in itself, shows what are the feelings of Dr. Broughton & Co. It is imagined by them that the Bishops in England, viz. in the Colonies, do not assume titles from their respective Sees, within their respective jurisdictions, because illegal. There is no law to prohibit it. I have strongly urged our brethren to press the matter, and I hope not without effect. When I proposed the plan to the Propaganda, of establishing Episcopal Sees in our respective jurisdictions, the novelty caused surprise, but, on consideration, it was deemed a matter of great importance to the Church, and was unanimously approved in the largest congregation that had been held for a long time.

Thanks be to God, religion is making great progress. Converts are daily entering the Church. The material advance manifested in the erection of Churches, has received a check owing to the great depression under which the Colony is labouring, by reason of the extravagant speculations of the great mass of the mercantile people. Years, I fear, must elapse before we have a return of the prosperity which consists in abundance of money. Our congregation in Sydney is at least 12,000, we have only the Cathedral, which may contain 2,000, and two small temporary places. We are engaged in erecting St. Patrick's, which will hold 1,500, when finished. I am desirous to lengthen the Cathedral sixty feet, as soon as I have the means. Our Sisters are nine in number, one Novice and one Postulante. The first death amongst them occurred on the 12th instant. The deceased was a convert, who came to this country some five years since, her friends at home having abandoned her in consequence of her change. They have effected miracles amongst the poor female convicts. Numbers of them have taken the Abstinence pledge under their council.

May I recommend myself once more to your pious prayers, and pray you to mention my name to the Rev. Mr. Mascarenhas. Believe me to be, with greatest regard,

Your affectionate Brother in Christ,

✱ J. B. POLDING,
Archbishop of Sydney.

AGRA CONVENT.

It gives us sincere pleasure to announce that the Convent at Agra continues to prosper to an extent that far surpasses the most guine expectations in which we indulged. There are eighty young ladies now pupils at that Institution, whilst the Sisters are only six in number. We earnestly hope that talented and most efficient communions soon receive an accession to their number in order to render their labors more efficacious. They will be consoled when we inform them that at Cairo or Alexandria (we are not certain which,) there is one Nun, who conducts a school, in which there are more than sixty pupils.

MAURITIUS.

We are informed by a communication from the Mauritius, that the Reverend Mr. Larkan, one of the estimable ecclesiastics who accompanied the Right Reverend Doctor Collier into the colony, having been appointed Curate of the Parish of Grand Port, has lost no time in erecting, at his own expense, a gratuitous school in the district. Our correspondent acquaints us in the following terms with the beneficial results of this institution:—

"The district of Grand Port, where the borough Mahe is situate, is the place pitched upon by the Protestants for the settlement of their gratuitous schools. The Rev. Mr. Larkan, on his arrival in his Parish, immediately proceeded on his side to the erection of a gratuitous school at his own expense. In the beginning and even for some time, he had but two or three pupils; this very limited number was about to excite the laughter of the inhabitants, but the perseverance of the Rev. Mr. Larkan never gave way, and the number of his pupils gradually increased. He established his school in a more proper manner, and within a short time, such was the number of children that came in, that the Protestants have lately been compelled to shut up their principal school, in consequence of the total desertion of their pupils who have passed over to the Rev. Mr. Larkan's school. It is thus that, through this worthy ecclesiastic's exertions and patience, Catholic sympathies have been awakened among the population of Grand Port, who, deprived of any assistance on the part of the Catholics, and unaware of the dangers incurred by their children in the hands of the Protestants, hitherto entrusted them to the latter for the benefit of a primary instruction.

"It could not be too much insisted upon the necessity of sending to the Island of Mauritius a few Ecclesiastics qualified to confer on the Catholic population of this colony the benefits of instruction and other assistance to be derived from the Religion they profess. Whole districts are destitute of Catholic Ecclesiastics, Chapels and Schools; and the Protestants take advantage of the absence of any religious worship to entice away the inhabitants, at least those of the lower order, into the errors of their doctrine.

"The archipelago of Seychelles is totally deprived of Catholic priests; some ministers, members of the Church of England or Dissenters, have visited these islands, but their proselytism has made no progress. The inhabitants remember that they are of a Catholic origin, and they wish to stand faithful to the creed of their fathers. They persevere in it, reposing their confidence in that divine mercy, of which they trust that they will hereafter enjoy the precious effects."

FLOWERS FROM THE HOLY FATHERS.

"Nihil amantibus durum est, nullus difficile cupienti labor est."—Sti Hieron; Ep. 20, ad Eustochium.

Nothing is hard to those who love,

"Labor is light, and toil is sweet;

The heaviest hours of penance move

Like clouds away, with noiseless feet.

We have a task that must be done,

Or ere we rest our weary head;

We have a lengthened course to run—

A thorny path which we must tread.

We have a home in Heaven, yet ere,

We reach that dear and happy goal,

We must by penance, toil, and care,

Subdue the flesh, to save the soul.

Yet if on God our love be placed,

How sweet the toil, how light the load,

How soon are days of mourning past,

How bold we tread the thorny road.

The nails, the cross, the crown of thorn,

They fill the trembling heart with fright,

Yet, Jesus leaves us not forlorn,

His yoke is sweet, his burthen light.

Love is a leaven that tempers all,—

Is its own fuel—ever new,

Therefore, with glowing ardour, call—

Beseech thy God, to lend his dew.

And sweet increase of love shall come,

To aid thy toil, more pure each day,

Till perfected in Heaven, its Home,

Thy soul be filled with God alway!

TUAM.—CATHOLIC LIBERALITY.—The Tuam Herald says:—"We refer with gratification to the recent election of commissioners in this town under the 9th Geo. IV. The constituency, be it recollected, is almost entirely composed of Catholics; and yet that constituency elected several Protestants to the office of commissioner. They did more; for of three candidates for the office of secretary they elected a Protestant, rejecting two Catholics. What a contrast to the conduct of the Crown officials!"

YOUGHAL.—Two young ladies have arrived at the Youghal Presentation Convent from Lisbon. They belong to a highly-respectable English family now residing in Portugal, have been educated in England, and are to spend their novitiate only in the above convent, being ultimately destined for Demerara.—Freeman.

GALWAY.—Miss Blake, daughter of Isidore Blake, Esq., C.I. of the county Galway, was, on Thursday, professed in the parish chapel of St. Nicholas, Galway, as a sister of the Order of Mercy. On the same day, Miss Good, daughter of Mr. Edward Good, of Galway, was received into the same holy and laudable institution.—Tablet.

A correspondent alludes to the mission of the Right Rev. Dr. Wilson, V. A. of Van Diemen's Land. The Bishop leaves London this day, Saturday, for Plymouth, to embark on board the vessel which has already sailed for that port. His lordship is accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Hall, late of Birmingham, the Rev. Mr. Bond, of Chideock, another Luke, of the Trappist Convent, who will receive priests' orders in the ny: and a catechist, who will in due time be sent also. The whole of Van Diemen's Land Norfolk Island will be within the of the Lord Bishop of Hobarton, the d being now connected with the former course of steamers, which bring it nearer to ten in time, than it is to Sydney in dis- Convicts for periods under 15 years will in Van Diemen's Land: those for 15 and longer periods will pass from two to of the first years of their banishment at this island.—Tablet.

CONVERSIONS AT FALMOUTH.—On the night Saturday, the 30th ult., no less than thirty were admitted into the bosom of the Church, in the above town. Having their recantation, they were baptized according to the ritual of the Romish Church. ceremony took place at twelve o'clock at West of England Conservative.

the Mona's Herald of Wednesday records the and conviction of a witch, and the killing the witch in the shape of a rabbit by one of y!! which was in part composed of dis- preachers. Oh, "the dark" ages! Oh, "blasted" Protestant England in 1844!—Jan. 13.

WITCHCRAFT.—(From the Mona's Herald).— named John Quine, residing at Bella- in the above parish, recently lost, by several beasts; a heifer died from the ef- of injuries received from a man of ungovern- temper; a cow having received a double of raw potatoes, became what is termed "down," and a person unacquainted with the method of treatment, in attempting to her relief, stabbed her in the wrong place, as a matter of course, the cow died! The case was that of a horse, which, it is said, was "gripped" by eating too many potatoes; neglected, and also died; all of which cases attributed by the infatuated man to the of witchcraft! Accordingly, a trespass was obtained from his Honour, Deemster God, on the Tuesday before Christmas, on the day nearly half the people of the parish were summoned to attend at the half-way house the following Thursday. On that day, at an hour, the following persons were sworn men: Cæsar Christian, Joseph Cretney, W. later, and W. McClure, the two latter being preachers, but in what connection we have learned. McClure was foreman, and he and later were particularly active; but the other jurymen appeared to be ashamed of the proceedings, and took little or no part in affair. The greater part of those examined, and to having, on one or two occasions, through Quine's fields; but this was not wished to be elicited. The principal questions (put in Manx) were "Did you witch Quine's cattle?" "Have you done injury to the of this man?" "Do you wish evil to his?" "Have you coveted his wife?" "Did you wish him to prosper or fail in his business?" "bear him any malice?" "Did you hear any body talking of Quine, or seeming to grudge him what he had?" These and such-like questions, utterly irrelevant to matters of trespass, were asked the first day. On St. Stephen's Day seven others were brought up to be sworn; but on this occasion Mr. Christian interfered, and refused to allow such questions to be put. On the labours of the jury being concluded for this day, the people assembled were so disgusted with the superstitious mummary, that before separating they gave three loud cheers in utter derision of the proceedings. It appears, further, that Quine is a sort of preacher himself; and, on a late occasion, was holding forth with much fervour, at a public prayer meeting, at a place called the Rock, in the same parish, "that God would forgive all who wished to injure him;" but, nevertheless, recent events proclaim that his own "tender mercies" were anything but "forgiving!" For—can the reader believe it? the adjourned-jury were convened on Thursday last, and several people who did not attend this pious and forgiving gentleman's former juries, were this day brought up by constables! Quine's sister-in-law who, it appears, acts as a midwife in the parish, was sworn, and confessing that, having been sent for in great haste to a neighbour's house, she had once crossed Quine's fields, and, on another occasion, her husband being intoxicated, and, in order to get out of his way, she went over a hedge of Quine's, her field and Quine's adjoining each other. She was then asked if she had any malice against Quine? or whether she had ever come in any shape or form to do him or his goods any injury?!! The jury was then charged to bring in damages against the poor woman for trespass. Mr. Fleetwood was sent for to Douglas to write down the evidence; and the jury awarded a verdict against her, which, with the expenses, will amount to 5s.!!! It is roundly asserted that the foreman of this jury encouraged Quine to adopt these proceedings: that he accompanied him to Douglas to get the warrant, and offered himself for a jurymen to conduct the investigation. The closing "scene" in Mr. Burrow's, at the half-way house, where this enlightened jury were assembled and about to award their righteous verdict, and where Mr. Fleetwood was busily engaged in writing the evidence was quite in character with the other proceedings. A few boys in the neighbourhood having caught a wild rabbit, resolved to have some "fine fun" at the jury's expense, and managed, unseen, to let it loose in the room. On this formidable apparition making its appearance, the scene may be better conceived than described. From those assembled, with open mouths, distended lungs, and hair standing on end, shouts resounded that "the witch was caught!" "the witch was caught!" and one of the party, of more than ordinary courage and daring, seized the culprit, at all hazards, unceremoniously finished its existence, declaring that her witchship's pranks should then and there terminate, and that poor Quine should not be witched in his person, his effects, or the wife of his bosom any longer! Whether the learned advocate's gravity was discomposed on the occasion, "this deponent sayeth not," but the boys we learn, enjoyed the sport amazingly.—Did

NEWFOUNDLAND.

STATE OF RELIGION.

Church of Saint Francis, Merchants-quay, 3rd January, 1843.

VERY REV. AND DEAR SIR—At the present juncture, when Catholicity is making throughout the world such giant strides—when we find that even in that country (England) where so long she slept, she is now making the most rapid advances—when we find the Cross planted daily amid the savage hordes of infidelity, and the blood of her martyrs once more crimsoning the scaffold, there is no relation more interesting to the sincere Christian than that of the erection of temples for the true worship of the adorable Lamb. What lover of his venerable faith is not gratified at the daily display in the public journals of the Catholics of England dotting their country with splendid churches? who, with a heart to feel, does not perceive his pulse beat quicker as he observes the efforts of those in the remotest though the richest colonies catching the fire and urging on the same glorious cause? But if it be soothing to the long-seared spirit of Catholic Ireland to observe the wealthy Britons or the rich Asiatics rearing the lofty spire and gilded dome to God's temple in the face of Heaven, what spirit is there once illumined by the divine rays of the true faith that will not enkindle with enthusiasm and burn with emulation at hearing the exertions made and wonders effected by the poor humble Irishmen of Newfoundland, in raising structures to the living God, even in settlements the most lonely, the most inaccessible?

It would be difficult, my dear Sir, to give you an idea of the importance of the establishment of churches in those places, even where there is little hope of the attendance (unless rarely) of a clergyman. Oh! were you to behold the poor Irishmen with their wives and children upon the Sabbath Day, or upon one of those sacred festivals consecrated by the Church to the commemoration of some of the divine mysteries, or dedicated to the honour of the blessed mother of Jesus, or of some of the saints of God, in stations remote from the clergyman. There, at the hour usually devoted in the more favoured localities to the celebration of the sacred mysteries, behold the little church thronged with a congregation remarkable for the fervour and simplicity of their devotion; every knee is bent in humility, and every heart elevated to the throne of its Creator; they gather around the Cross, the sacred emblem of salvation, and pour forth in silence the full tide of their devout aspirations to Him who suffered on Calvary; an humble Irishman gives out the rosary, or some other approved devout exercise, while the entire little congregation, impressed with the sacred promise made by their Divine Redeemer, "where two or three are assembled in my name there shall I be in the midst of them," are filled with the presence of their God. It is thus the faith is preserved in numerous localities in Newfoundland, even without the auxiliary of a temple; but in others the want is deplorable, and in these there reigns a spiritual desolation afflicting to the Christian spirit.

Among a people such as I have described, nothing is more calculated to fan the flame of religion in their bosoms, to keep alive the ardour of that faith which they inherit from their fathers, than the establishment of churches; and hence have I devoted myself in an especial manner, not only to the multiplication of these sacred edifices, and laboured for years to enkindle amongst the people a desire to have them erected in all the principal localities. It is not enough that I have erected three beautiful churches in the district of St. John's, and that I have the gratification of seeing fifteen churches in other districts completed, and as many more in progress of completion through the zealous co-operation of my priests. It is necessary that all committed to my care be inspired to plant the Cross of Christ in every populous locality; and in order to excite that feeling we felt that our duty demanded that we should incessantly impart instruction, not only by precept—which after all can only in such a country reach comparatively a few—but by that most powerful of all exhortations—example—which spreads its influence far and wide, and hence have we not only sought to make our churches commodious for the congregations, but attractive to the eye; buildings shedding embellishment upon the country while they attract the admiration—nay, even the pride of the people. Hence have the priesthood of Newfoundland not only done this, but in order to inculcate still more strongly the duty of all to enter earnestly and actively upon these sacred works, and to teach the proudest that man was but too highly honoured in thus contributing to extend the glory of God, we constantly participated in all the toils of the artisans and labourers.

Exclusive of the churches alluded to, there are also raised convenient and comfortable parochial residences for the clergymen, all of which, to a great extent, owe their construction to the piety of the poor people themselves; and I am engaged in the construction of a cathedral, on a scale of unusual elegance, extent, and beauty. But as it has been said by some that it is an undertaking upon my part somewhat approaching presumption, to think of the erection of an ecclesiastical building such as I have undertaken, and a building of stone, in a country where there never was raised a single temple save of the most perishable materials—a building of such a plan, exhibiting the beauties of such architectural design as necessarily to involve a considerable outlay of money, and in a mere fishing colony, I may be permitted to say thus far, that it is of very little consequence to me in what sort of dwelling I offer up my unworthy prayers during my brief sojourn in this life; it matters not to me whether I bend my knee in a temple or a hovel, but when I consider that if in the old law God himself deemed it requisite to instruct His people to erect a temple to His worship of the most gorgeous magnificence and the most costly materials, how much more should it not be deemed of consequence in the Christian dispensation that the blood of the Lamb be offered in a church suitable to so august a mystery? How can I think then, as a minister of the Most High God, without pain and mortification upon being every day obliged to offer up the Holy of the Holies—to offer up the body and blood of Christ Jesus within a building that is unworthy of being used as an asylum for the beasts of the field.

The Catholic Church of the chapel has hitherto been the meanest house devoted to public worship in St. John's. It is a rude, ill-shaped wooden building, falling to ruin, nearly out of lease, and held at an enormous yearly rent; add to which that it is so far from being adequate to the accommodation of our rapidly increasing congregation, that in the midst of winter, on every Sunday, you may behold several hundreds of the poor people assisting at the holy sacrifice, exposed to the piercing winds, to the pelting of the bitter snow-drift, and kneeling imbedded in snow; and this building incapable from want of space of any increase or addition, I thought it my duty to God, to the people committed to my care, to give them, if possible, a temple superior to any other in the island—a temple at once beautiful and spacious, suitable to the worship of the Most High God, and that may be regarded in after-times as a memorial of the piety of the faithful, a pledge of the permanency of our holy religion, and an object of holy pride to the fervent Catholic.

I looked around me and I could neither see a favourable site on which to erect a new one, nor had I the means of purchasing it, was there one in view, nor a shilling in my pocket to commence the building. I was penniless, and I might almost say friendless, and yet in proportion as my poverty appeared great—in proportion as the prospect appeared gloomy, and as difficulty crowded upon difficulty had almost assumed the garb of impossibility, He who delights in proving himself the friend of the destitute, the strength of the feeble, who loves to make the humble and lowly the instrument of his greatest works, inspired me to extend my views, to enlarge my conceptions, and to see only the great object to be accomplished, and to shut my eyes to the barriers that presented themselves to its completion, reflecting only that the work was for God's glory and the comfort of my poor people, and that in the warm hearts and pious dispositions of the faithful, I had a mine of wealth calculated to sustain and support me throughout the great undertaking.

Inspired by these reflections, I began literally without a penny my arduous struggle in 1834 by memorialising the Government for a piece of ground. It certainly is a valuable spot, beautifully situated almost in the centre of the town, and continuing above eight acres. To give a detailed account of all the circumstances connected with this application would fill a volume; I shall merely content myself by saying that before I succeeded in obtaining the object of my prayer to the Crown, it cost me nearly five years of vexation and annoyance, without pause or intermission. How much of tribulation did I not endure during that period! Every effort that malice the most ingenious could devise had been resorted to to thwart my views: calumny, insult, and opprobrium were heaped upon me to impede the accomplishment of my wishes—to blight the prospect of my success; but, conscious of the integrity of my intentions, I persevered, and after having travelled 20,000 miles of the Atlantic ocean solely upon this business, amid storms, tempests, danger, and death, and undergoing all the hardships and privations that human nature could endure, God ultimately, crowned my hopes with the completest success. That high-minded nobleman, Lord Glenelg, then in the colonial administration, having at length acceded to the prayer of my petition, I was put in possession of the present valuable piece of ground that forms the site of our cathedral.

It would be impossible to describe the enthusiastic fervour that was evinced by the people of Saint John's upon the occasion of the accedence of that grant. So deeply interested were their feelings, and so thrilling was the announcement of that success that the whole population turned out and assembled simultaneously on the ground, some bearing longuets, some conveying posts, and even children bringing nails and implements, and in the incredible space of ten minutes the whole space, containing upwards of eight acres, was enclosed with a substantial fence five feet high.

The next demonstration occurred upon my requesting timber for scaffolding for the building; notwithstanding that the woods where such stuff was to be obtained were not less than twelve miles distant, yet in one day, and before one o'clock in the afternoon, I had placed on the ground more than 5000 worth of timber and spars.

I fear you will charge me with prolixity in giving these minute details; and yet do I feel the importance of placing before the Catholic public a slight representation of the difficulties we are combating, and have already surmounted, as well as the rapid advances we have made; for when the Catholic population of St. John's is considered, it may be attended with advantage to show what may be accomplished by steadiness and perseverance, by zeal and industry, even in small communities; and therefore shall I proceed, hoping that while I only do my own excellent people a simple act of justice in thus testifying to their worth and their merits, I may be the humble instrument of inspiring others, by this record of their example, to emulate their virtues; for I do believe that never in the history of any Church have results so great, so splendid, been produced by the labour—the free, the unpurchased labour—of a population so small, even where that labour, as it has been with us, had for its sole object the promotion of the worship of the Most High God.

It is singular that in every movement made by this zealous people in the raising of churches through the island, but with reference to the cathedral in particular, they have excited the admiration, the astonishment of all beholders. Each in itself wondrous, is still infinitely surpassed by that which succeeds it. At the north side of St. John's stands a rocky hill, called Signal Hill. Upon this hill, many years ago, a vast quantity of huge rocks of red granite had been raised from their bed for the purpose of opening a road to the barracks which stands on this hill; they lay there in confusion. Upon these, in my solicitude for procuring a suitable foundation for my building, I cast my eyes. Their removal would be a benefit to public improvement. The Government were scared from it because the expense necessarily incident upon it would far outbalance any immediate benefit to be derived by them from it. I applied for them to the colonel of the Engineers, who at once granted me permission to take them. I gave notice on the Sunday that on the Wednesday following we should commence this undertaking at nine o'clock in the morning, and at that hour upwards of 6,000 people were on the spot prepared for the undertaking. I recommended them to form themselves into large parties, and never was there exhibited a greater degree of emulation than was testified by these bodies, each vying with the other either in bringing the heaviest stones or the greatest number of loads in the course of the day. The season gave us a beautiful snow-path, particularly adapted for the slide-hauling, and before the close of the evening there had been deposited on the ground above 1,200 sizes of stone for the foundations.

Again, when I notified my desire to have the foundations excavated, the appearance of the people was truly edifying and affecting. There you might behold all classes of the population join without distinction in this labourious undertaking; even women bending under the weight of years assisting to convey away the clay or gravel in their aprons, so that in less than two days the whole foundations were excavated, containing 79,200 cubic feet, or 8,800 cubic yards.

But nothing could so strongly manifest the feelings of the people as the zeal exhibited in conveying the building stone for the erection of this edifice. Every Catholic owner of a schooner or boat, and even some Protestants, volunteered to send their vessels gratuitously to Kelly's Island, a distance to many of them of more than 200 miles by water, for a cargo of stones, which were there quarried for the purpose, and the fishermen offered themselves to form the crews; and no sooner are these cargoes landed than the farmers of St. John's send their carts, although this work necessarily occurs at their busiest season; and the mechanics in the town, smiths, tailors, victuallers, coopers, carpenters, shoemakers, and the pilots, as good and virtuous a body of men as live, and even shopkeepers and merchants, all take a day, each department alternately, to load and unload those carts; even the female portion of the congregation insisted upon devoting one day in each week to those works; and you might behold hundreds of females, young and old, married and single, rich and poor, assembled every Monday morning furnished with barrows, acting the part of labourers by bringing stone from the most distant part of the ground, where it had been placed, to the foot of the scaffolding; and this manifestation of zeal and devotion (continued as it has been from the first week until the close of the building season), is without parallel in the history of the church in any country.

With a population animated by such feelings, what may not be accomplished for a people so devoted to their faith—what sacrifices ought not to be made by their fellow-Christians in other countries to assist them? For my own part, every day—every hour—only tends to increase that love and admiration which I have entertained for them from the beginning, and in contemplating the wonders worked by their extraordinary zeal in every part of the island of Newfoundland. Though I have traversed countless leagues of ocean—have wandered over frozen mountains and pathless snows—have penetrated the forests and slept in the midst of the woods, miles from any human habitation, and waded through rivers and morasses innumerable, and have worked in the depths of the quarry in the service of my mission, I almost blush at my own topidity.

The main walls of this noble edifice are now raised about thirty feet, and the extern walls are finished; yet I am obliged to pause, until I shall have obtained from this country, a sufficient quantity of cut stone for its completion. But it has often been a remark how it happens that I, who can command so much assistance from my people, should come to Ireland for cut stone? Simply, because the difference of wages paid in the colonies and in Ireland more than meets the amount of freight to Newfoundland, as vessels engaged in the North American timber trade, being obliged generally to go out in ballast, are ready to take freight at what will barely pay the expenses of the voyage. As it is necessary that new contracts be now entered into for the remainder of the building, I therefore found it requisite to visit Ireland once more for this purpose; for it is only in winter I could think of absenting myself from Newfoundland, even for the shortest period, without materially interfering with the progress of this structure; and although I am quite sensible of the difficulties before me, yet my reliance is upon the benevolence of the faithful; and when I reflect that in all my undertakings hitherto, however great the expense, and however limited my humble means of meeting it, heaven was always ready to open a way to their accomplishment, I must say that I have never entertained a doubt that He who planned the great temple of antiquity, and endowed it with the wealth of the nations of the world; and He who, upon the base of the humble fishermen of Galilee, reared a church, conspicuous for its grandeur, and magnificence, and extent, will not withhold his assistance, when there is a question of raising up, in the midst of the wilderness, a temple to his worship, intended to attract the wanderers to the fold, and to last for ages, as a monument of our fidelity to that creed to which we are devoted. When there is a question of the establishment of an edifice, where the little ones of His promise shall be brought up in the ways of peace, and schooled in the paths of virtue and religion, He will open the hearts of the faithful followers of his sacred Cross to lend their cordial and zealous assistance.

Having thus given a brief account of the principal incidents connected with our churches and cathedral, I shall, in my next, call your attention to the progress of education in Newfoundland.

In the meantime, I have the honour to remain your obedient humble servant.

✠ MICHAEL, ANTHONY FLEMING, O.S.F.

Bishop of Carpsien, and V.A. of Newfoundland.

It was among the Grey Friars that the celebrated Cardinal Ximenes was brought up. He was prime-minister to Ferdinand the Catholic and Isabella. Near three hundred years before the Burkes, the Grenvilles, the Foxes, and the Wilberforces, employed the power of their eloquence to put a stop to the slave-trade, this great man,—of whom the learned Leibnitz said, that, if great men could be bought, Spain would not have paid too dear for Ximenes, if she had bought him with the gift of one of her kingdoms,—this great man had rejected with horror the proposal which had been made to him, to permit and encourage this infamous commerce of human flesh; thinking, as Dr. Robertson observes, that it was the height of injustice to reduce a race of men to slavery, in order to preserve the liberty of another. During the whole time he held the reins of government, he was the constant protector of innocence and merit: he never conceived or promoted any project but for the benefit of humanity. The whole of his immense revenue he spent in relieving the wants of the state, and the distresses of the people. The doors of his palace were always open to the poor: he received them with affability, read their petitions with kindness, and assisted them with generosity. He frequently visited the hospitals and colleges of his diocese: he repaired and adorned them, and delivered the country from usurers and houses of ill-fame. He formed at Toledo, under his own eyes, an establishment for young ladies of the poor nobility, where they were brought up according to their rank, and provided for them a sufficient sum of money to settle them in the world at the end of their education; an establishment which was afterwards imitated by Madame de Maintenon in France, in the royal house of St. Cyr. He founded also the University of Alcalá, where he published the Polyglot Bible, so much valued by the learned, and to which he applied himself with great diligence, and had it printed at his own expense.

The different orders of religious spread here and there all over the East, have also an indisputable right to our esteem and gratitude. Animated with that charity which is the soul of all religious institutes, they dedicate themselves to the service of their fellow-creatures, as far as their circumstances permit. In the solitudes of Mount Libanus, and the forests of Abyssinia, as well as at the cataracts of the Nile, on the banks of the Tigris, the shores of the Red Sea, and in the sandy deserts of Egypt, we meet with continual instances of their humanity. The Maronite monk calls every night from the top of his cedars, to his solitary cave, the trembling stranger walking in the dusk of the evening on the brink of the fathomless precipices of Mount Libanus. The Abyssinian monk waits for you at the entrance of his impenetrable forests, to show you the way to his lonely habitation, and save you from the ferocity of the lions and tigers prowling about in search of prey. The Coptic monk watches from the summit of his tower, to discover the traveller wandering in pathless deserts, in order to save him from inevitable death, either from thirst, or from the sword of the Arabian robber. All religious of every order, live a very extraordinary life. To judge of them by their eagerness to shun the society of men, it might appear that they are desirous only of their own happiness, and nevertheless they sacrifice it every day from motives of humanity; for it is proved, that in hospitals where there is a great number of sick, the religious who take care of them, have almost continually a slow fever, which consumes them, and which proceeds from the infectious atmosphere in which they breathe. On the summits of Mounts St. Bernard and St. Gothard, the air is so keen, that it is reckoned impossible to live there more than ten years. The monks, who have established hospitals in endless darkness in the gold and silver mines of the new continent, shorten also their existence by breathing an air impregnated with metallic vapours. The children of St. Francis, the Jesuits, and Dominicans, who shut themselves up in the galleys of Tunis and Algiers, and in the pestiferous bagnios of Constantinople, to afford the slaves the consolations of religion, devote themselves also to the most speedy martyrdom.

At the foot of the Andes or Cordilleras, between the Oronoko and the Rio de la Plata, there is a vast tract of land inhabited by savages, where the Spaniards had not carried that devastation which generally attended their conquests. It was there that the Jesuits attempted to found a Christian republic, and to procure at least to a few Indians that happiness which the Catholic clergy had, in vain, endeavoured to secure to all the inhabitants of the new continent. In order to succeed in their enterprise, they solicited of the court of Spain the liberty of all the Indians whom they could civilize, and after having met with the greatest opposition from the first planters, they obtained it. Having thus, through their industry and perseverance, triumphed over avarice, and wickedness, and meditating one of the noblest designs which ever entered the heart of man, they sailed up the Rio de la Plata in frail canoes. The Paraguay falls into this large river, and gives its name to the country of which we are now speaking. It is a mixture of thick forests; vast plains, overflowed during six months in the year; impassable marshes, and mountains upon mountains, infested with tigers, wolves, and snakes of an enormous size. The Indians who were found wandering here and there in these inhospitable deserts, were a stupid, indolent, and ferocious race of men, without the least tincture of civilization or morality, and like the birds of their land, fixed their habitation chiefly in the branches of trees.

The first accounts represent to us the Missionaries making their way through thick forests, travelling through marshy grounds in which sometimes they sunk to the waist, climbing steep rocks, exploring caves and precipices, in imminent risk of meeting with wild beasts and serpents instead of human beings, and carrying with them no other weapons but their breviary under their left arm, and a large cross in their right hand, and without any other provision but an unshaken confidence in God. Several Missionaries died with hunger and excessive fatigue. Some were murdered and devoured by the savages. Father Lezardi was found by one of his companions upon a rock, his body had been pierced with arrows, and was half devoured by birds of prey; his breviary was upon the ground by his side, and open at the office of the dead. When a Missionary found thus the remains of one of his fellow-labourers in this uncultivated vineyard, he hastened to render him the last duties of religion and friendship, and, penetrated with joy at his happy departure, he sung a Te Deum on the solitary grave which he had raised to the honour of a martyr. Such moving scenes renewed, as it were, at every step, struck the savages with amazement. Sometimes they surrounded the unknown priest who spoke of God, and then looked up to the heavens which he pointed out to them; at other times they ran away from him as from a magician, and were seized with fright and terror; but the religious followed them, stretching forth his arms towards them in the name of Jesus Christ, and inviting them by his silent but pathetic eloquence to come back to him. If he did not succeed in dispelling their fears, he planted a large cross in an open place, and hid himself in the woods: the savages perceiving no man by, came nearer to examine this standard of reconciliation and peace; it seemed as if an irresistible power attached them to the sign of their future salvation. Whilst they were thus motionless, and beholding the cross, the Missionary sallied forth from his ambuscade, and availing himself of their surprise, conjured them to abandon their wretched life, and to enjoy the sweets of society. Whether Almighty God rewarding the faith and confidence of these holy religious, bestowed upon them the gift of tongues, or whether the ardent charity which was burning in their hearts, was so visible in their whole countenance as to make their language to be understood without the help of words, we cannot say; all we know is, that by an heroic perseverance they converted these poor Indians. As soon as the Missionaries had succeeded in dispelling the fear and shyness of some of the savages, and prevailed upon them to abandon their wandering manner of life, and adopt a social one, the conversion and civilization of whole tribes rapidly followed. For, as charity makes itself all to all, the Jesuits had recourse to every means which they thought best calculated to gain the confidence of the Indians. Having observed that they were very fond of music, these charitable religious were continually sailing up and down the Paraguay, singing holy canticles, which the Catechumens repeated with an astonishing exactness, as tame birds (if we may be allowed to use the comparison,) sing to draw into the nest of the fowler the wild inhabitants of the air. The Indians suffered themselves to be drawn into the inviting snare laid for them in order to seduce them from their misery and wretchedness. They were seen coming down from their mountains, running to the banks of the rivers, and even sometimes casting themselves into the waters and swimming after the enchanted vessel from which they heard such melodious accents. They gradually approached the fathers with more confidence, and consented to remain a short time with them, and then returned again to their wilderness.

But the first sensations of humanity,—the sweet and tender feelings which they had experienced, and the peace and joy which shone on the countenance of their former companions, who pressed them to partake of their happiness, did not allow the savages to remain long absent from the Missionaries, who on their side were watching every opportunity of renewing an intercourse with them. The single hearing of a canticle sufficient to bring back the Indians, to listen again to what had occasioned in them such unknown and pleasant emotions. They were accompanied by their wives and children; and considering no longer the Jesuits as enemies, but rather as supernatural beings, they entreated them to repeat to them their melodious tunes. Become now acquainted with their rude language, these holy religious joined instructions to the singing of canticles, and spoke with such energy and pathetic eloquence of the sweets of social life, and of the awful truths and unspeakable comforts of the Christian religion, that not one of these fortuitous meetings ended without a great many savages desiring to be placed under the guidance of the Missionary.

It would be exceeding the limits of these pages to give a circumstantial account of the conversion and civilization of the savage inhabitants of these vast countries. It will be sufficient for the information of the reader to remark, that in a few years, thirty little republics of Indians were formed. We call them republics on account of their form of government; though, in reality, they were only numerous families, under a chief, who ruled with the authority and tenderness of an affectionate father, and whom the members obeyed with the docility and love of dutiful children. The villages were regular, the streets wide and straight; the houses, one story high, were built with stone, commodious, but without the least superfluity. In the centre of the village stood the church, the building appropriated to the mission, the hospital, the school, and the public granary. The lands were divided among the inhabitants, proportionably to the number of the members of each family, and the wisest precautions were adopted to provide against the possibility of a scarcity.

As soon as the children had attained the age of seven years, they were sent to the village school. The Jesuit who presided, examined with a paternal attention the disposition of each of his pupils; every one was formed according to the particular trade for which he appeared to be naturally qualified. Some became silversmiths, others clockmakers, weavers, blacksmiths, carpenters, tanners, &c. They were also taught music and dancing, and to make all sorts of musical instruments, organs, guitars, harps, violins, &c. &c. Those children who displayed greater talents, were instructed in sciences, painting, architecture, and all the liberal arts, each one according to his particular taste. It is worthy of remark, that the Jesuits themselves had learned all sorts of trades, &c. to become useful in inculcating the first principles to their pupils. The boys who seemed to prefer agriculture, were placed in the class of husbandmen; and those who still appeared to have retained some relish for the wandering life of their parents, were appointed to take care of their immense flocks. Every morning, at the first dawn, the inhabitants of each village were called to the church, to offer their first thoughts to the Supreme Giver of all good gifts, and to implore his blessing upon the labours of the day. In the dusk of the evening, they again assembled in the church, where the night prayers were sung in two parts, and with music.

As the Indians are naturally indolent, and without foresight, a kind of surveyor was appointed, to examine the ploughshares, and other implements of husbandry in each family, and oblige the chief to sow his corn, &c. &c. The slothful and negligent were condemned to till a larger portion of the common field, and thus, through a wise administration, the very faults of those harmless men turned to the prosperity of the public. They were married young, in order to avoid the danger of libertinism; and the greatest concord, and union, of hearts, subsisted between the married couple. In case of any delinquency, the first fault was punished by a secret admonition and reprimand from the Missionary; the second by a public penance at the entrance of the church, as was customary among the primitive Christians; and the third by flogging. But during a space of one hundred and fifty years, there is scarcely an instance of an Indian having deserved this last punishment. "Their faults." says their candid historian, "are children's faults. Indeed they remain so in many respects during their whole life; but they also possess their good qualities." Although they were inspired with the greatest horror of bloodshed the frequent incursions of the Portuguese into their territory in order to make slaves, had forced the Jesuits to train these inoffensive Indians to the use of arms. Every man come to a proper age was therefore instructed in the art of war, and they fought with such uncommon bravery, and with so much order, that they forced their enemies to leave them unmolested in their labours, and in the tranquil possession of their independence.

The spirit of ferocity and revenge, the propensity to the most shameful vices, and the love of independence and impatience of control, which characterise the Indian tribes, were henceforth changed into gentleness, patience, chastity, and subordination. We can form an idea of their truly evangelical virtues, by these words of the Bishop of Buenos Ayres to Philip V. "Sire," said he to this prince, "in these numerous tribes of Indians, naturally prone to every kind of vice, there reigns such an innocence, that I do not think that among them a mortal sin is ever committed." With the help of these industrious and docile natives, the Jesuits succeeded in rendering these unwholesome wilds a most delicious country. The forests cleared away, were turned into orchards, groves, and gardens, where the most useful trees and vegetables of the two Continents grew up with the greatest luxuriance and profusion. Deep morasses formerly inundated with stagnant water, became rich meadows; and barren deserts fruitful fields, covered with abundant harvests. Instead of the hissing of serpents, howling of wolves and other beasts of prey, and the yells of savages torturing the unfortunate victims which they were going to sacrifice to their implacable revenge, and to devour, nothing was heard but the bellowing of milch cows, neighing of horses, bleating of sheep and lambs, and the voice of husbandmen and shepherds making the mountains and valleys resound with canticles of praise and thanksgivings to the true God, or singing in the most melodious tones the charms of a country life, and the sweets of society. Among those Christian savages there were neither quarrels nor lawsuits; nay, the words mine and thine were unknown, because, as it is remarked with great propriety by their historian, the man who is always ready to dispose of the little which he possesses in favour of those who are in need, has really nothing of his.

Abundantly provided with all the necessaries of life, governed by the same men who had reclaimed them from barbarism and wretchedness, and whom they loved and respected as their fathers; enjoying in the bosom of their families the most delicious sentiments of nature; knowing the great advantages of civil life, without having left the security of their deserts; tasting the charms of society, without having lost the sweets of solitude; these Indians might flatter themselves that they possessed a happiness of which there had never before been an example. Hospitality, friendship, justice, and all the virtues which honour man, were continually flowing from their pious and loving hearts. Muratori has given, as with one single word, the best notion of this Christian republic, by calling it, Il Cristianismo Felice; or, "Christendom the Blest."

In reading this history, it seems almost impossible not to feel an ardent desire to pass the seas, in order to find, far from the revolutions and vices of our corrupted societies, an humble retreat among the cottages of these amiable and inoffensive savages, and a peaceful grave under the palm trees of their burying-grounds. But, alas! nothing is permanent in this vale of tears. All this is no more! The missions of Paraguay are destroyed; the unfortunate savages, civilized with so much fatigue, are left to themselves, and are wandering again in their forests, or perhaps buried alive in the bowels of the earth. The annihilation of the most perfect and happy government which the genius of man ever produced, has been applauded. It was a creation of the Catholic religion; it had been established by religious, and watered with their blood. This was enough to excite the hatred and contempt of our pretended sages! They triumphed in beholding the Indians reduced to a most horrid slavery, and they were at the same time fatiguing Europe with the noise of their philanthropy and love of liberty! But let us turn off our thoughts from this unaccountable infatuation and disgraceful instance of the corruption of man. While we bewail here the unhappy destiny of the virtuous inhabitants of Paraguay, formed by the enlightened piety of their former masters, they are undoubtedly adorning, under their present tyranny, the Almighty hand which has struck them; and by sufferings, borne with Christian resignation and patience, they are meriting a most distinguished place in that republic of Saints, which the persecutions of man cannot reach, nor his calumnies disturb.

Your universities and societies of the learned, have produced a number of men of rare merit and extensive genius,—the Newtons, the Lockes, the Addisons, the Clarkes, the Sherlocks, the Louths, the Lardners, the Kennicots, the Paleys, the Bronghams, &c. &c. But, is it not worthy of remark, that these Protestant schools of learning never produced a John of Matha,—a Peter Nolasco,—a Bernard of Menthon,—a Peter of Betancourt,—a Vincent of Paula, and legislators like those of Paraguay? You abound with commentaries, explanations, and dissertations upon the gospels; you have learned and elegant treatises of ethics; your works upon legislation and politics are innumerable: however, is it not surprising it is only in the schools of ignorance and superstition, as monasteries are called, that these maxims of the gospel (“as you would that men should do to you, do you also to them in like manner,” Luke vi. 13; “Greater love than this no man hath,—that a man lay down his life for his friends,” John xv. 13; “In this we have known the charity of God, because he has laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren,” I John iii. 16;) have been put literally into practice, in their utmost extent and highest perfection, and not only by a few individuals now and then, but by hundreds and thousands, for several centuries, without interruption? In the flourishing times of Pagan Rome, a crown was conferred on the man who had saved the life of his fellow citizen; to what rewards, therefore, are not these generous men entitled? What honours and crowns do they not deserve, who exposed their lives to save that of their fellow-creatures, without distinction of friend or enemy, religion or country; not only once, by a sudden impulse of humanity, and momentary effort of courage, but daily, with coolness and deliberation? Protestants as you are, can you refuse to admire the foresight and wisdom of these benefactors of mankind, who had formed disciples, animated with their spirit, who have perpetuated their charity during such a long period of years, and establishments, for the relief of suffering humanity, would have subsisted till the end of time, had they not been destroyed, and the provision made for the poor and distressed, plundered by the rapacious impiety of the vilest of mankind; supported and encouraged in that regard by the prejudices of pretended philosophers and politicians, and by the blindness and ill-understood compassion of philanthropists? But, alas! the names of fabulous legislators are in the remembrance and on the lips of all of you who have had a liberal education; and yet the names of these real benefactors of mankind are to you entirely unknown? Nay, more, the institutes which formed them to such heroic actions, are branded with the most hateful calumnies, and the heroes themselves represented as fanatics and bad citizens!

THE PUSEYITES, THE ANGLICAN, &c.

JAMES I. AND VI.—“NOTHING WAVERING.”—The rector of Ilford has addressed the Bishop of London, asking direction as to the observance of the offertory, which gives great offence to the pence-pursed congregation there. His reverence concludes:—“I think your lordship must see, from what is now going on at Barking, that this opposition to the weekly offertory has nothing in reality to do with those acts of indiscretion on the part of my curate which no one laments more than I do. I therefore earnestly request—if I may not be allowed to claim—the most decided disapproval on your lordship’s part of the line of conduct adopted by Mr. Thompson, and those with whom he acts.—I am, my lord, your lordship’s faithful servant, FOLLIOTT BAUGH.—To the Lord Bishop of London.” Charles James replies that he has nothing to do with church-wardens (Mr. Thompson is one), but that, “After much anxious consideration of all that has occurred, and of all the probable inconveniences which may result on the one hand from your persevering in the use of the weekly offertory, and on the other hand, from your discontinuing it after what has taken place, I think that I am justified in advising you to follow the latter course, and to confine your offertory collections to the days upon which the holy communion is celebrated or charity sermons are preached. As I am of opinion that you are authorised, though not absolutely required, by the rubric, to have a weekly collection at the offertory, I wish this advice to be considered as a recommendation, and not as a positive direction. I cannot but hope that if this concession be made to the feelings, however unreasonable, of your parishioners, your real influence and authority will be strengthened rather than impaired, and that they themselves will feel it incumbent upon them to make some amends by kindness and attention for the disrespect which has been shown to your pastoral authority.—Believe me, my dear sir, yours faithfully, C. J. LONDON.—The Rev. Folliott Baugh.”—Tablet.

PROTESTANT FUNERALS.—RICH AND POOR.—A correspondent of the Times of Wednesday says:—“If the relatives are rich enough to pay a certain amount of fees, the clergyman meets the corpse at the gate of the churchyard, and, reading those beautiful sentences which commence our burial service, precedes it into the church. When the sorrowing relatives have taken their seats, he reads those passages of holy writ which our church has appointed for their comfort and edification, and then, decently preceding the body to the grave, he commits it to the dust with all due solemnity; thus acting up to, and only acting up to, the directions of our church. But how different the case when the friends (who, perhaps, have been barely able to procure a coffin, and even that with many privations) are unable to pay the requisite amount of fees; or when the deceased has had the misfortune to die in a poorhouse! The mourners are, in this case, hurried at once to the grave side, and four or five coffins are carelessly piled on one another by the unfeeling officials. The clergyman then, and not till then, makes his appearance; the book is placed in his hands with the words, “Brothers and sisters.” That portion of the service appointed for the grave side alone is read, and even that hurriedly and irreverently, and the poor relative leaves the spot only to laugh to scorn those who would seek to assure him that the Church of England is the poor man's church; and asks why she permits any of her clergy to read words of comfort and pay that decent attention (which she requires to be used towards all alike) to those only who are rich enough to pay extra fees."

A PARSON AND A BUTCHER.—At Rochester, on the 1st inst., the Rev. Henry Winter, chaplain to the Fortitude, convict-ship, together with Mr. George Bassett, army butcher, residing in High-street, Chatham, appeared before the Rev. George Davis, Mr. William Gladdish, Mr. James Smith, and Mr. Jacob George Bryant, county magistrates, to answer informations, charging them with disposing of a heifer, on the 25th of November last, which was unfit for the food of man, the offence being against the common law statute 6th and 31st of Henry III. The court was densely crowded with respectable inhabitants. It was stated that the rev. gentleman had a farm, and his heifers had died of the murrain; that one of these had been skinned and cut up into joints by his reverence's servants, and sold by the butcher. The inquiry was then adjourned.—Tablet, Jan. 27.

ANOTHER TRACTARIAN CONVERT TO POPERY.—To the Editor of the Morning Herald.—Sir—I beg to inform you, that Thomas Harper King, an undergraduate of Exeter College, has joined the Church of Rome. This is the seventeenth victim of Mr. Newman's efforts to unprotestantise the Church of England, and the second member of Exeter College who has turned Romanist within the last six months.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, ACADEMICUS. Oxford, Jan. 25.

EXETER.—The truth is, that Bishop Philpotts does his work by fits and starts. But he receives his pay with great regularity, and his efforts to aid his own family have been pursued with a degree of zeal praiseworthy for the natural affection out of which it sprung, and exemplary from the profitable effects which have accrued to the family of the holy man. One hundred pounds a week will enable him at no distant day, now that his family are getting so well established in clerical life, to lay by something for the increase of the poor man's opportunities for worship. When he shall have adopted this course, our right rev. and respected diocesan will have added strength even unto his strong words, and have convinced the good people of Plymouth that he is honest and sincere, as well as energetic and eloquent in the cause of the poor.—Western Times.

MISCELLANEA.

DUBLIN.—The meeting of the bishops and concursus at the Royal College of Maynooth, during the last week, has created great interest here. By the elevation of the Rev. Dr. J. O'Hanlan to the office of Prefect of the Dunboyne Establishment in the College, the Rev. Dr. E. O'Reilly became first professor of dogmatical and moral theology, and the Rev. P. A. Murray as second professor in the same department. The third professorship of dogmatical and moral theology thus became vacant, and for that chair a marked, patient, and animated concursus, or searching examination, between four most able clerical candidates, has taken place. The four Archbishops—the Most Rev. Dr. Crolly, the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, the Most Rev. Dr. M'Hale, and the Most Rev. Dr. Slattery: and four Bishops—the Right Rev. Dr. Murphy, the Right Rev. Dr. M'Gettigan, the Right Rev. Dr. M. Nicholas of the Board, and the Right Rev. Dr. Denver—were present, with eight professors, and the Very Rev. Dr. Montague president. The four candidates were—Rev. Mr. Crolly (a relative of the Primate), of Belfast, diocese of Down and Connor; Rev. Mr. M'Gettigan (relative of the Bishop), of the diocese of Raphoe; Rev. Mr. M'Evily, of the diocese of Tuam; and the Rev. Mr. Gullen, of the diocese of Kilfenora and Kilmacduagh. On Wednesday the concursus opened, and it ended on Saturday, after four hard days' contest, when judgment was given in favour of the Rev. Mr. Crolly, author (I understand) of the very able tract on the Holy Eucharist.—Tablet, Jan. 27.

CONVERT TO CATHOLICITY.—It is delightful and consoling to have to record the many conversions to the ancient faith which so frequently take place at Loughrea. On Sunday last, the 14th inst., being the Feast of the Most Holy Name of Jesus, Mrs. Gorman, who from her infancy had professed the Protestant religion, had the inexpressible happiness of becoming a member of the faith once delivered to the saints, and for which so many martyrs have shed the last drop of their blood sooner than deny it. The ceremony, which commenced after the nine o'clock mass, was performed by the Rev. J. H. Whelan, C. C. he having received the power and authority from the Venerable Bishop, the Right Rev. Dr. Coen. The exhortation and ceremony on the occasion was most edifying to a very large and respectable congregation; and in presence of one of the officers of her Majesty's 10th Regiment, he having marched to the chapel with some of the soldiers of that detachment which are stationed in that town. For more than a month previous to the new convert's profession of Catholicity, she had been under the instruction of one of the nuns of Mount Carmel Convent, Miss O'Mara, who very kindly devoted a considerable part of her time in giving her spiritual instructions.—Ibid.

RUSHEEN AND AHINA.—In the parishes of Rusheen and Ahina, in the diocese of Cloyne, where the Divine mysteries had been a long time celebrated in a barn, and in another part of the parish, in a wretched cabin, three fine chapels have been erected in the short space of fourteen months. This has been solely effected by the exertions of the Rev. Jas. O'Kearney, P.P., aided by the willing co-operation of his parishioners. The rev. gentleman has also succeeded in erecting a very handsome school house, which is attached to the chapel of Ahina; a second is in course of completion, and a third will in some time be erected. All those good works, wonderful in so poor a district, have been brought about by the voluntary contributions of his pious and humble parishioners, aided by the private purse of their devoted pastor.—Ibid.

[VOL. VI.]

THE EFFECT OF THE REFORMATION ON CIVIL SOCIETY AND RELIGIOUS MORALS.

In our last we directed the attention of our readers to the effect which the Reformation had on society and morality. From the testimony of Luther, Bucer, &c., we have shown that the state of morals became infinitely worse throughout every nation where the new systems of the Reformation were adopted, let us now see how far the lives of the founders and abettors of this Reformation, were allied to the sanctity and purity of the lives of those whom God appointed to be the instruments of his chosen purposes. In the sketches which have been drawn of the Reformation by Protestant writers, some appear to be sensible of the difficulty of the task, giving such a general view of its proceedings and effects in improving the piety and morals of the people, as to make it pass for the work of God. Agreeable to the natural order of things, it is but just we should first speak of Luther, who was considered "the instrument of Providence (according to Heylin) for accomplishing the most important purposes, and the person to whom are to be attributed all the branches of the Reformation, which spread over the different states of Europe after he had first planted it in Germany." It is admitted that he was coarse, presuming, and impetuous in his manners and writings, but these were looked on as qualities allied to those which alone made him capable of supporting the high character in which he appeared. What his character was, we have not been told, but he himself has informed us; he says it was precisely the same as that which had been supernaturally conferred on the prophets and Apostles! "Martin Luther, Ecclesiastes, (1) of Wittemberg, for," says he,

"it is not fitting that I should be without a title, having received the work of the ministry, not from man, or by man, but by the gift of God, and the revelation of Jesus Christ." (2) In another place he styles himself "Luther, the second Elias, and the chariot of Israel." Let us for a moment grant Luther's commission to have been as sublime and as arduous as was that of the Apostles, we are anxious to know if coarseness of manners and writing, presumption and impetuosity, were allied with the character of the envoys of the meek and humble Jesus? Again if it was found that these envoys could not succeed in the great work of their ministry without qualities of 'this complexion' and, lastly, we beg leave to enquire how far the conduct of Martin Luther corresponded with the notions and ideas we naturally form of a chosen vessel of election, an instrument of divine providence, a second Elias, &c.? Let us now see, if he had those motives, what it was natural to expect from a personage of this character, to induce him to enter upon the ministry of reforming the religion of Christendom, viz. a thorough conviction of the errors with which it was infected, in a word, a principle of conscience. But such were not the motives of Luther; it was a private quarrel between Luther's order, the Augustine friars, and a rival order, the Dominicans, in a matter of honor and profit, which first occasioned him to commence reformer (3). He afterwards submitted himself to the pope, as long as any prospect remained of cajoling or intimidating him; it was only when his doctrine was condemned by the very authority to which he himself had appealed, that he stood up, in opposition to the united belief of all the Christians in the world. He proceeded in his career with the same bad faith with which he commenced it; at one time he tried to persuade himself that there was no real presence of Christ in the sacrament, but the words of Scripture were too plain in favour of it.(4) We have a right to expect from a new Apostle, a second Elias, that if he has any supernatural communication it should be with celestial spirits, whereas, Luther has published to the whole world that he held not only frequent communications with the Devil,(5) but also that he learned from him the most material part of his whole Reformation. Lastly, we should have expected in a professed reformer of Christianity, the strictest morality, both of life and doctrine, the most edifying piety, modesty, meekness and charity; let us see to what degree Luther possessed these qualities. He tells us that whilst he continued a Catholic monk he "observed chastity, obedience, and poverty, and that, being free from worldly cares he gave himself to fasting watching and prayer,"(6) whereas after he had commenced reformer, he describes himself as raging with the most violent concupiscence(7) to satisfy which he broke through his solemn vow of continency, in direct opposition to his former doctrine. He asserts that "free will is but an empty name, and that, when it does its best, it sins mortally:"(8) and that "when the scripture commands good works we are to understand it to forbid them, because we cannot do them"(9) that a baptised person cannot lose his soul whatever sins he may commit, provided he believe; inasmuch as no sin can damn us except infidelity.(10) The system contained in these propositions, Luther himself, on several occasions, proclaims to be the quintessence and characteristic of the Reformation, and that every other controverted point was a mere trifle compared with it. The character of Henry the 8th is so familiar to all conversant with history that it would be superfluous to say any thing of it. In like manner that of the Duke of Somerset, who chiefly raised its structure under the authority of his nephew Edward VI., as also of Queen Elizabeth, who restored it, after it had been destroyed by her predecessor, Mary. In fact Somerset and Elizabeth proved themselves to be as arbitrary and tyrannical, in the management of religious matters as Henry himself had been. The chief agent of the Reformation in England was confessedly Cranmer, whose character Protestant writers spare no pains to embellish with every beauty they can bestow. We will draw no character of him, but merely relate facts as we find them recorded by the most celebrated Protestant writers, and then leave every reader who wishes to be guided by truth and not by prejudice, to form an impartial opinion of this reforming prelate. The first remarkable instance we meet with in the life of Cranmer is his privately marrying a woman of low condition, whilst he was a fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge,(11) contrary to the engagements of his admission. He afterwards, when priest, married a second wife in Germany, by a much more flagrant violation of his vow of celibacy; he continued to live with her, in equal opposition to the laws of the church and of the land. Every one knows that Cranmer owed his rise in the church to the part which he took in Henry's divorce from Queen Catharine of Aragon, and that he repeatedly perjured himself. After this view of this new doctrinal system, need we wonder at the effects which followed upon its establishment: and, if we keep in mind the characters of those who invented or propagated it, it will be impossible for us to thank them the chosen agents of God.

IMPORTANT CORRESPONDENCE.

To His Excellency the Most Rev. Dr. Curren, Archbishop of Edessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, &c. &c.

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND EXCELLENT LORD,

I have the honor to send to your Excellency the extract of a letter, which I wrote to the Sacred Congregation on the 1st day of December last, and of the answer which I received by the last steamer.

I beg you to publish it.

Recommending myself to your prayers, with the most sincere esteem,

I have the honor to be,

Your Excellency's

Humble servant,

Bombay,

13th April 1844.

F. LOUIS MARIA,
Bishop and Vic. Ap.

Extract of a letter of Monsignore, the Vic. Apostolic of Bombay, directed to the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda in Rome, 1st December, 1843.

It is said, that the new Archbishop in passing through Bombay, will visit all the churches of these parts, before he goes to Goa. The Recusants prepare their churches, and have announced that he will give Confirmation and also Holy Orders in them.

Answer of the Sacred Congregation, received on the 8th of April, 1844.

I can answer your illustrious Lordship, that His Holiness has conferred on the aforesaid Prelate no jurisdiction over the places which depend upon the Apostolic Vicars, and in his Epistolarly Brief, His Holiness has expressly admonished him to abstain from exercising any act of authority whatsoever in these places. Therefore it is clear that those Recusants will find their expectations disappointed. In the mean time I beg of the Lord to preserve you, &c. &c.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

The Soliloquy of the humble and devout S. M. M. after having prepared for Death, at Loretto House, on the 2nd April, 1844.

1
And why am I afraid,
The debt of nature paid,
To see my God and Father?
The fleshy curtain's fall
Why should my soul appal,
And not rejoice the rather?

2
Does not a father's face
The gloom of sorrow chase,
And is not home delightful?
Ah! why then linger here,
My soul, what dost thou fear?
And why is death so frightful?

3
To die is now my task:
My soul, who made thee, ask;
Will he confound thee? Never!
Who died my soul to save,
Now takes but what he gave,
And takes to give for ever.

4
But is not judgement near,
Which filled the Saints with fear?—
The smallest stain is hateful;
And sinful from my birth,
How can I leave this earth,
As if I had been faithful?

5
'Tis true, my soul, but choose,
And if thou wilt, refuse
The Judge who died to save us;
Parent, sister, brother,
In heaven, on earth, another,
Who loves my soul as Jesus?

6
Who died on earth for love,
In mercy reigns above,
And to himself invites thee:
O! bright celestial home!
O! Lord, thy kingdom come!
O! take me, Jesus, take me.

VIZAGAPATAM MISSION.

We are happy to record that three Heathens and two Protestants have been gathered to the one Fold of the one Shepherd, by the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Egan, the zealous Chaplain doing duty for the Catholic Soldiers at Vizagapatam.

ROME.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On the 22d of January his Holiness held a secret consistory, and conferred, with the usual forms, the dignity and office of Vice-Chancellor of the Holy Roman Church on his Eminence Cardinal Thomas Bernetti. His Holiness then proposed the following churches:—United bishoprics of Porto, S. Rufino, and Civita Vecchia, for his Eminence Cardinal Vincenzo Macchi, translated from the see of Palestrina; bishopric of Palestrina for his Eminence Cardinal Castruccio Castracane degli Antelminelli, he having relinquished the church of St. Peter in Chains; Patriarchate of Constantinople, in partibus in fidelium, for Monsignore Fabio Maria Asquini, translated from the archbishopric of Tarsus in partibus; archbishopric of Mira, in partibus, for Monsignore Garibaldi, late Internuncio at the Court of France; archbishopric of Nicomedia, in partibus, for Monsignore Gianfrancesco Cornetti, Canon of the Basilica of St. Mary Major; archbishopric of Thessalonía, in partibus, for Monsignore Angelo Antonio Scotti, Domestic Prelate of his Holiness; bishopric of Senigallia, for Monsignore Anton Maria Cagiano de Azevedo, late Rector of the Roman University, and Uditor Generalè della, R.C.A.; united sees of Montefiascone and Corneto, for Monsignore Niccola Clarelli Parraciani, late Canon of St. Peter's, and Secretary of the Sacra Consulta; bishopric of Assisi, for the Very Rev. Luigi Land Vittorii, Archpresbyter of that cathedral; bishopric of Cuneo, for the Very Rev. Father Clementi Manzino di S. Teresa, General of the Discalced Carmelites; bishopric of Montauban, for the Rev. J. Doney, Canon of the metropolitan church of Besançon; bishopric of Troyes, for the Rev. J. M. Debelay, late Parish Priest of Nantua; bishopric of L'Amego, for the Very Rev. Joseph de Moura Coutinho, Dean of the Cathedral; bishopric of Funchal, for the Rev. S. Saverio Cerveira e Souza, Parish Priest of Coimbra; bishopric of Beja, for the Rev. Emmanuel Pires de Azevedo, of the diocese of Visen; bishopric of Faro, for the Very Rev. Antonio Bernardo da Fonseca Moniz, Vicar-General of the Archbishopric of Braga; bishopric of Marianne, for the Rev. A. F. Vicoso, of the province of Rio Janciro; bishopric of S. Lodovico di Maragnano, for the Very Rev. Father Carlo da S. Giuseppe, Carmelite; bishopric of Belem de Parà for the Rev. J. Alfonso de Moraes Torres, of Rio Janeiro; bishopric of Eritrea, in partibus, for the Very Rev. Gio. Battista Rosari, General of the Regular Clerks of the order of the Mother of God. After a very brief allocution his Holiness declared Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, Monsignore Pasquale Gizzi, Archbishop of Thebes, created and reserved in petto, the 12th July, 1841, born in Ceceano, diocese of Ferentino, 22d Sept., 1787; and afterwards created and declared Cardinals, Monsignore Anton Maria Cagiano de Azevedo, Bishop of Senigallia, born in the diocese of Aquino, 14th Dec. 1797; Monsignore Niccola Carelli Parraciani, Bishop of Montefiascone e Corneto, born in Rieti, 12th April, 1799; and also created another Cardinal in petto.

On the 25th January, his Holiness held a public consistory, to confer the Cardinal's Hat on the newly-created cardinals; after which the Consistorial Solicitor brought before his Holiness for the first time, the cause for the Beatification of the venerable servant of God, Louise Mary Grignon de Montfort, founder of the order of the Missionaries of the Holy Ghost.

After the public consistory, his Holiness held a secret consistory, where, after a short allocution, he proposed the patriarchate of Cilicia of the Armenian rite, for Monsignore Michele Derasdnazadrian, translated from the bishopric of Ceserea in partibus, and who assumes the name of Gregory Peter VIII. afterwards the archbishopric of Sens, for Monsignore Mellone Jolly, translated from the bishopric of Secz; the bishopric of Vigerano, for Monsignore Pio Vincenzo Forzani, translated from the bishopric of Susa; the bishopric of Sandomir, for Monsignore Giuseppe G. Goldmann, translated from the bishopric of Caristo, in partibus, and from the Suffraganate of Uladislavia; bishopric of Iglesias, for the Rev. Giovanni Battista Montia, Canon of the metropolitan church of Cagliari; united bishoprics of Cava and Tarsus, for the Very Rev. Salvatore Festitta, Vicar-Capitular of the Cathedral of Cefalù; bishopric of Secz, for the Rev. C. Frederic Rousselet, Vicar-General of Autun; bishopric of Sion, for the Very Rev. Pierre Joseph de Preux, Canon of that cathedral; bishopric of Comagagna, for the Very Rev. Francisco di Paola Campoy-y-Perez, Vicar-Capitular of that cathedral; bishopric of Antequera, for the Very Rev. Antonio Mantecon, Dean of the cathedral; bishopric of Rodiopolis, in partibus, for the Rev. Thaddeus Lubinski, appointed suffragan of Uladislavia. His Holiness also conferred the titles of the new Cardinals, and afterwards conceded the pallium to the Patriarch of Cilicia and the Archbishop of Sens.

P.S. His Holiness has just issued a decree approving the heroic virtues of the Venerable Father Canisius, of the Society of Jesus.

(From another Correspondent.)

Rome, 30th Jan. 1844.

The consecration of the Right Rev. Dr. Baggs, Bishop of Pella, and V. A. of the W. D. of England, took place on Sunday, 28th inst., in the church of St. Gregory, on the Celia Mount. His Eminence, Cardinal Fransoni, Prefect of the Propaganda, officiated as Consecrating Bishop, assisted by the Right Rev. Dr. Brown, Bishop of Iloa, V. A. of Lancaster, and R. R. Dr. Collier, O.S.B., Bishop of Milevi, and V. A. of Mauritius. Among the many distinguished persons present were noticed the Cardinals Bianchi and Acton; the Greek Archbishop Missir, Monsgr. Brunelli, Secretary of the Propaganda; Monsgr. Weld the Venerable Abbot Baron de Geramb, General Procurator of the Order of La Trappe; the Venerable Abbot of the Cammaldolese Monastery of St. Gregory; the General of the Passionist Order, &c. &c. Though the function began at the early hour of eight o'clock, the church was, from the commencement to the close, crowded to inconvenience. Many of our countrymen were drawn thither by the interest which they felt in the consecration of an English bishop, as well as by the veneration in which the character and talents of the newly-consecrated bishop are held by those who have the happiness and honour of his acquaintance. Among these may be named Lord Pingal and family; Sir W. Lawson Hunt, E. Peter, Messrs. Welds, Bodenham, Cholmley, &c. &c., and a host of others, Catholic and Protestant. Of the clergy assisting were the Revds. and Drs. Grant and English; Revds. Messrs. Murphy, Mulloy, the students generally of the English College, and a numerous body of the Monks of St. Gregory's; these are of the Camaldolese order. There were also present the students of the Propaganda Irish and Scotch colleges.

After the function, not only the clergy and the students, but almost all who had been present in the church, thronged into the noble hall of the monastery to offer their congratulations to the new bishop; and nothing could be better timed or placed, as it tended to relieve his lordship from the intense emotion under which he laboured. Here a splendid and profuse collation moved the not unwilling palates of the guests, and from the windows of the hall the eye revelled over the Colosseum, the temples of Venus and of Concord, the Arches of Constantine and Titus, the golden palace of the Cæsars, and a hundred other ruins of ancient Romam grandeur and Pagan superstition. But as we departed, nobler, sublimer, holier objects fixed our gaze, and elevated our thoughts. From these gates went forth Austin and his companions, sent by the Great Gregory to save our ancestors; from these cloisters was called forth the present Gregory to preside in the chair of Peter, over the fold of Christ. Here, on a marble slab, may still be traced the names of the Apostle of England and his saintly companions. Here many noble English lie entombed, and amongst these the last of England's ambassadors to the Holy See (Carne). Well, therefore, was this beautiful church, connected by so many and so holy associations with England, selected for the consecration of an English bishop.

On Sunday, the 11th proximo, His Holiness will consecrate in the Basilica of St. Peter's the following Cardinals; viz. Castracane, to the bishopric of Palastina; Cagiano, to the bishopric of Senegalia; Clarelli, to the bishopric of Monte Fiascone; and Polidori, commendatory Abbot of Subiaco.—Tablet.

ALMS-GIVING.

(Extract from the Lenten Pastoral of the Right Rev. Dr. Brown, of Wales.)

"Whether you fast and abstain, as the law of Lent enjoins, or whether, on account of necessities, the plea whereof the Church admits, that law be in your regard changed into some other penitential duty, or dispensed with altogether, there is one other fruit of penance suitable to all times, but more especially to that on which we are about to enter, and ever most dear to Christianity—Alms-deeds. The holy Scriptures command it in the Old Law, as of highest efficacy in obtaining the forgiveness of sin (Job iv. 11; xii. 9; Proverbs xxi. 3; Dan. iv. 24)—our Divine Redeemer and the Holy Spirit have imposed it, as a positive precept, in the law of grace (Matt. xxv. 41, 42; Luke xi. 41; 1 John iii. 17)—the Holy Fathers insist upon it, as of the highest importance; and some of them describe fasting without alms-deeds, as wanting an essential requisite.

If therefore, you fast, increase your merit by alms; if you cannot fast, make amends by more abundant alms: "redeem your sins by alms, and your iniquities by works of mercy to the poor" (Dan. iv. 24.) The extent of this obligation is not to be judged by the suggestions of mere human prudence. Sometimes it may require a sacrifice of every superfluity; it may call for a portion of that which is requisite to keep up your position in society; nay, it may claim a renunciation of even some things which belong to the necessities of life;—for surely our common Father expects us to value the life of a Brother, beyond vain amusements; and a soul redeemed by the blood of Christ, beyond this fleeting existence.—But putting aside extreme cases, charity is pleading forcibly, without intermission, on every side; for the needy beggar who importunes you in the street, for the necessitous Brother whose shame confines his miseries to his own cheerless dwelling, for children whose parents are unable to provide for their instruction, for those in preference who, being equally distressed with others, have a superior claim by belonging to the household of the faith (Galat. vi. 10)—for your own relatives, for the Pastors of your souls, for the spiritual wants of thousands who are famishing for the bread of life, and who find none to break it upon them. Would that your charity and means might enable you to carry out the Catholic exhortation of St. Augustin—"Give to all, lest he to whom you have not given may perchance be Christ."

"Whilst however, we exhort you to alms-deeds the most extensive that your condition in life can afford, we know that, in our destitute District, the great majority of our beloved children in Christ are scarcely able, by their daily labour, to provide necessaries for themselves and families: yet within the reach of perhaps the most needy, and without affording a pretext for diminishing any other good work, through an Institution called into existence by a privilege of Divine Providence to our latter times, are the most exalted merits and satisfactions of Christian charity—we refer to the Association for the Propagation of the Faith, to which we last year invited all to unite themselves, not without correspondence to our earnest recommendation on the part of some of our beloved children, and which with renewed earnestness we again press upon all through their love of God, their neighbour, and of their own souls. The sum required of you is so trifling that very few need find a serious difficulty in contributing it; as there can scarcely be an individual so necessitous as to be unable to retrench from his expenditure a single halfpenny in the course of each week; or who cannot procure it, by a small increase of labour.

"Now, this weekly halfpenny, which is all that is necessary, besides a few short prayers, for admission into the Association—this weekly halfpenny, collected by a well-organised plan from over all the Catholic world, produces yearly a large total, whereby most important missions are aided, and some are wholly supported, not only in distant infidel countries, but in distressed provinces of Europe. Herein have largely participated Mesopotamia, Syria, the Holy Land, India, Persia, China, and many other states in Asia—in Africa, Egypt, Arabia, Abyssinia, the Coast of Guinea, Algiers, Barbary, &c.—In America, Newfoundland, the United States, Canada, Hudson's Bay, Texas, and several islands in South America, &c.—various Missions in Oceania, including our important settlements in New Holland, Van Dieman's Land, and New Zealand—and nearer home, Scotland, Cornwall in the Western District of England, and our own vicariate of Wales. The Annals of this very interesting and invaluable Association for the Propagation of the Faith, are offered to the edifying perusal of every Subscriber, detailing the most gratifying results of the application of those weekly contributions—in the disinterested labours of Missioners under the burning tropical sun and amidst piercing colds, whither the vast collections of our erring Protestant countrymen have failed to conduct the steps of their well-paid emissaries—in the rapid and astonishing conversion of whole nations of Pagans to that Church which alone is, as she ever has been, the fruitful mother of many children—in the heroic confessions of their faith, made by the Missioners of the Association and their neophytes amidst grievous torments—and in the glorious seal which, as in primitive ages, the blood of numerous martyrs, has set upon their belief."

RELIGIOUS EQUALITY.

You must, if you be statesmen, look to the condition of Ireland with the eye of a master, and you must then see, that until there shall be religious equality there cannot be political justice. (Cheers.) Have we got that religious equality? I am told by some—salary the Catholic bishops and clergy. They have totally refused it. You have not enough in your treasury to pay them. As to their station, as to admitting them to Parliament, there is no place not absolutely disreputable where I would not rather see them than in Parliament. (Cheers and laughter.) But does the Protestant religion require all this? Do you say that it is necessary for religion to be kept up by money? Do you tell me your religion will fall if people are not paid for its ministry? If that be your Protestantism, what a trifling do you give to Catholicism! (Cheers.) The clergy in Ireland had all these livings and wealth to themselves. There certainly have been some donations since the Reformation, but the great mass and bulk of them—nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand—you took from them—you drove them out—you hunted them throughout the wilds and fastnesses—you put the same price, and that literally, on the head of a priest, as on the head of a wolf. But with all this has the Catholic Church failed for want of money? (Cheers.) No; never was it in more triumphant progress! Four arch-bishops, 23 bishops, 50 deans, 60 archdeacons, 2,000 parish priests, some of them with two or three curates, an entirely unbroken hierarchy, as unbroken and perfect as it was before Henry VIII. assailed it. (Hear, hear.) Have you not, then the same truth in your Protestantism that I have in my Catholicism? (Cheers.) Do not you believe that scriptural faith and the power of argument, and the influence of education, and all the sharpness of talent which literature gives, and which you have among you, that all these are not sufficient to fence and protect your church. (Hear, hear.) And is not the blessing of God, if the truth be with you upon you more than with the other? Oh; I do not like to dwell upon this subject, but now implore you to take into consideration the whole case of the Church. We'll go back to carry your answer. What do you mean to do for Ireland? Ah, I am afraid your answer will not be a satisfactory one. I wish it were. Years enough have passed away since the connection between the two countries to exhaust all malice and ill-will, and put them to an end. The period ought to come when Christians should embrace one another as men and brothers. (Cheers.) When justice and the spirit of truth should prevail and spread throughout the land, when the odious distinction between Catholic and Protestant—odious in all its relations, except in the relation of rivalry in piety and justice—should be abolished and done away with.

From Mr. O'Connell's Speech in Parliament. February 23 1844.)

Cardinal Bussy, Archbishop of Benevento, died a few days ago at Rome. He was born at Viterbo on the 29th, of January, 1755, and was invested with the purple by Pope Leo XII., in the consistory of the 3d of May, 1824.—Tablet.

CONVERSION.—A letter under the signature of Catherine Welhelmina Rohmann, dated Evansville, Indiana, December 22d, 1843, appears in the Wahrheitsfreund, stating her motives for embracing the Catholic religion.—Catholic Herald of Philadelphia, Jan. 13.

TIPPERARY.—With heartfelt sorrow and deep regret do we announce the death of the Rev. James Healy, parish priest of Newport, county Tipperary. This very much lamented and melancholy event occurred at his residence about two o'clock on the evening of Wednesday, 24th instant. The sensation produced was quick and general, the shops throughout the town were instantly closed; sympathy superseded every private calling; grief covered every countenance, and its bitter liquid filled every eye. The rev. gentleman was in his 80th year, and the 31st of his ministry at Newport.—Freeman's Journal.

CONTRASTS.

(From the Catholic Magazine, Feb. 1844.)

It was an able and ingenious thought in one of our distinguished living architects, which prompted him to illustrate the relative spirit of Catholic and Protestant times, in a work which graphically displayed the contrasts between the religious edifices of the past, and those of the present day. It were impossible for the most prejudiced eye to "look here upon this picture, and on that," as faithfully delineated by the pencil of the eminent antiquarian and draftsman above referred to, without reluctantly acknowledging a striking difference in the characteristic styles of the two epochs, whether we take such points of comparison as the gorgeous cathedral of York, and the vast but Pagan-like temple of Sir Christopher Wren, or an antique market cross, rich in Catholic tracery and pious inageries, and a stone lamp-post erected to the memory of a deceased alderman. The same object may with advantage be pursued with regard to many other points of utter discrepancy existing between the former and the present state of things in this our once happy country. The enquiry might lead to a more accurate than favourable estimate of the boasted advantages alleged to have accrued to the community by what men are pleased to call "the Reformation," but which in the blunt sincerity of our hearts we think may more accurately be designated as the great moral leprosy with which for purposes inscrutable to mortal foresight, the Almighty chose to afflict and desolate the fairest portion of His Church towards the latter part of the sixteenth century. A few of such salient matters of contrast as occur to our minds, we will take leave to signalise.

In the days of Catholic England, no diversities of faith and doctrine distracted and disunited the minds of the people; all believed in the great, and saving, and self-same truths of salvation, transmitted pure and unchanged from apostolic times, and were knit together by the firm bond of spiritual allegiance to the venerable and uncontested authority of St. Peter's chair. Now the Church of England, with no other guarantee for stability than the capricious authority of parliament, dares not even for those who profess to be enrolled within her pale, claim any unanimity or certainty of opinion:—witness the old standing divisions of high and low Church, the ever conflicting interpretations which the right of private judgment extracts "ad libitum" from indiscriminate perusal of the Scriptures; and the more recent and most notable schism which the Tract controversy of Oxford has introduced into the very bosom of the establishment.

Of seceders from the parliamentary Church, the name is "legion;" Presbyterians, Calvinists, Lutherans, Wesleyans, Unitarians, Quakers brown and white, Independents, Baptists, Swedenborgians, Irvingites, Plymouth brethren, Southcottians, Jumpers, Mugglestonians, Mormonites, Lady Huntingdon's connection, Socialists, Brianites, Primitive Methodists, Shakers, Moravians, are but the names of some of the sects to which the hydra of private judgment in matters of religion, have given birth and expansion in this country.

The Anglican Church disclaims, it is true, all connection with these multiform varieties of dissent, but she cannot deny that they are all direct offshoots from herself,—barnacles which have adhered to the keel of her own crazy ark, eating into the timbers, and threatening the future sea-worthiness of the vessel. So much for the phalanx of ancient unity, as opposed to the Babel of modern sectarianism.

No country was once so rich in religious and charitable foundations as our own. The magnificent monastic remains that still survive centuries of neglect and desolation, sufficiently attest what England must have been before Henry the Eighth, by laying his sacrilegious hands on the revenues of the Church, had impounded the best and only patrimony of the poor. That was indeed a sweeping and egregious measure of Reformation which thus converted to purposes of private and inordinate rapacity, wealth which the cumulative piety of ages had devoted to the service of God, and the sacred exercise of charity. In monkish days, no ill-administered poor law wrung reluctant tribute from overburdened rate-payers, so damming up the sources of private benevolence. Then the "Guardians of the Poor" were the inmates of the religious houses, who, from their magnificent monasteries, diffused far and wide among the rural population the comforts of this world, and the hopes of the next one. Then the portals of the abbey were ever open to receive within its hospitable walls the wayfaring traveller or houseless wanderer, and what time the holy men that dwelt there could spare from the active service of God, was devoted to the promotion of the vassal's competence, and the stranger's welcome. Now, mouldering towers and cloistered arches rent in twain, alone commemorate the monuments of our ancestral piety; but to supply the place of their departed glories, and in due conformity with the wants and utilitarian spirit of a superior age of civilization, we may boast of gaols, in which every variety of penitential probation is essayed at the dictum of any political economist that broaches a new system of prison discipline; of lunatic asylums, of which the number and enormous dimensions are still inadequate for the increasing number of those qualified to become their inmates; and of Poor Law Union Houses, of which the hideous brick walls, and tasteless elevations are, to the fair face of the country, like unseemly stains on the surface of a human body:—fearful receptacles of wretchedness, where poverty is crime, where every bad passion feasters into full expansion, from the dirty avarice and gripping tyranny of petty authority to the rankling vindictiveness and reckless surliness of half-starved pauperism.

In the old times of Catholic fervour, it was alike the duty as it was the general practice of the clergy, to extend the blessings of religious instruction to every individual member of the great social community; and where parochial priests were numerically inadequate to the spiritual exigencies of the population, there it was that the auxiliary brethren of the monastic orders proved themselves to be no useless and ineffective forces in the army of Christ, extending and perfecting by their zeal and ministrations the universal knowledge of eternal truth. Now, despite the clamour raised in and out of parliament about education, despite national and infant, and Sunday schools, and parent and branch Bible Societies, and all the remedial nostrums devised by legislators and philanthropists to meet the moral and religious destitution of the multitude, we hesitate not to assert, that there exists at this moment among the labouring and manufacturing classes of this land, a more fearful state of brutish ignorance, as regards the most ordinary truths of revelation, than was ever before attributable to the children of a soil calling itself that of a Christian country. It may in fact be said, that those whom the fanaticism of dissent has failed to inflame, are left by the pastors of the established Church in a state of utter indifference, and dearth of all spiritual feeling, worse than positive Heathenism. If these assertions appear too gratuitous, we challenge, in confirmation of their accuracy, the testimony of all those who have had the opportunity of ascertaining the moral condition of our lowest rural and manufacturing classes, and observing the frightful depravity and blindness to all religious principle which manifest themselves in the language and demeanour of the merest children: we appeal to the evidence of the Bishop of London, who, in one of his speeches on the subject of Church extension, admitted and proclaimed, that in the district of Bethnal Green alone, fifty thousand souls languished without any spiritual attendance or instruction whatever. Did it occur to the metropolitan prelate, when making the appalling statement, that Catholic bishops of olden days, would in such stress of circumstances have forsaken for the time the pomps of episcopacy, to visit in person such scenes of hardened misery, carrying from house to house, tidings of comfort and enlightenment, and staying by their presence the withering pestilence of infidelity? Thus would have acted the Cuthberts and Anselms of Catholic annals. Thus acted the great Borromeo archbishop of Milan, when, braving the infection of the plague, he devoted himself during the whole period of its ravages to the closest personal attendance upon the sick and dying in the public hospitals.

Did "Charles James London," or any of the twenty-six favoured incumbents of England's ancient sees, ever set foot within the walls of a hospital during the prevalence of the cholera? If they did, the patients that lay there must have been mightily surprised. It may be observed by the way, that at that very time, Quelen, Archbishop of Paris, was, at the head of his clergy, actually putting in practice the example of the illustrious Milanese Saint; tending the infected within the wards of the Hôtel Dieu, not a hundred yards from the site of his own palace, demolished by the fury of a mad multitude, to members of which he now in person administered temporal and spiritual consolation. So much for the genius of true charity, as developed by the respective spirits of Protestantism and Catholicity.

In ancient times, the chivalry of nations was enlisted in the perhaps desperate, but romantic and generous enterprise of the Crusades. It was a lofty and lofty feeling which induced men to abandon their homes, to sell all their possessions, and the armour of the Cross, and sacrifice their lives and fortunes in valorous attempts to rescue the cradle of the Christian faith from the hands of the infidels. Much contemptuous obloquy has in these times been vented upon those gallant knighterrantries of our ancestors. Let us, however, compare Richard Cœur de Lion, at the head of his English warriors, before the walls of Acre, and such modern instances as the advance of a British army, despatched by a band of merchants to spread fire and sword in the heart of unoffending Asiatic nations, or the speculative incursions of mercenary troops, volunteering to force constitutional governments, at the point of the bayonet, upon countries not yet fitted to receive them, and honestly say to which of such expeditions we instinctively lend the best sympathies of our nature!

It was during what is called the darkness of the Middle Ages, that private piety found vent in pilgrimages undertaken to the holy sepulchre of Jerusalem, or the shrines of saints: and no terms have been found sufficiently caustic to denounce the superstition and folly of such peregrinations. But what shall be said of the ignorance, fanaticism, and insatiation, which, so recently as the year 1842, induced upwards of five thousand of the labouring population of the north of England to become "Latter-day Saints," and actually to emigrate to North America, for the purpose of joining the head quarters of one "Joe Smith," the notorious liar, and illiterate impostor, who, as the prophet of that new sect, has had the art to impose upon and swindle his followers of the old and new world?

With what a self-complacent smile of pity for the blindness of Catholic times, the verger of Canterbury cathedral exhibits to the casual visitor the site of what was once the gorgeous shrine of St. Thomas of Becket, and points to the indentations in the stone steps, made by the knees of the Popish pilgrims in "the days of superstition!" Have these, then, so utterly passed away within the province of that archiepiscopal see, of which thou, most acute and doughty verger, art least,—but in thine own estimation, Heaven knows, not the least—functionary? Has the recent tragedy of Bossenden Wood so speedily passed from recollection? Is it, or is it not a fact, that within the last ten years, and within five miles of the primal see of Canterbury, under the very nose of dean, prebendaries, canons, and minor canons of one of the wealthiest ecclesiastical foundations in Christendom, a madman, of the name of Courtney, succeeded in deluding a numerous portion of the agricultural population into the firm belief that he was himself the Messiah? Were the votaries at Becket's tomb, or the believers in the divinity of the maniac assassin, the better instructed men?

In the days of Catholic antiquity, the rich revenues of our British sees were devoted by their incumbents to the support of the indigent, and the erection of the most magnificent religious edifices. Unshackled by wives and families, the prelates of Catholicism had no children but the poor; no craving for wealth, but in so far as its possession enabled them to expend it in the service of God, and for the purposes of religion. Bishops of olden time died in comparative poverty, having "lent their treasures to the Lord."

The executors of bishops of the present day, have to tell a very different story, e.g. "swearing the accumulated personal property of the deceased to be under a hundred thousand pounds," and making other such post mortem abnegations of worldly mammon? In a word, the monuments of Catholic bishops, are the cathedrals of York, and Lincoln, and Ely. Those of their Protestant successors, may be said to consist in piles of testamentary parchment, carefully preserved in the archives of Doctors Commons, recording, for the information of future generations, the manner in which the English episcopal revenues of the eighteenth centuries were hoarded for, and appropriated to, every imaginable variety of clerical nepotism.

By the Protestant Church, not only have its sources of wealth been diverted from the channel of public charity into that of personal emolument, but the very churches themselves, built for the use and free enjoyment of the people, have been converted into means of extracting pecuniary contribution. Is there a cathedral in the whole of Catholic Europe, from the Roman Basilica of St. Peter's, downwards, which is not gratuitously open from sunrise to sunset, to the universal worship of mankind?—the poorest, the most houseless outcast, finds at least within the holy walls of a Catholic Church, perpetual shelter, and pious consolation.

In one spot at least, the lowliest pauper knows that he has the same right to tread the marble pavement, and gaze on the gorgeous marvels of the sculptor's or the limner's art, as the proudest prince. For once he feels that in the temple of God, the loftiest, and the most abject conditions of man become confounded in the majesty of the Deity who is there adored. But in Protestant England, how different is the system pursued! There, to procure inspection of an ecclesiastical edifice, is as much a matter of money as to gain admittance to a theatre, and woe to the penniless wretch, who, saving at brief stated hours set apart for public service, should be found loitering in the aisles of a cathedral. In a Christian country, there is, or ought to be, nothing preposterous in the notion, that out of a metropolitan population of a million and a half, some few persons might feel occasionally disposed to enter "en passant" the magnificent church of St. Paul's for the sole purpose of offering a brief prayer within a sanctuary which should be as sacred to the religious feelings of an orthodox English churchman, as St. Peter's, or St. Sophia's, to those of a Catholic or a Mussulman.

Let us, however, just picture to our fancies the expression of countenance, which upon the application for admittance, and for the purpose supposed, by any such imaginary devotees, would be assumed by the nondescript and brutal Cerberus who sits at the door;—which, with its chain more resembles that of a debtor's prison, than the entrance of the house of God,—and imperiously exacts threepence from every one that would take the merest peep at the interior of a church, for the building of which the people alone had paid!

Such a demand, so enforced, would be enough to curdle the devotion of a saint!

In country villages, where comparatively primitive manners ought to be significant of greater religious fervour, the church is positively barred up, and never entered from one week's end to the other, and when its old oaken portals lazily turn on their rusty hinges, to admit a Sunday morning congregation to that solitary weekly service, the people that only half fill on such occasions the damp neglected edifice, might fancy themselves inhaling the cold and deadly atmosphere of a sepulchral vault!

Considerations not far removed from some of the above, must have unwillingly presented themselves to the mind of a very sincere and zealous member of the English establishment, when at the end of his able and interesting work on foreign churches, he places the following sentiment in the mouth of the imaginary companion that had accompanied him to England. "You have led me through a land of closed churches and hushed bells, of unlighted altars, and unstoled priests; Is England under an interdict?"

POPULAR EDUCATION IN ITALY.

From the Kircheen Correspondent.

Throughout the whole Middle Age, popular schools, in the principal cities at least, appear to have been maintained in Italy. But they seem not to have been destined for the poor. Such were the so-called quarter-schools, whereof one existed in every quarter of a city. These establishments historians connect with the schools founded by the Roman senate.

The later institutes, wherein the poor were received, are the work of religious beneficence. Herein Rome set the pattern to other states. These poor schools date from the Pontificate of Clement VIII. towards the close of the sixteenth century: Joseph Calazanzio, who was afterwards canonized, and who bequeathed to posterity a name as distinguished for science as for virtue, founded the first public free-school in the Trastevere—a district of Rome, where the wants of such schools was most palpably felt. This establishment flourished to such an extent, that in a short time, several sprang up under his direction. They were called schools of charity. Joseph Calazanzio, without giving scandal, admitted Jewish children to these schools. Besides receiving religious instruction and a pious education, the children were gratuitously furnished not only with books, but with everything appertaining to their bodily nourishment. Calazanzio made every exertion to keep the scholars under a wise and natural discipline. Even at the present day the teachers of this institution conduct the children home, on their quitting school.

From Rome, these schools spread over all Italy; but confined themselves to the education of poor boys exclusively. In the year 1655, the first poor school for girls was opened, and constituted on the plan above described. This occurred at the command of Pope Alexander VII. They were called Papal schools. That poor families might have the more inducement to send their daughters to these schools, bread was daily distributed among the children, and on the termination of their education, they received a small dowry. Subsequently at Rome, Viterbo, and Montefiascone, other girls' schools were established. Besides these institutions, an educational establishment for gratuitous instruction of poor girls was founded at Rome in the year 1637, by St. Angela Merici, and the Ursuline nuns. A similar service was rendered by the brothers of Christian doctrine. The former taught writing to such children, as intended devoting themselves to the conventual life, and instructed the rest only in the catechism, reading, and manual labour. The latter made religious instruction its principal aim, but at the same time furnished primary tuition gratuitously, and taught the elements of Latin, grammar, and literature.

Rome does not now forget that for three centuries she led the way in the course of educational improvement. It numbers 372 primary schools, containing upwards of fourteen thousand scholars, under four hundred and eighty-two teachers. During the last twenty years the number of district-schools has increased by one third: of these scholars, the number is now fifty-five. Parochial schools also, together with five or six new institutes having the same object, have been opened. To these we must add a certain number of unauthorized elementary schools, containing about three hundred schools under twenty teachers. For this progress in the system of education, Rome is mainly indebted to Pope Leo XII.

The Grand Duchy of Tuscany, which abounds in so many institutions of higher departments of education, has not achieved less for popular instruction. Its two hundred and forty-seven parishes, possess two hundred and thirty schools. Florence alone numbers nine, whereof six are formed on the most recent methods of instruction. Two thirds of the children capable of instruction, enjoy the benefit of schooling.

The Lombardo-Venetian kingdom is in this respect in a still more flourishing condition. There the progress of popular education has been still more rapid, especially since the year 1822, when the government enforced the Austrian law, whereby all parents, without distinction, are compelled under a penalty to send their children to schools. In the first ten years that this law was applied, the progress was so rapid, that the schools, which in the year 1822 numbered 107,768 scholars, exhibited in the year 1832 upwards of 166,767. If to these we now add the thirteen thousand seven hundred and fifty scholars, who attend four hundred and eighty-three paid schools, seven thousand six hundred and sixty-seven, who visit private establishments, all those who at the cost of benevolent individuals, are brought up in the private schools of the great cities, those who receive instruction in the orphan asylums, and in the institutions for foundlings, those who are bred in thirty-six charity schools, and lastly, a thousand scholars, who repair to the eight primary schools of Milan, and to the new establishments at Bergamo, Cremona, Vicenza, Verona, and Venice, we have then altogether, two hundred thousand children, who, in the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom frequent the public schools. This will make one child in every eighth inhabitant. To bring about this result, the government has not had recourse to any imposts; it pays about two thirds of the expenses, amounting to nearly twenty-six million Austrian livres; the other third is paid by the parishes.—Catholic

THE OLD CLERGY.

The relation of the Catholic clergy with the gentry is one of the principal difficulties of the present time. The origin of those difficulties should be traced, in order to be understood, or remedied. The persecution of priests had much relaxed at the accession of George III.; they discharged their duties on sufferance, but always subject to the penalties of the law at the caprice of their Protestant neighbours. Their influence over their flocks was unbounded. The gentry found them useful instruments in the protection of their property. They were educated in the colleges of Spain, Portugal, France, and Italy, and were for the most part the descendants of those families, who had emigrated at the Revolution or their immediate connections, who had remained in Ireland. This unhappy class also furnished officers for the Irish brigades on foreign service. Many of the clergy were well born, most of them well educated. They returned to their country to discharge a sacred duty amid toil, and suffering; too often exposed to insult from those, they knew to be their inferiors in birth and education.

Contempt for the Catholics was then, as now, the first principle of Irish Protestantism. If we may judge by the praises, which are now lavished on the priests of that period, they would have formed an exception; but the accounts which have been preserved in some of the colleges abroad afford melancholy evidence of the reverse. They complained of the degradation, to which their ministry was subjected, and which they endured as the price of their existence. They complained that they were too few to instruct their flocks, and were frequently obliged to devote the time, which should have been appropriated to religious instruction, to preach on the following texts supplied to them by their Protestant protectors:—

"Sir—I will draw my turf on Monday morning. Tell all the cars of the parish to be early at the bog, my own tenants in particular. Give this out at your chapel, and show your good will in your language.

J. S.

"To Priest Daly."

1775.

"Sir—Some of your damned rascals stole my pointer bitch; give her out in your chapel after Mass, and I will expect her on Monday morning.—Yours, &c.

1780.

"Sir—I hear you prevented Kitty Connor from kneeling at the front rail of your altar, and treated her with disrespect in my regard. I will have you to know that I will protect her, and level your mass house, if you, or yours, offend her. Mind this.

"F. C."

1780.

"Reverend Sir—My lady is shocked with the dirty, naked beggars that crowd round the Castle, and the cries of the children, that fret, and torment her. His lordship bid me tell you, he will quit the place if you dont keep them at home.—Your servant.

"J. TURNER."

"N. B. Your reverence may mention there are two wicked dogs in the yard."

What must have been the feelings of the educated gentleman if he consented to degrade himself and his ministry by making the house of God the place for expatiating on the merits of the horse, or the dog, of his Protestant master? Is it surprising (although it is much to be regretted) that some chapels have since become the scene of denunciation against the class, who degraded religion when unprotected by the law? Feelings of mutual hatred have replaced submission on the one part, and contempt on the other. Is it surprising that aristocracy has become a bye word, or that the designation of aristocrat is the most opprobrious, which an Irish priest or peasant can apply to his superior in station?—Tablet, Feb. 17.

THE PARSON AND THE PRIEST.

A TRUE STORY.

During the period between the years 1800 and 1820, there lived, in the same union, on the banks of the largest and most beautiful river in the province of Leinster, two clergymen, one of the Protestant, the other of the Catholic Church. They were two gentlemen of good literary talents, but of more accomplished and amiable manners, with philanthropy the most genuine and practical. Their constant emulation appeared to consist in the daily practice of sincere friendship towards each other, which terminated only in death, and the diffusion of kind services amongst their parishioners, without religious distinction, thus securing harmony and good neighbourhood throughout their district.

In the spring seasons the Protestant rector's plough, horses, men, seed-corn, and potatoes, were to be seen cultivating the poorer Catholic widows' small farms, while the Catholic priest's plough, horses, men, &c., tilled the fields of the poorer Protestants, having had the writer of this narrative discharging the duty of plough-boy.

Volumes could be filled with the benevolent acts of these two good clergymen, during their several years' incumbency in the same parish; but the reader must be content with a few principal facts, which will not fail to afford pleasure to all men of good heart.

Besides the regular routine of edifying society, and hospitality interchanged between these good reverend neighbours as liberal gentlemen, every thing they possessed was at each other's service, by way of accommodation, as brothers. No complaints or poundage for cattle trespass was ever heard or witnessed from either party, although their small farms lay contiguous, with the Protestant Church in the centre. The farm servants were only recommended to be more vigilant in preventing mutual injury to the crops.

The Protestant rector was esteemed by rich and poor as a good and charitable clergyman, ever ready to succour the distressed, whether from poverty or infirmity; and having been a very skilful physician, he always kept a well-stocked dispensary attached to his library, to which the poor had free access.

His tender-heartedness in levying his tithes, formed another amiable feature in his character, when compared with the rapacity of the majority of his contemporaries, and of later times. His constant injunction, on those occasions, to his proctor, Davy, was "to bear as lightly as possible on the people, and to let him suffer rather than the poor industrious farmers should be oppressed." When pay-day arrived, he invited them to meet him at a fixed place, by a notice published from the altar by his neighbour and friend, the parish-priest, who never failed to encourage his flock to pay him their tithes with cheerfulness, which was always enlivened by the good rector's generosity in providing good cheer for the farmers, who loved and respected him; and, at the same time, inducing his proctor (a Catholic) to make abatements in all cases he judged necessary; thus enabling the tithe payers to return to their families with contented and grateful hearts towards the humane rector, whom they considered their benefactor.

This kind conduct towards the farmers continued during the good rector's lifetime, followed by their corresponding gratitude to his grave, over which, by the united contributions of Catholics and Protestants, was raised a handsome emblematic monument to his virtues, still to be seen under an elm tree in the east corner of the parish cemetery.

Some time after the arrival of the rector to his benefice, he expressed his surprise to one of his flock that many of the villagers absented themselves from church; and on being told, as a reason, "that his predecessor was in the habit of furnishing the poorer men with wigs, hats, shoes, and great coats, as also their wives with mantles, in order to enable them to attend church," he replied, "Oh, if that be the cause of their absence, I do assure you they shall be longer absent, for I have made it a rule, that those who will not discharge their duty to the Lord for their own sakes, shall never be induced to do it for my sake;" which determination the upright rector ever afterwards observed.

On another occasion the good rector's liberality of sentiment was accidentally put to a severe test, at a time when Catholic carpenters were employed by the wardens to furnish his church with a new set of pews. A little popish boy, who happened to be weeding corn in the parish priest's field just by, ran into the church to rest himself a while by chatting with the carpenters, one of whom (an apprentice) was his brother. The clerk, a Scotchman, was also present gathering the chips for home consumption. At an unexpected moment the little popish boy mounted the pulpit, gravely opened the Bible, and commenced a terrific sermon with the following text: "This church is built upon a very sandy foundation, always repairing, but never finished." At this awful and sudden announcement the panic-stricken clerk dropped his chips, the carpenters dropped their tools as if electrified, while the juvenile preacher perceiving a boisterous storm arise on the agitated countenances of his audience, prepared to slip quietly out of the pulpit, and take leave, without delaying to shake the dust from off his shoes. But, alas! he had scarcely descended to the lower-most step, when the Catholic carpenters (fearing, of course, a lost job) set furiously upon him, and instantly struck him to the pavement, finishing their piety by dragging their poor little preacher by the hair amid kicks and clouts to the door, through which they tossed him out as a half-dead wolf, while the zealous clerk ran panting to the rector to lodge complaint. The good rector,* who at the moment happened to be amusing himself in his garden, seeing the clerk in breathless haste running towards him, very naturally became alarmed and anxiously enquired of him what was the matter? "O, Sir; O, Sir; O, Sir; Tommy such a body, has just this instant perpetrated a sacrilegious outrage on your church and pulpit, in the presence of me and the carpenters." "How so, Peter?" "Why, Sir; why, Sir; he got up into the pulpit and opened your Bible, Sir, and preached—that our church was built upon a very sandy foundation, always repairing and never finished," Sir." "Did Tommy preach so, Peter?" "It is a fact, Sir, he did." "Upon my word, Peter, little Tommy told the truth; and so have I myself often told the churchwardens, that the winter was not a fit time to expend the church cess in mason-work, whitewashing, and other repairs; and hence the truth of Tommy's sermon, 'that our church is always repairing and never finished.' But do you leave Tommy to me, I will chastise him myself."

Some short time after the foregoing scene, the rector and Tommy accidentally met, and in place of a reprimand for this treasonable sermon, Tommy experienced nothing but kind enquiries regarding his progress in studies at the country schools, with advice and encouragement to commence Latin at the bishop's new seminary for the Catholic priesthood, at the same time adding that all the classics in his library were at his command. The little preacher, of course returned thanks, considering himself singularly fortunate, in the extraordinary turn the first interview after the pulpit affair had taken place. Neither was the kind rector forgetful to have his recommendation put in train of accomplishment, for in the course of a very few weeks he had the matter arranged with his friend the parish priest who happened to be Tommy's uncle, and thus in August 1811 the little ill-treated preacher, who delivered his premature and terrific sermon from the same liberal rector's pulpit, and for which he was so violently tossed out of church by his working-day congregation, presented himself with Latin grammar in satchell at the Catholic Diocesan Seminary, which he frequented for nearly five years, when death, within a few months of each other, robbed him of his kind benefactors—the Protestant rector and parish priest. However, ever kind Providence provided him other good friends, through whose benevolence and generosity the premature preacher was enabled to pursue his ecclesiastical studies on the Continent, and afterwards serve his fellow-countrymen both as a missionary and patriot for upwards of sixteen years; when, again, with superior permission, he retired to the Peninsular, where he continues to render the Catholic missions important services. Thus far regarding the little mangled preacher, whose hard fate on the occasion of his first début seemed only to prognosticate worse treatment for pulpit and ministerial duties at a later date in a latine.

But there is among the many others one act of Christian liberality practised by the good rector, which should not be omitted. *It occurred at a time when his lady and family were at sea-bathing, that Anty, the cook (a Catholic), fell sick and died. Her kind master, perceiving her infirmity to assume a doubtful character, and not having a servant at hand, hastened himself over to the priest, and brought him arm-in-arm to prepare poor Anty for death, which took place after a very few days. For the funeral day, the benevolent rector invited Anty's former master, who had also been pastor of the parish, but translated to another several miles distant, to attend along with the actual parish priest, with mass and office, which were performed in the wakeroom, surrounded by Protestants and Catholics observing the most pious decorum. At the appointed hour in the afternoon the rector and two priests, on either hand on horseback, accompanied, like three brothers, the funeral to the churchyard: where they laid the poor cook in her grave with regret and respect, concluded by the usual De Profundis, in which the humane rector cordially joined, with general edification.

Little Tommy, the luckless preacher, prepared the altar, and served the masses at the parsonage on the funeral morning, and witnessed the whole charming scene.—Tablet.

MISCELLANEA.

ROME.—It will, no doubt, be interesting to many of your readers to learn that on Monday, the 22d of January, a Consistory will be held in which several bishops will be appointed, and the following prelates raised to the dignity of Cardinal:—Monsignore Cagiano, Uditore della Camera; Mgr. Clarelli, Secretary of the Consulta; Mgr. Gizzi, formerly Nuncio at Berne; Cardinal Macchi is to be appointed Bishop of Porto and Civita Vecchia; Cardinal Castracane is to be appointed Bishop of Præneste; Cardinal Cagiano is to be appointed Bishop of Sinigaglia, and Cardinal Clarelli is to be appointed Bishop of Monte Frascone. Mgr. Cappaccini will be appointed Uditore della Camera; Mgr. Matteucci will be appointed Secretary of the Consulta, and Mgr. Lucidi will be appointed Economo della R. Fabbrica. You said rightly, Sir, a few weeks back, that all eyes were turned towards the future Bishop of the Western District. As one of that district myself, I only hope that now all hearts will be lifted to the throne of Grace, to implore every blessing upon him whom Providence has selected to succeed our late great and good bishop.

The consecration of this pious and learned prelate, the Right Rev. Dr. Baggs, is to take place on the 28th of this month, at St. Gregory's, on the Cœlian Hill, from which issued, not only the Apostles of our country, SS. Gregory and Austin, but also his present Holiness, Gregory XVI.

It will be a consolation to all who knew and loved our late reverend prelate to learn that his views with regard to the college, that noble offspring of his zeal and talents, will be fully appreciated and carried out, by him who comes as his successor. It must be a source of joy to all who have the interests of religion at heart, to see one so competent in every way succeed to the vacant chair. As the late prelate (and I am free to confess I am one of those who will never cease admiring and even regretting him), had received from God those talents of ardent zeal, decision of character, and firmness of purpose which were necessary to effect the most arduous part of the labour; that is, to make a beginning, and lay down a firm and solid foundation for the good work of the Lord, our new Bishop possesses no less the prudence, the amiability of manner, and every other requisite for healing the wounds of irritation, and uniting all parties in the pious work of upholding and preserving the Catholic religion in our necessitous district.

In short, without any figure, Mr. Editor, as Dr. Baggs leaves Rome, strong in the confidence and love of all here, without distinction,—both of the authorities and of society at large, of Italians and English,—so I am confident he will be welcomed with the like sentiments in England from the Catholic body at large, and in particular by our friends in the West. The consecrating Bishop on this most interesting occasion will be Cardinal Fransoni, assisted by Drs. Brown and Collier, the latter of whom has lately arrived at Rome.—With all respect, I remain, Sir, your obedient servant in Christ. F. E.

Rome, Jan. 16, 1844.

The Sovereign Pontiff, Gregory XVI. has been graciously pleased to confer the title and dignity of Count upon J. L. Eyre, Esq.—Tablet.

ROME.—We quote the following from a letter dated Rome, Jan. 26th, given by the Commerce: "The youngest daughter of Lucien Buonaparte, the Princess Constance, aged 24, has just entered the French Convent of the Sacre Cœur de Notre Dame, on Mount Pinco. On account of her extraordinary mental capacity, her superiors destine her to be the foundress of a dependance in the order at Warsaw.—Drogheda Argus, 24th Feb. 1844.

CONVENT OF DISCALCED CARMELITES, TRANQUILLA.—The religious ladies, late of the house at Rhenoboth, near Dublin, have just taken possession of the most commodious and extensive establishment of Tranquilla, at Rathmines, and near the road leading to Rathgar—a most eligible and healthy residence. The other branch of the Discalced Carmelites at Ranelagh, near this, have just lost an amiable and pious member of their community in the demise of Mrs. Dolan, sister of Mr. Dolan, of Rathmines.—Ibid.

Two young ladies, Miss Hurley, of Bandon, and Miss Cahil, of Kildinan, received the white veil in the Presentation Convent of Fermoy on Tuesday.—Cork Examiner.

On Wednesday Miss O'Flaherty, daughter of Bernard O'Flaherty, of Ennisconally, Esq., was received by our venerated Bishop into the eminently useful order of the "Sisters of Mercy" in this town.—Wexford Independent.

TAKING THE VEIL.—THE SISTERS OF MERCY.—This edifying ceremony of the Church was performed on Thursday, at the Catholic Chapel, Bermoundsey, the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, V.A., officiating, assisted by Messrs. Beauman, North, Avelan, Kay, Foley, G. Rolfe, Hersnep, Telford, J. O'Neill, Rymer, Walsh, Kelly &c. A most numerous and highly respectable congregation was present. The young noviciate, a Miss Crudden, about twenty-three years of age, and of great personal attractions, had been in the convent about six months, and her most ardent desire was to be admitted into the religious order of the "Sisters of Mercy."—Tablet.

WATERFORD.—Three young gentlemen of the community of Trappists, at Mount Melleray, county Waterford, have lately been ordained by the Right Rev. Dr. Foran, bishop of that diocese, for duty with in the monastery.—Newry Examiner.

OXFORD.—THE TRACTARIANS.—The petition to the authorities of Oxford to save the pupils from the snares of Puseyism has been answered by the Duke of Wellington and Dr. Wynter, signing as chancellor and vice-chancellor for all the heads of houses. The point of the answer is the following:—It is undoubtedly true, that within the last few years certain tracts or pamphlets have been published by several distinguished members of the University, containing opinions and sentiments considered by many to be not conformable to, or consistent with, the doctrines of the Reformed Protestant Church of England, as embodied in the Book of Common Prayer, and in the articles of religion called "The thirty-nine Articles." The opinions and doctrines contained in these tracts or pamphlets have been considered, discussed, and replied to in other publications, and those discussions have, at different times, attracted more or less of the public attention. Against the prevalence, however, of erroneous opinions among its members generally, the University possesses a safeguard in the statute enacted more than two centuries ago, which provides that every candidate for matriculation should subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles; and every candidate for a degree should again subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles, and, in addition thereto, the Three Articles of the 36th Canon.—Ibid.

BRIGHTON.—Tracing the pilgrimage of Brother Macarius to this place, we find him hospitably entertained by the Rev. Mr. Cullen, having been at Swindon kindly received and handsomely gifted by the most noble and charitable Countess of Newborough. His quest is for funds for the Abbey Church, and he saves on his pilgrimage something like 10*l.* a week for the convent. He has been a Trappist for nineteen years; in all that time he has not tasted flesh meat, nor for the last three years any wine or malt liquor. He is cheerful, constant, and laborious in his pursuit; and we shall be glad if these little notices of his whereabouts should speed his errand. A Dissenting minister and two Protestant gentlemen have presented donations to the monastery of La Trappe through this reverend brother.—Tablet, Feb. 3.

THE CATHOLIC ARCHBISHOP OF TUAM.—This eminently learned and distinguished prelate has just published what may be considered a singular work of erudition. The first part of "Homer" in Greek and Irish. This truly splendid classic performance is to be continued in parts until completed.—Ibid.

THE BISHOP OF ARDAGH.—The learned and amiable Bishop of Ardagh, Right Rev. Dr. Higgins, is now making great efforts to complete his magnificent cathedral at Longford. It is hoped that every Catholic in the three countries will contribute to this most expensive and Catholic undertaking. Two of his Lordship's active clergy (Rev. Messrs. Davys and Dease) are busily engaged in collecting subscriptions towards this holy and valuable work in America.—Ibid.

DUMBARTON—MEETING OF CATHOLICS.—A public meeting of the Catholics of Dumbarton and Vale of Leven was held in the Old Fellows' Hall, Highstreet, on the 24th ult., for the purpose of entering a solemn protest against the unconstitutional and sectarian spirit evinced by the Irish Government in the formation of a jury for the State trials. At the precise hour of meeting, the Rev. Charles Mackenzie, accompanied by the gentlemen who were to move and second the resolutions, appeared in the Hall, and received a cordial welcome from a numerous and enthusiastic body of his people. The rev. gentleman, in the course of an eloquent address, said:—"I here enter my solemn protest against the foul imputation, that I am not to be believed upon my oath. I make bold to say that, like many of my forefathers, I could stand between the sword of the persecutor and my faith, and glory in my position. But to remain silent under the persecution of slander is a base cowardice which never shall be attached to my name. And sooner than live under the constitution, branded as a perjurer, and remain the victim of Tory hypocrisy and misrule, I would either fling their parchment Emancipation to the winds, minister to my flock under the canopy of Heaven, or retire to my native mountains, and take the liberty of serving God in the dark caves of Breemar." The rev. gentleman sat down amidst deafening applause. The following gentlemen in very appropriate language moved and seconded some spirited resolutions:—Mr. Wm. Brojan, Mr. John Smith, Mr. T. P. M'Fadgen, Mr. Jas. Frecl, Mr. Lochlan Burns, Mr. Garret Duff, Mr. Wm. Conolly, and Mr. John M'Millan. When Mr. Jas. Hamilton, seconded by Mr. Jas. Duffy, had carried by acclamation a vote of thanks to the chair, the meeting quietly dispersed.—Ibid.

GOREY, Feb. 4.—On Friday last the Feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Miss Lambert and Miss Redmond were received into the holy community of religious in the convent in this town.

A PROTESTANT MISSIONARY.—CAPE TOWN, November 29, 1843.—A melancholy incident occurred here to-day, in a Baptist minister having been brought from Graham's Town as a convict prisoner, to undergo his sentence of hard labour for two years in Robbin Island, and perpetual banishment from the colony. His name is George Aveline, and he was one of the cleverest, most sanctimonious, and ostentatious of the pseudo-missionaries that infect the eastern districts. He is an old and married man, and kept a day boarding school for the sons of the Grandees, of Graham's Town, and the neighbourhood. At the last assizes he was indicated for the attempt to commit, and the commission of, a nameless offence, with his own pupils and others. He pleaded guilty to the first count, and was spared, or he would have lost his life, as there is no doubt but that he would have been convicted on the second count, which is death in this colony. As I have seen no notice of this trial in the Colonial papers, though the facts were stated in one of them, with the name of this great "missionary to the Heathen," before the trial, I have given you this hurried account, that you may make what use you please of it.—Tablet.

WHAT AM I?—The Protestant Churchman has copied from the Banner of the Cross, a letter, the zest of which lies in the following extract:—"By the present title of 'Protestant,' adopted hastily, and without foresight by the founders of the American Church (I suppose to distinguish us from the Romanist society) we virtually disclaim being Catholics. Mr. Editor, are we not a Catholic Church? then why disclaim it in the very first page of our Prayer Book, and in our constitutional title? If I am not a Catholic, id est, do not belong to the Catholic Church planted in America, then I must find out where that communion is, and attach myself to it. I await the decision of the next great council of the Church, and am, meanwhile (as I humbly trust) AN AMERICAN CATHOLIC.—Truth Teller.

HEREFORD.—RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSY.—We are informed that the preliminary arrangements for the discussion between the Rev. John Venn, vicar of St. Peter's Hereford, and the Rev. James Waterworth, Catholic priest of Newark, relative to Catholicity and the Protestant rule of faith, were settled on Friday last, and that the discussion is to commence on Thursday, 8th February. In all probability it will continue several days, and much interest is felt as to the result. A chairman and a committee of four or five gentlemen have been chosen by Mr. Venn, and the same number by Mr. Waterworth. Reporters will be specially engaged to take down the arguments for publication, and a subscription will be set on foot to cover any incidental expenses. From what we hear, it is nearly certain the meeting will be held in St. Peter's Sunday school-room—a spacious building, which is capable of containing six hundred persons.—Monmouthshire Merlin.

ON DEATH.

Behold our brethren sleep in death,
God hath recall'd their mortal breath;
For them no fears we entertain:
To live was Christ, to die was gain.
Ye Christians each, and one, and all,
Be ready to receive this call;
For Christ will shortly bring us home:
The way is through the narrow tomb.
Then shall we meet our brethren dear;
With them rejoice His voice to hear
Pronounce, "Ye blessed of the Lord."
What rapture will these words afford!
To Father, Son, and Spirit high,
One God throughout eternity,
Our hearts with melody we raise,
In never ending hymns of praise.

LAUDES DIURNÆ.

The Psalter and Canticles in the Morning and Evening service of the Church of England: set and pointed to THE GREGORIAN TONES (according to Novello's Arrangement) by RICHARD REDHEAD, Organist of Margaret chapel, St. Marylebone, WITH A PREFACE on Antiphonal Chanting, BY THE REV. FREDERICK OAKELEY, M. A. Fellow of Baliol College, Oxford, Prebendary of Lichfield, and Minister of Margaret chapel. Second Edition, London, 1843.

We are anxious to say a few words on this interesting publication, but the nature of the work precludes us from giving our readers an idea of its merits, further than may be gathered from the Preface, which, we think, is well sustained by the rest of the performance. It is impossible not to be pleased with the Rev. Mr. Oakeley's good taste and candour, as well as with the laudable industry and zeal he has brought to bear on a very important department of the Church Service; and we hail this Essay as the promise of better things for the Church of England. The work has already undergone a second Edition, (a good proof of the public want of such a production and of the merits of this individual performance) and we need not, therefore, recommend every member of the Church of England who can read to have a copy of it.

The Rev. Mr. Oakeley has evidently looked into the writings of the Ancient Fathers of Christianity and examined the usages of the Catholic Church in the primitive ages, and the usual result on a sincere, unbigotted mind, is the consequence. He has discovered purity of doctrine, sanctity of morals, heavenly order and the workings of tender devotion, embodied in those ancient ecclesiastical records which modern innovators describe as the dark annals of a darker superstition. He surveyed the tents of Jacob and became enamoured of their stateliness and beauty: he compared them with the adverse protesting encampments of the Reformation, and sighed over the contrast. He has had the curiosity not only to survey the external frame-work and Majesty of the House of the living God, but to witness the internal avocations which have engaged its inmates since its Divine Founder went up into heaven; he has walked into every apartment, admired the decorations devised by faith, executed by charity and preserved by hope for the embellishment of its walls, and in his return begged leave to carry back to the Church of England a token of the spirit of other times, to remind her of what she should be, and what she would have retained, had she not broken the bond of union which made her a member of the great Catholic family. We are glad to witness the apparent thankfulness with which the Anglican Protestant accepts the services of the Rev. Mr. Oakeley, and our gladness grows upon us when we reflect how an offer of this kind would have been spurned some years ago.

We shall not venture to describe the reception which the "Gregorian Tones" would have met with in England in the Puritanical ages of darkness and fanaticism, when the railing of the Communion Table was looked upon as erecting an altar to the Pope; when an organ was esteemed no better than the Devil's bag-pipes, and a decent surplice as a filthy rag of Rome. Yes, we thank God, the times are changed, and men are changed with them; and if there are still a few ignorant declaimers, like the canting Editor of the Christian Advocate,—whose ebullitions are levelled against all that is venerable in Christian antiquity,—the scholar and the gentleman, the man of taste and research, who is not so self-sufficient as to think himself alone wise, who looks into the records of the primitive church, obeys his moral instinct in disliking innovation in a religion founded by God;—men of this description, (and they are becoming daily more numerous,) no matter in what Church they may have been born, are forced to respect whatever has been reviled by their co-religionists, and to lament the loss of many ancient Catholic usages and rites in the separated Churches of these times.

We shall now let the Rev. Mr. Oukeley speak for himself, and we invite the attention of our Protestant friends to the subjoined extract from his interesting Preface:—

"Although the practice of antiphonal psalmody was probably known in the days of the Apostle it does not seem to have been reduced to system and finally established in the Church, till the middle of the fourth century, when Flavian and Diodore, monks of Antioch, and afterwards bishops, the one of that see, the other of Tarsus, are said to have employed it, with singular success, to counteract the influence of the Arian heresy. In the Eastern Church, it was introduced by St. Basil, at Neocæsarea, about the middle of the fourth century; and by S. Chrysostom, about half a century later, at Constantinople. By both of these great Fathers of the Church it was used, as by Flavian at Antioch, for the protection of Catholic Truth, and the consolation of Catholic hearts, against the disturbing inroads of heretical error. By the heretics themselves the psalmody of the Church was variously treated; by Arius it was profanely counterfeited, by Sabellius decried as a wanton innovation. In answer to the latter charge, S. Basil pleads the precedent of numerous Eastern Churches, and thus bears incidental testimony to the prevalence, or, as we may say without any doubt, the universality, of the practice in his time.

"It may be added, that the very early use of the antiphonal chant in the Christian Church is intimated by a heathen Writer. Pliny, in his celebrated letter to the Emperor Trajan, describes the Christians of Pontus and Bithynia as chanting a hymn to our Lord "among themselves in turns," (secum invicem).

"In the Western Church, the antiphonal chant was introduced at Rome by Pope Damasus towards the close of the fourth century, and, rather before that time, at Milan, by St. Ambrose. The latter bishop, indeed, is famous in ecclesiastical history for the wonders which he wrought, by the help of antiphonal psalmody, in quieting the excited feelings of the populace, who sided with him in his resistance to the impious demands of the Arian Empress Justina.* St. Augustine speaks in more than one place of his "Confessions" of the power of the Ambrosian chant as heard by him at Milan. It is an old tradition of the Church, that the Te Deum was the work of these two great saints, St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, and that it was composed for the baptism of the latter. Of the hymns and psalms sung on that occasion St. Austin speaks in these glowing terms:

"How many tears I shed during the performance of Thy hymns and chants, keenly affected by the notes of Thy melodious Church! My ears drank up those sounds, and they distilled into my heart as sacred truths, and overflowed hence again in pious emotion and gushed forth into tears, and I was happy in them."

"In another place, he is almost disposed to contrast the chants of St. Ambrose with the simpler and severer tones of St. Athanasius, to the advantage of the latter.

"Sometimes, from over jealousy, I would entirely put from me and from the Church the melodies of the sweet chants which we use in the Psalter, lest our ears seduce us; and the way of Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, seems the safer; who, as I have often heard, made the reader chant with so slight a change of note, that it was more like speaking than singing. And yet, when I call to mind the tears I shed when I heard the chants of Thy Church in the infancy of my recovered faith, and reflect that at this time I am affected, not by the mere music, but by the subject, brought out, as it is by clear voices and appropriate tune; then, in turn, I confess how useful is the practice."†

"The Church of Alexandria, it may be observed, of whose practice in the time of St. Athanasius mention is here made, probably derived its method of chanting from the Essenes, a contemplative sect of the Jews, which had settlements in those parts, and of whose psalmody a writer of the first century gives the following description:

"They sing hymns composed in honour of God, varying in metre and in tune; chanting them sometimes in chorus, sometimes in antiphonal harmonies....after the fashion of the hymn of thanksgiving sung after the passage of the Red Sea, when the choir of men was led by Moses, and of women by Miriam."‡

"But the name of all others most celebrated in the history of Antiphonal Chanting is that of the illustrious Saint from whom we derive the Gregorian Tones; Gregory the First and Great, Bishop of Rome from A.D. 590 to A.D. 604. That St. Gregory the Great did not introduce the antiphonal chant into Western Christendom, nor even into the Roman Church, is evident from what has been said: he did but "gather up the fragments" of an earlier antiquity; and give shape and method to sacred strains, which, in the West, may be directly traced up to St. Ambrose and St. Damasus, three centuries before him; through them into the Oriental Church; and so on to their springs in the very age of the Apostles themselves. But, at all events, it is in the Gregorian Chant that the aboriginal music of the Church has been preserved from age to age; so that we to whose times it has descended, and among whom it is at this day in use, may have the comfort of feeling ourselves associated with the "Church of the Fathers," not merely through the words of our "Psalms, Hymns, and spiritual Canticles," but in the very tones in which we utter them.

The following short notice of St. Gregory the Great, and of his labours in the cause of ecclesiastical psalmody, appeared, some time since, in the pages of a periodical:—

"St. Gregory, surnamed the Great, was born at Rome about A.D. 545. The Emperor Justin the Younger appointed him prefect of the city; but he speedily became weary of political life, and withdrew into a monastery. He was induced to return into public by Pope Pelagius II., who sent him, A.D. 580, as his nuncio to Constantinople. On the death of the Emperor Tiberius, Gregory returned to Rome and became secretary to Pelagius. His heart, however, was all the while in the monastery whence he had been reluctantly withdrawn at the command of his ecclesiastical superior, and at length he obtained permission from the Pope to return to it. He was afterwards recalled to Rome by the great pestilence of which Pelagius died. On occasion of the plague, he instituted Litanies and solemn processions, interceding for the people night and day. On the death of Pelagius, Gregory was unanimously chosen to succeed him; but he shrank from the dignity, got himself conveyed out of the city in a basket, and hid himself in a wood. At length he was prevailed upon to return, and invested with the pontifical robes. He was consecrated Bishop of Rome in the year of our Lord 590. He presided over the Church thirteen years, and died in 604. He was of a profound humility, and won the regard even of his enemies, by a rare kindness and moderation. The facts of his history seem to prove that his heart was above the world. Such was Gregory; a name which should be held in honour by all English Christians. He is remembered in our Calendar on the 12th March, the day on which he was taken from the Church below. It is to be feared that in this country, which is largely in his debt, fewer think of him on that day than could be wished.

"Pope Gregory the Great remodelled the Antiphonary of the Roman Church, founded the schools for chanting, and instituted the 'canto fermo,' or plain chant, in the form in which it has been since carefully, or, as we may rather say, religiously preserved in the Church. It is worth mentioning that his various labours in the cause of religion were undertaken and accomplished against the discouragements of very bad health. It is related that he used to instruct his choristers from his bed; this bed was preserved with other mementos of his zeal and diligence to a late period. St. Gregory constructed his celebrated chant upon the basis of the Ambrosian, increasing the number of tones from four to eight. We believe, but we speak under correction, that the old Ambrosian chant is known at present only through the medium of the Gregorian... A strong evidence against the genuineness of the present 'Ambrosian chant' is in the almost inevitable tendency of music to degenerate without such persevering care as there is no reason for believing has been bestowed upon any chant except the Gregorian. It has required the vigilance of Popes and the protests of Councils to guard the severe tones of Pope Gregory from the encroachments of later corruptions; nay, and in other times, a great sovereign of Europe,* thought the purification of the Church song a matter deserving of an embassy to Rome." †

* This alludes to the Emperor Charlemagne, who, finding, about the year 774, that the Gregorian Chant had become corrupted in France, despatched two ecclesiastics to the court of Rome, to obtain it in its authentic shape.

† British Critic. Oct. 1840. Art. Chanting.

"The Gregorian Chant was brought into our own country by St. Augustin (of Canterbury) and his companions at the close of the 6th century of the Christian era. No doubt it was to the solemn tones of St. Gregory that those "litanies," were chanted, in which, on their approach to the city of Canterbury, the Missionaries of the Holy See implored the mercy of God in behalf of our heathen ancestors.* St. Gregory is said to have taken under his especial patronage the choirs of that church, which he ever regarded as the child of his tenderest affection. On the death, however, of the original chanters, the ecclesiastical music of this country was deteriorated by profane additions; and efforts were made to restore it, first by Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, who came with instructions to that effect from Pope Vitalian; and afterwards by John, Arch-chantor of the church of St. Peter at Rome, and abbot of the monastery of St. Martin, who was invited over to this country by Benedict Biscop, for the purpose, especially, of training a choir upon the Roman model, at his monastery of Wearmouth. The same John, according to Venerable Bede, not only instructed the brethren of the monastery, but was in the highest request, throughout the north of England, as a choir-master.† A like service to a portion of the English Church had been rendered, many years before, by James, a Deacon of York whom Paulinus left in charge of that church upon his removal to Rochester. Of this James, Venerable Bede says, that he was "profoundly skilled in the ecclesiastical chant," according to the practice of Rome and Canterbury,‡ which is thus shown to have been uniform. At a somewhat later period the knowledge of chanting is said to have been confined to Kent;§ so that it would appear to have been the above-named John, Abbot of St. Martin, to whom our Church was chiefly indebted for the excellence of its psalmody. The purity of the ecclesiastical chant seems to have been ever a main object with the rulers of the ancient English Church. Thus we read that Acca, Bishop of Hexham, sent, about the year 709, "for an eminent chanter, by name Maban, who had been instructed in the musical tones by the successors of the disciples of Pope St. Gregory in Kent, to educate him and his people; and retained him twelve years, that they might learn of him chants of which they were before ignorant, and that the tones, which although known, had, from length of time and neglect, degenerated, might, by his instructions, be restored to their original state,"||

It was about half a century after this time that the Council of Cloveshoe¶ enjoined the use of "a simple and solemn melody in the recitation of the Divine Office, according to the usage of the Church," as a security against an irreverent and theatrical mode of delivery. And, in a later decree, the same Council insists upon an "uniform tone in accordance with the Roman practice, that so all the faithful may praise God, as with one mind, so with one mouth."

"The first serious attempt which seems to have been made in England to corrupt the Gregorian Chant was in the time of the Norman Conquest, when Thurstin, who had been removed by William the Conqueror from the monastery of St. Stephen at Caen to that of Glastonbury, compelled his monks to adopt the vicious harmonies of one Wilhelm, in the place of the pure Gregorian Tones; a proceeding which threw the society into confusion, and was made a subject of grave charge against him.*

"In the centuries following, the Gregorian Chant seems, in this as in other Catholic countries, to have been involved in that general corruption of the ecclesiastical music which is so fertile a subject of lamentation and remonstrance with the great mediæval writers, and which eventually drew forth the strong condemnation of the Council of Trent.† John of Salisbury, in the reign of Henry II., is one of many who deplores the profanation of the Sanctuary, of a slipshod and secular style of music, destructive alike of Christian edification and of the reverence due to the sacred words of Holy Scripture and the Church.‡ This evil had reached its climax in the 16th century, when Palestrina arose, and with him a new and brighter æra in the annals of ecclesiastical music.

"We have thus brought the Gregorian Tones to a period of their history in which they began, among ourselves, to give way to the psalm-chants of other composers, by which they were, in the Anglican Church, gradually, but at length completely, displaced. Till very recently their name was hardly known in this country, and when our increased intercourse with the Continent first brought them into notice, it was supposed that ears familiarized with our own brilliant and diversified Cathedral chants, would be intolerant, almost to loathing, of their austere simplicity. The very reverse, however, has been the case, and the Gregorian Tones have been received among us with a heartiness which cannot but be cheering to all those who are on the watch for traces of sympathy with the ancient spirit of the Church.

"It needs but little skill in music to perceive that the Gregorian Tones are formed upon an idea of the nature and proper end of chanting, entirely different from that which has given rise to the tunes to which the Psalms are commonly sung in our own Cathedrals. Modern chants, to speak generally, seem to presuppose that music is intended to embellish and set off the sacred words of inspiration: whereas the very notion of a "Tone," by which name the Gregorian Chants are most fitly designated, is that of a simple form of recitation, a mere vehicle of the sacred words, not an elaborate and ornamental frame-work. Some modern chants, no doubt, there are, which are constructed upon the simpler principle; but by far the larger portion, though preserving a certain character of solemnity suited to their object, are too much, surely, of the nature of musical compositions, to be consistent with that high and self-forgetting reverence towards their subject which is characteristic of the older melodies. The Gregorian Chant seems to proceed upon the view, that the simplest medium of the Divine accents is the best suited to their intrinsic majesty and sacredness. It differs, therefore, alike from reading, which is too familiar, and singing, which is too artificial, being at once plain without meanness, and elevated without display. Display, indeed, is the idea of all others which it excludes, and which the average of modern chants rather involve. The Gregorian Tones have no character, or even existence, apart from the words which they are meant to convey; viewed by themselves, they are like the eyes of a statue, inexpressive for want of an animating soul, and beautiful only through the power of association which instinctively connects them with the words which are their true life and spirit. To say, then, that, as heard for the first time, they communicate even to a musical ear no just idea of their peculiar sweetness and power, is less near the truth than to say that they communicate absolutely no idea of melody at all. Many of our modern chants, on the contrary, lose very little indeed of their effect by being detached from the words.

"The Gregorian Tones, in short, bespeak a mind which approaches the Psalms of David or the Evangelical Canticles with so profound an awe as to relinquish, from the first, all thought of giving them effect by the help of human art. When it is said that our modern chants are conceived under a different idea, it is by no means intended to charge the composers of them with want of reverence; but, at the very worst, with a mere misconception of the true end of chanting. One view of sacred music there is, and surely a most legitimate and strictly Catholic one, according to which those very characteristics of the modern chant which are here mentioned in objection to it, may be explained even upon the principles of reverence. The use of the more ornamented style of Church music is thus justified by Hooker:

"Be it that, at the first, the Church in this exercise was more simple and plain than we are, that their singing was little more than only a melodious recitation (where he points at, or at least exactly describes, the Gregorian Chant), that the custom, which we now use was not instituted so much for their cause which are spiritual, as to the end that into grosser and heavier minds, whom bare words do not move, the sweetness of melody might make some entrance for good things. . . . those harmonious tunes of Psalms were devised for us, that they which are either in years but young, or, touching perfection of virtue, are not yet grown to ripeness, might, when they think they sing, learn."*

The question is, not whether music has a purpose in the Church of the kind here intended, (for upon this point all are agreed,) but whether it should be employed in chanting under this particular view of its use. Hooker, it is true, is speaking in this passage immediately of psalm-chants; of those, however, of his own age, which were undoubtedly far simpler than the class which has succeeded them, and considerably nearer in character to the Gregorian than to the generality of those latterly in use among us. But the fact is, that, when once the principle of ornamental music in psalmody is admitted, the degree in which it may come, as time proceeds, to be applied, is quite out of control; hence the special wisdom of jealous care, with which, in the ages of Faith, the Church laboured to guard the purity of the Gregorian Tones.

"Whether the chants which, under the name of Gregorian, are now in use among us are precisely the same with the original Tones of S. Gregory, is a question which the present writer leaves to be determined by others more competent than himself to the task.* At all events they are considered by scientific musicians to correspond essentially with the description of the Gregorian Chant which is given by Catholic writers. Thus Cardinal Bona says,

"Gregory the Great instituted his Plain Chant, which, beginning in plain tune, goes on to measure out its several notes in even but quick time. For, with him, it was no object to produce the harmony of different voices, and the elegances of melody by a variation of intervals; but he confined the range of each tone within certain fixed limits; and appointed certain transitions and passages of the voice, according to the natural arrangement of the diatonic scale."†

"The especial defects of chanting which it is hoped to obviate in a degree by the present manual are exactly described in the following rule of S. Bernard:

"Let us beware," says one of the Cistercian statutes, "of dravelling in our psalmody; let us chant with a full and clear voice; taking care to intone, and break off together, both the division, (i. e. the former half up to the colon,) and the end (the later half) of the verse.‡ No one should dwell on the notes, but each pass on at once. After the division of the verse, let us make a suitable pause. No one ought to venture on beginning before the others; nor on outstripping them; nor on stopping after them to draw breath, or lay stress on a note. Let us keep our ears open, so as all to chant, and all to stop, at one and the same time."

"Then follow instructions which are equally needful, and still more important.

"We admonish you, best beloved, to attend

* Mention, as I am told, is made by Thibaut, (ueber der reinheit der tonkunst, pp. 28-30,) of a MS. of the Gregorian chants at S. Gall, in Switzerland, as old as the ninth century, which he commends to the special notice of those who are interested in the subject.

† "Gregorius M. planum cantum instituit, qui de plano procedens, singulas notas brevis temporis æquali mensurâ dimittitur. Non enim variarum vocum concordem discordiam et concinnam per intervallorum di- tantiam melodiam observavit; sed certos tantum limites et terminos cujusque Toni constituit; certosque vocum transitus et progressionem secundum naturalem diatoni- ci generis dispositionem."—De Divinâ Psalmodiâ, c. xvii. § 4.

upon the Lord, in the Divine Service, with alac- rity as well as reverence; not lazily, yawning, like people half asleep; not grudging your voices, not cutting off your words in the middle, nor skipping over whole ones,* nor pronouncing them in a mincing and effeminate tone of voice,† but giving out the accents of the Holy Ghost in a manly strain and spirit. Men should chant like men, not like women, aping the wantonness of the stage with shrill and affected voices. Our rule, then, is, that you take care, in chanting, to preserve the due mean, which at once savours of gravity and preserves devotion." So far the Cistercian rule.‡ The Cardinal himself adds,

"The notes should all be given out evenly; in a due mean between excessive rapidity and tedious protraction."§

What a pity that England should not be united in communion with that Church which first instructed it in the tenets of Christianity, and that the Anglican Church should not resume the Faith as well as the musical "Tones" of Gregory the Great, who sent one of his missionaries from Rome to instruct the English in both, when they were Heathens.

SYDNEY.

The following letter to his Grace, the Arch- bishop Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, will be read with interest.

Belvedere, Port Seschmoult, W Australia.

7th February, 1844.

MY LORD—I embrace the opportunity of writing to Mr. Prinsep to inform your Lordship that we have now a Catholic Mission in the Colony. In November last the very Rev. Dr. Brady, V. G. with the Rev. Mr. Joostins, and a Mr. D. Raily as candidate for orders, arrived here from Sydney. Government have granted the Mission a very fine site for a Church, Clergyman's residence and school, and though our friends are few, and these too of the poorer class, a handsome subscription has been raised, and a building is now in progress of erection, which will answer all three purposes. I propose sending my boys to this school, should no Clergyman come from your Lordship this summer, as I shall then cease to expect the Gentleman your Lordship hoped to send me. I must also suspend for the present, all further payments on account of my nephew at St. Xavier's, as I shall have to contribute to the support of this Mission, Government being too poor to afford the least contribution at present, and the very depressed state of our affairs here puts it out of my power to be as liberal as I could wish. I cannot get a sixpence rent from my own property; and we must only hope for better times.

Dr. Brady has kindly favoured us with a visit here for a week. It is his intention to proceed to England and Rome for the purpose of organizing a Mission for the natives. I told him that I had hopes of the arrival of a Clergyman from Calcutta, and he appeared delighted at the information, hoping to place him in charge here during his absence, as Mr. Joostins does not speak English very fluently. Dr. Brady adds that His Grace the Archbishop is likely to favour us with a visit in the course of the present year.

I am thankful to state that my family and myself continue well; and with our earnest prayers for your Lordship's good health,

I remain,
Your Lordship's faithful and obedt. servt.

ARRIVAL OF MISSIONARIES.

Our esteemed Correspondent of Bombay informs us of the arrival of the Steamer Cleopatra from Suez, on the 8th ultimo, having on board as passengers seven Missionaries, vizt. Revd. Fathers Pedro Pellicci, Dr. Bartoine Sandoini, Dr. Joze Hovella, Dr. Quernbino Bianqueri, Italians of the Franciscan Order, and Revd. Mr. Pedro Colombier, of Versailles, Dr. Francisco Leam, native of Canton and Dr. Joaquim Kuoh, native of Hu-quoong, Chinese Priests, all destined for the China Mission, and who were to have left that presidency in the latter end of last month on board the Julia, Captain Jones. They left Rome on the 12th February last in company with eight other fathers of the Society of Jesus, the latter took their passage on board the Hindoostan Steamer for Madras, and are destined for the Jesuit Mission at Madura.

BAPTISM OF HEATHENS.

Our readers will be glad to learn that in a locality not 20 miles from Calcutta, 25 Native children have been just baptised by the Rev. Mr. Veralli.

THE HOLY EUCHARIST.

(For the Catholic Herald.)

1

Inestimable pledge of love divine,
Of Him, who lost his life to ransom mine!
Hail, heav'nly manna! hail, celestial food!
Vouchsafed to man for his eternal good.

My Saviour—not content to immolate
His body, Adam's sin to expiate,
Has left in this consoling mystery,
His body, blood, soul, and divinity.

Oh! how exalted are our holy fanes,
Where Jesus in concealed effulgence reigns;
Concealed to human vision, but the eyes
Of faith beneath the veils its God describes.

4

From th' orient even to the setting sun, (a) Where'er the mind of man by Truth is won,
The priest of Jesus his command obeys,
"This is my body, this my blood," he says. (b)

5

And at these mystic words, the Pow'r Divine
A change produces on the bread and wine;
The bread and wine are instantly no more:
Thus conscious nature does its Lord adore.

6

And lo! the God of Calvary descends,
Whilst heav'n itself in adoration bends,
And angels and archangels their voices raise,
To sing the Lamb of God's eternal praise!

7

Ye Christians all, now to your Saviour turn,
With holy love, oh! let your hearts now burn;
Penitents, your Physician here behold,
Ye just, your God within your bosoms hold.

8

Man, man, how lofty is thy destiny!
Made to the image of the Deity, (c)
On earth receiving as thy food thy Lord, (d)
In heav'n expecting Him as thy reward.

9

Will one, who glories in the Christian's name,
Will he presume like Jews of old to exclaim,
"How can this man give us his flesh to eat?" (e)
"This to believe is hard," will he repeat? (f)

10

Wilt thou restrain the pow'r of Him, who said
At th' earth's birth, "Let light be," and light was made? (g)
To fathom boundless love—hast thou a mind?
Look on the cross, where He for man his life resigned!

11

What can be hard to Him, at whose word man
And ev'ry creature to exist began?
What act of mercy can e'er soar above
The Charity of Him, who died for love?

Dost thou think, this belief its origin
Does owe to popish ignorance and sin?
Describe its birth, its father, and its nurse,
The circumstances, place, and time rehearse.

13

Did darkness and obscurity of night
Conceal these facts from the Historian's sight,
While some unknown extraordinary man,
This doctrine to disseminate began?

14

Can aught of hell or earth possess such pow'r,
As into ev'ry Christian heart to pour
A doctrine contradicting human sense?
What magic charm was used?—what force immense?

15

Being unknown, say how didst thou this change produce,
Though some of Jesus's disciples did refuse (h)
To bow their senses to this mystery,
Despite the proofs of his divinity.

16

Say how didst thou obtain this influence?
Didst thou men's hearts subdue with eloquence?
With miracles their senses captivate?
The blind enlighten? corpses animate?

17

Away with such a silly phantasy,
Th' imagining of frantic bigotry:
None could induce man's mind, save the most High,
To yield to th' eucharistic mystery!

18

Ye, who its real origin would seek,
Behold its figure in Melchisidech, (i)
Listen to royal David's poesy, (j)
And to the prophecy of Malachi. (k)

19

See Jesus to his followers impart (l)
His flesh and blood to sanctify their heart;
Behold his church the sacred gift retain,
For those, who life eternal would attain.

20

Shall we, then, on this truth objections throw?
Or say with Peter, "Whither shall we go?" (m)
Words of eternal life from thee proceed,
Thou art the Christ, the Son of God indeed?"

I saw her in life as she moved,
With the unction of peace in her tread;
And every thing outward but proved
How the spirit was secretly fed.

2.

The sweetness of every feature,
And the joy-beams of hope in her face,
Evidenced God in his creature,
And recalled the beholder to grace.

A mother, a sister, a friend,
A guardian and tutor, combined,
Such only as heaven could lend,
For heaven the earth hath resigned.

4.

No more shall her sweet little voice

Or little ones prompt to the choice
That would bind them to God from their youth.

5.

Her magical fingers are cold,
And the spirit that moved them has fled;
The musical numbers they told,
Sleep silently there with the dead.

6.

Their light touch no more shall awake,
'Midst the choirs of adorers below,
The strains which our hearts used to take
With them, heavenward, soft, in their flow.

The figures her fancy had traced,
And the pencil or needle half dressed,
Like beauty by death's blow effaced,
Shed a gloom on the face of the rest.

8.

Yet still, like the artist, resigned,
They appear to look up for new birth,
And gone with the author, in mind,
To have left their remains on the earth.

Ah! Death, midst thy sorrows and gloom,
There is hope after all thou canst do;
Those charms which melt in the tomb,
Shall be moulded to glory, a new.

As she lived, in the calmness of grace;
Her pure soul went forth as a bride,
And left a sweet smile on her face.

THE CHAMBER OF DEATH.

How stern yet wholesome a moral is deducible from the contemplation of that not less awful because daily scene, the last illness and death-bed of a fellow being! It is not, however, a fleeting and cursory visit to the sick chamber that suffices to bring it properly home to the mind, but it must be that degree of attendance upon the closing moments of a life which men are only induced to give from motives of friendship or consanguinity, and which enables, or indeed compels, them to take an analytic and deliberate view of all the circumstances that mark the final hours of human existence. Thus, and thus only, are we enabled to watch the gradual decay of physical and mental faculty that heralds the great change, and contemplating in another the fate that awaits ourselves, arrive at the full, humiliating, and yet salutary consciousness of human nature's fleeting and utter insignificance! It was under the influence of such, and similar reflections, that, summoned to the bedside of a friend, in whom the symptoms of a long and deeply-seated disease had at length assumed a character of imminent danger to life, we gazed upon features from which sickness and suffering had banished the well remembered and joyous smile that had been wont to lighten them, and from the vacant stare, the haggard look, the mortal languor, became too plainly convinced that death had set his seal upon one who had been to us the well-loved associate of many a past and pleasant hour.

With countenances ominous of a hopeless case, physicians had been pacing to and fro between the sick chamber and the room where they sat in consultation; in the very tramp of their heedless, heavy feet, on the staircase, imagination might have traced the professional unconcern of those paid heralds of evil tidings. They leave the house; having pronounced, as it were, sentence of death on its devoted master; and hope, which, before their visit, had been still jocund and buoyant, droops her now shivered wing. Then might be seen the tender wife, till now unconscious of her husband's danger, ministering to all his wants with redoubled earnestness, and vainly striving beneath an appearance of forced placidity, to veil the anguish that tears her soul. With magnanimous effort she forces back to their deep source the fears that rush unbidden to her eyes, though her very heart-strings crack in the effort to wear that ghastly semblance of self-composure. By occasional broken words of grateful recognition the sick man feebly acknowledges the attentions of which he is the object, and faintly endeavours to express his wants; his glazed eye, and wandering sentences and manner, too plainly indicating the progressive obscuration of the thinking faculty, and stealthily inroad of the destroyer. Night comes on;—no season now of rest either for the sinking patient, or the anxious and sorrowing few that prepare to hold friendly vigil in his dying chamber. Hour after hour steals past, only marked by the periodical administration of prescribed remedies, and the occasional interchange of half-smothered voices giving expressions to such hopes or fears as the alternate restlessness or repose of the sick man may for the moment suggest. Of those watchers at the bedside of death, there is one alone whom during that live-long night, no momentary inclination to slumber tempts or overcomes, for stronger than nature herself, is the wakeful tenderness of a wife's heart!

We remember an incident to which not a shadow of real importance could attach, and which yet involuntarily thrilled on our minds like a portent. A servant presented himself at the bedroom door to answer the call of a bell which no person had pulled! This might be explained in half-a-dozen natural fashions, all of which at that dead hour of night, by the couch of the dying man, distempered imagination felt disinclined to adopt.—But morning breaks! He breathes more softly,—he sleeps,—and his slumber is tranquil as that of infancy! Too sanguine hope revives, and builds upon symptoms of transient improvement, promises never to be realized! Smiling through her tears, the fond wife clings with too complacent self-indulgence to thoughts which portend the possible realization of her most ardent prayers. Grouped round the blazing fire, the night watchers for the first time exchanged words of more encouraging and cheering import, and venture once more to speak of past and future hours of social pleasantness in which he whose slumber seems so placid has played, and may again enact so chief a part. Sunlight at last streams into that dreary chamber, and the arrival of the physicians is eagerly, yet nervously anticipated. Will they confirm the hopes, so recently encouraged, or quench them at once in the bud? Alas! their dictum but registers heaven's own decree! the freedom from pain, the delusive calm that thereon ensues, are but the two unfailing indications of a crisis in the malady, from which all the human art in the world cannot avert a fatal and speedy termination. The resources of medicine are at a standstill, its baffled ministers forsake the house, unable even to keep at bay its master's doom. A clergyman of the established Church now obeyed the summons which had been sent to him, and at the bedside of the sinking patient, impressively delivered the prayers set apart in the Protestant formulary for the visitation of the sick, concluding them by the administration of the sacrament to the dying man, and to such of the bystanders as chose to participate in its reception. Our poor friend had been too regular and exemplary a member of the Church in which he had been brought up, for us not to cherish the consoling hope that in his case, as in that of many thousand others, sincerity, even in error, may be accepted by an all merciful God in the stead of a more perfect knowledge of the only true religion. The indulgence, indeed, of such an aspiration, can alone enable us to gaze upon the closing moments of those in whom, while entertaining the warmest personal interest, we at the same time feel, from the recollection of their former religious prejudices, that to attempt at that supreme hour to allay them would be an act of utter hopelessness and temerity.

With the departure of the minister of religion, following too upon that of the medical attendants, the curtain seems indeed about to drop. But the domestic tragedy is not yet over. Its most painful part has still to be enacted, and long hours to be passed by a bedside of mortal extremity, uncheered by the slightest hope of giving alleviation, and yet during the lapse of which, the wife would not forgive herself were she for one moment to forsake the post assigned to her alike by love and duty, where she is for ever at hand to smooth the pillow, and return the feeble grasp, and peradventure catch the last gleam of fond intelligence that may break from the closing eyes of her expiring husband. And the lazy hours drag their slow length along; evening again comes on, and the energies of nature, driven within her last entrenchments, still wage desperate conflict with the powers of death. What a contrast between that second and the night which had preceded it! Then, although anxiety enough had prevailed in the sick chamber, it had still been tempered by hope. An air of comfort had still reigned there, the brightly burning lamp, the blazing fire, the patient resting on his well-propped pillows, the periodical administration of medicines from which benefit might accrue, were so many distractions that kept the thoughts at bay; now all contributed to concentrate them on one fatal object, the rapidly approaching end of a beloved fellow-being.

The lights burn dimly in the darkened chamber, the neglected fire sends forth a dull lurid glare; no sounds are heard, save the hard and deep-drawn breathings of the dying man, and the stifled sobs of her who kneels beside him: the door is wide open, that the night breeze may fan the sweat of death, and in a kind of spell-bound silence the servants of the household stand motionless about the room, gazing upon their master in his agony.

There too may be seen the hired nurse, inured by the apprenticeship of a score of years to such scenes of misery, endeavouring to assume an air of maudlin sorrow and sympathy, while she is inwardly calculating the perquisites that are likely to accrue to her from the "job" in which she is embarked,—with much of the same spirit that actuates the hangman on whom some time-dishonoured right of prescription confers a property in the garments of the victim whom the law has employed him to immolate,—the crone is meditating how she shall successfully lay claim to the bed-clothes and apparel in which that still living being shall breathe his last.

But morning has again dawned—a day which for the tenant of that melancholy room, and for how many others, alas! in the wide world besides, will have no sunset! In the very breath of the dying man, as its convulsive heavings seem to struggle with the death rattle, an exhalation is observable, not to be mistaken, that tells of mortality and the grave! His hour is come,—respiration is arrested, as at the sudden beck of some mighty magician. Though propped high in bed, the body sinks, as if all that supported it were at once giving way; the head falls back, the jaws collapse, a livid pallor overspreads every feature; an immortal spirit hath passed to judgment, and the fleshly covering it had so well loved to tenant, is a cold and inanimate corpse!

Revisit an hour hence the chamber of death, how changed its aspect!—Total calm has succeeded to the turmoil of the parting scene,—the disorder which during such a moment had prevailed, has given place to a kind of chilly, cheerless tidiness; the room has been "swept and garnished," and upon that smoothed couch, so recently ruffled by the contortions of a dying man, his remains now lie stretched out in that attitude of perfect repose, and with that expression of solemn beauty, which appertain to the dead alone.—We gaze with respect and awe, but without any horrible feeling upon that lifeless form, so placid the expression, so exquisite the moulding of those wan features:—lineaments of which the play of human passion had disturbed the economy, may now in the utter stillness of death be contemplated under an aspect which reveals in all its perfection the chiselling of nature's great statuary.

Strange, that the trappings of upholstery, with which the usages of civilized life environ the relics of human mortality, should be more fearful to gaze upon than death itself.—Yes so it would seem to be.

The aspect of the pale corpse alone had excited no other feelings than those of sorrow and sympathy, not unmingled with a degree of awe-stricken admiration. Laid in its bier, the half-opened lid revealing the upper part alone of the body, and the livid white of the pillow that supports and trimmings that bedeck the head and chest of the dead man, contrasting with the blackness of the coffin, and the velvet pall that falls in ample folds of lugubrious drapery over its lower extremity, the spectacle impresses the beholder with a kind of creeping and shuddering sensation that clings thereafter to memory like a dread and dismal dream.

It is, perhaps, when in attendance upon a death-bed, that we who have the happiness of knowing, best learn how to feel the truth of our religion. Throughout life's varied paths, Catholic and Protestant greet and jostle each other, discuss or forget their respective differences, and virtually attach less importance to the prospects of a future, because all are so profoundly absorbed in the pursuits of the present life: but bring men face to face with the great destroyer, and we shall then find whose armour is best tempered for the inevitable encounter. Is there any one of all who have the interests of a future state at heart, who, however regular and decorous may have been his general habits of life, would not at the close of his days feel more ready to regard himself, and be regarded as a grievous sinner, than as a child of election? In the one character, he humbly sues and hopes for mercy, in the other, how imminent the peril of self-presumption! Yet the instructions set apart in Protestant formularies for the visitation of the sick, contain no urgent calls to repentance, no expression of grievous sorrow for past offences, no ardent aspiration for forgiveness; they are couched rather in the most soothing tones of highly-wrought religious tenderness, and seem based on the too often gratuitous assumption, that the patient to whom they are addressed, has never strayed from the practice or been wanting in the fervour of piety. No confession of sin is required of him, he is admitted, as a matter of course, to participation of a Sacrament which he has, perhaps, not approached for many years, and peradventure dies on better terms with himself, and worse with God, than if, roused by more stirring exhortations to repentance, he had taken a more strict and less complacent self-retrospect. Is there not again something awful in the dread yet inevitable alternative, which the creed of Protestants necessarily involves with respect to the fate of those dying in their communion. For, rejecting the holy and consoling doctrine of a middle state, their hopes or fears must necessarily consign the departing soul at once to heaven or hell! Now of whom amongst us, can we with inward confidence believe that he has been found worthy straightways to pass from the contaminating turmoil of the world, to the blissful enjoyment of God? while, on the other hand, we cannot without feeling abhorrent to our very nature, adopt the contrary supposition, that he has been sentenced to everlasting perdition. Yet every Protestant finds himself placed on the horns of this distracting dilemma, that considers the future fate of his dying relative or friend. When once the spirit has quitted the body, all tie between it and the kindred it had left is severed for ever! The survivor may not believe that his prayers might still aid the soul which has fled! his stern and frigid creed bids him reject all further thought of pious love for the departed one, and so forfeit the greatest, the only real consolation, of which bereavement is susceptible.

O let us turn from such a picture, to the death-bed of one who prepares to leave the world in the bosom of that faith, which alone holds "Communion of Saints" with the blessed denizens of heaven! The visit of the priest has been employed in suggesting to the mind of his dying penitent every conceivable motive of horror of and contrition for past sin, in aiding him to make a full confession of his offences, and in pronouncing over him those healing words of absolution, of which, if his disposition be that of sincere repentance, Christ himself has promised the ratification in heaven. Annealed, and freed from the burthen of his iniquity, the dying man may now with some hope and confidence receive into the tabernacle of his body the adorable sacrament of the body and blood of our Redeemer, and as his end draws near, the "Prayer of Faith," and the "Anointing with oil in the name of the Lord," in strict conformity with apostolic precept, still further steel his soul for an encounter with the powers of death. He breathes his last, but the ministry of his faithful friends is not at an end, their "occupation is not gone!" In ardent prayers for the repose of his soul, they find at once a vent and solace for their grief; the very mortuary chaunts of the "Dies Ira" and "De Profundis" bring hope and comfort to their minds. The connection between them and the departed is not broken, it has only become a more tender and holy tie, associated with, and hallowed by moments of retirement and prayer.—Cath. Mag.

GREAT CATHOLIC MEETING.

EXCLUSION OF CATHOLICS FROM JURIES.

On Wednesday, (Feb. 10.) a most numerous meeting of English Catholics was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, for the purpose of considering the propriety of addressing her Majesty on the conduct of the law officers of the Crown in Ireland, in excluding Roman Catholics from the jury selected to try the traversers in the State trials now proceeding in that country. The Grand Hall, which is calculated to hold about six hundred persons conveniently, was together with the gallery, which has seats for about one hundred and fifty persons, completely crowded long before the proceedings commenced. A great number of ladies were present.

On the platform we observed Lord Camoys, Lord Stourton, the Hon. C. Langdale, P. Howard, Esq., M.P. (Carlisle); the Hon. Sir C. Vavasour, Bart.; Sir Thomas Esmonde, Bart.; P. C. Maxwell, Esq.; Charles Eyston, Esq.; J. Townely, Esq.; W. Williams, Esq.; J. A. Cooke, Esq.; E. Jerningham, Esq.; R. Berkeley, Esq. (of Spetchley); James Eyre, Esq.; John Selby, Esq.; George Morgan, Esq.; George Rasil Eyston, Esq.; the Rev. Dr. Magee; the Rev. Dr. de Lina; the Rev. Messrs. Sisk, Moore, Harrington, Price, Cotter, Torsell, Coyle, Telfourd, Browne, Rymer, Hunt, Hearne; Aston Blount, Esq., son of the late secretary to the English Catholics; Charles Blount, Esq. of Maple, Durham; W. J. O'Connell, Esq.; F. Lucas, Esq.; Dr. Chisholm, and several other distinguished Catholic gentlemen.

At one o'clock precisely, Lord Stourton who was greeted with loud cheering, moved and Mr. LANGDALE seconded, that Lord Camoys do take the chair. The motion was carried by acclamation.

Lord CAMOYS said that the first step necessary on this occasion was, that the secretary should read the requisition by which the meeting was convened.

Mr. SMITH, the Secretary, having read the requisition, which appeared in our advertising columns last week, with the following additional names;—The Earl of Traquair; the Right Rev. Dr. Murdock; Sir Edward Smythe, Bart.; Sir Charles R. Tempest, Bart.; John Towneley, Esq., M.P.; Ambrose Lisle Phillips, Esq.; James Eyre, Esq.; James Kersopp, Esq.; William Teevan, Esq.; Rev. Richard Boyle; Rev. J. B. Hearne; Rev. Edward Hearn; Rev. Thomas Sisk; Rev. Joseph Robson; Rev. Richard Horrabin; Rev. James Foley; Rev. John Moore; Rev. John Telford; Rev. James Holdstock; Rev. Peter Kave; Rev. John Walsh; Rev. J. R. Carrick; Very Rev. Dr. Magee; Rev. P. O'Dwyer; Rev. S. Whitaker; Rev. Samuel Johnson; Mr. W. H. Keens; Mr. William Watkins; Mr. W. H. Swift, and Mr. Frederick Swift.

Lord CAMOYS said: This requisition is signed by 104 most eminent members of the Catholic communion of England, among whom are eight peers, and I have since received a communication from Earl Traquair, requesting his name to be attached to it, making nine peers. (Cheers.) Before opening the business of the day I shall read a letter which I have received from the Earl of Shrewsbury, who it was wished would have taken the chair on this occasion. I have, at the same time, great gratification in saying that the noble earl cordially joins with us in the objects of the present meeting. (Cheers.) The noble lord then read the following letter.—

“Alton Towers, Feb. 6. 1844.

“My dear Lord—I regret extremely that circumstances will not allow me to attend the meeting over which you are to preside to-morrow, as I was anxious for an opportunity of expressing my indignation, in common with yourself and many others, at the fresh insult offered to the whole Catholic population of these kingdoms, by the conduct of the law officers of the Crown in the preliminary proceedings on the interesting, and important trials now taking place in Dublin. The Catholics appear to have been struck off the panel en masse, upon the ground that they were all Repealers; but while this fact is asserted on the one side, it is as stoutly denied upon the other. In the absence of any positive evidence on the point, we are, I think, fully justified in the inference that whether Repealers or not, no Catholic would have been allowed to sit upon that jury, seeing that such determination would have been in perfect keeping with what has hitherto been the fixed policy of the present government in Ireland, to exclude Catholics from all share in the administration of public affairs, and while professing to do equal justice to all, refusing them every grace and right enjoyed by their Protestant fellow-subjects. The exceptions are too trifling even to form the shadow of an argument.

“But even presuming that the facts are upon their side, does it evince a spirit of justice in the government to discard every man who was known to be favourable to Repeal, and at the same time to leave upon the panel many who are notoriously anti-Repealers, and who are now actually sitting in judgment upon the traversers? In either case, then, the first principles of justice have been violated, and a gross insult offered to the people of Ireland; and I am sorry that I have only been able to mark my reprobation of such conduct by signing the requisition for a meeting to express our common feelings upon the subject.

“I remain, my dear lord,

“Very truly and faithfully yours, SHREWSBURY.”

“To the Lord Camoys.”

(Cheers.) I cannot help alluding to another personage who, if he had been in this country, would unquestionably have given his countenance and support to-day. He was a person most popular to the Catholics of England. I have never attended any Catholic meeting, either for the purpose of charity or of advocating the civil and religious rights of the Catholics, but what I found the Hon. Edward Petre on my side. (Cheers.) No person feels more regret than I do at the necessity of calling this meeting. That after fifteen years have elapsed since the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act, it should be necessary for us to assemble again in our political capacity, is a matter of deep regret, and at the same time a severe censure upon those whose conduct has created that necessity. Ireland has already spoken out from north to south, from east to west. (Loud Cheers.) A report of a committee states that the aggregate number of meetings which have taken place on this subject in Ireland, up to the 23rd of January, amounts to 321. The Scotch Catholics have also spoken out, with Bishop Murdock at their head, and now the Catholics of England are called upon to do the same. Bishop Murdock said, “that in the unison of expression with their Irish and Scotch brethren, this one single act of the Government has already arrayed against itself one-third of the population of the united empire.” (Cheers.) This, gentlemen, is no meeting of the Catholic Institute—it is no meeting for the purpose of discussing the Repeal of the Union; but it is a meeting for the purpose of expressing our condemnation of the conduct of the Government in striking off every Catholic whose name was on the jury list, and who might have been called upon to try the traversers, who are now before their country. It is a meeting also for the purpose of sympathising with the Irish Catholics, against whom a violation of the spirit of the act for Catholic Emancipation has been committed. (Cheers.) Even if this Act had stood alone and by itself, there would have been ample reason for the expression of opinion by the Catholics of England; but when the circumstances are considered which have accompanied this Act—when it is remembered that similar circumstances have previously occurred on the part of the present Government in Ireland—when the circumstance of the dropped list of sixty-three names, thirty-five of which were those of Catholics, and when, above all, the consequences of this Act are taken into consideration—those consequences being, that wherever in Ireland the life, liberty, or property of a Catholic may be in jeopardy, the same course may be adopted, and this very instance taken as a model and as a sanction for such a course;—when all these things are seriously reflected upon, it is impossible the whole body of the Catholics of the empire should not feel it to be their imperative duty to interpose their protest, and demand a security against the recurrence of such unconstitutional and unjust aggressions. (Cheers.) I have alluded to the dropped list. Circumstances of great suspicion attached to that occurrence—a suspicion so strong as to lead my mind to believe that design, and not accident, produced the suppression of that list. (Cheers.) And I say so, taking into consideration the animus with which this prosecution was commenced and carried on, and because the Government had the opportunity of proving that it was an accident. For if the Government had been content to have a fair trial, they would have said, “It being impossible to have such a fair trial with a jury as it is now constituted, we will, therefore, postpone the trial until we have obtained a fair jury.” Had they done so, they would have removed all suspicion; but they acted quite contrary to that open and candid course; the inference, therefore, is irresistible that the dropped list was the result of design and is not to be attributed to accident. (Loud Cheers.) But they say, “We had a right to strike off the twelve names.” I don’t for a moment deny their moral right so to do. (Cheers.) If the exercise of a right entails the commission of an act of injustice, the possession of that right is no justification of its exercise. (Cheers.) It is all very well between private individuals. If a private individual were prosecuting a party for his own selfish purposes, or for the purpose of gratifying some malicious propensity, then it might be expected (although, even then, there would be no justification for the act) that he would avail himself of his strict legal right; but in the case of a Government claiming to be called, what it really ought to be, a paternal Government, resorting to such a course, it thereby immediately fell from the high character of a paternal Government, down to the low level of a malicious prosecutor. (Cheers.) A similar answer might be made if it is asserted that they struck off those names, not because the parties were Catholics, but because they had not that bias against the traversers sufficient to secure a conviction. If they say this, it is at once admitting that their only hope of obtaining a conviction was by placing men in the jury-box, each of whom possessed the treble qualification of being Tories, anti-Repealers, and Protestants—(cheers)—and bringing into jeopardy also that wise maxim of the English law, that it is better that ten guilty men should escape, than that one innocent man should suffer. It did more. It was doing great injustice to the present jury. This proceeding was not only an insult to the Catholics, but it was an insult to the present jury itself. See the position in which that jury is placed! If they find a verdict of “guilty,” it will be universally said that they have been guided, not by the justice of the case, but by their religious prejudices and their own particular opinions; and if they should find a verdict of “not guilty,” their own friends will assail them for having sacrificed their political party. (Cheers.) At the same time, far be it from me to utter a single word that shall ever appear to arraign those twelve men. (Cheers.) It is not their fault (Cheers.) There is not one word, as yet, that can by possibility be justly said against them. (Cheers.) It may, perhaps, excite some astonishment in the minds of some English Catholics to observe the present conduct of the Government; but I own with me it excites none at all. At the last general election, I raised my humble but most ineffectual voice in the way of advice, to those English Catholics who, at that time, thought that there was no sort of difference or concern as to what party happened to be in power; they considered that the Tories, who passed the Emancipation Act would never violate its provisions; and that having had before them the examples of their predecessors of a better policy pursued in Ireland, it was utterly impossible to suppose that they would not take warning by it and act in accordance with it. Besides, the Tories having themselves made such professions of acting towards Ireland with the most perfect equality of fairness and justice, it was thought that it was not a matter of the slightest consequence what party was in power. I ask, do you think so now? (Cheers of “No.”) I think this last act of the Tories quite sufficient to convince the Catholics that the warning which I gave them at the last general election was a sound one, and that the Tories are as unchanged and as unchangeable as regards the Catholics, as they were in the palmy days of Protestant ascendancy. (Cheers.) It is very often alleged against us that we are ungrateful to the Tories. It is said that the Tories passed the Emancipation Act, and that the Catholics are ungrateful for it. There was never a more unfounded accusation made than that. (Cheers.) When the Emancipation Act was passed the gratitude of Catholics was unbounded—unlimited; but the moment the party that passed that Act showed that they were coming back to their own principles, and the moment they stated (and that very shortly did they state,) that Protestant ascendancy was to be the basis of their policy in Ireland, then, and at that instant, our gratitude naturally and properly vanished, and the late act which has been committed by the Government not only justifies us, but brings to us the conviction that gratitude is no longer due to the party who would not carry out the principles which they themselves had enacted. (Cheers.) Sometimes—to induce us, I suppose, to be grateful we are told that the oath we took limits us in our civil rights. We are called upon to be grateful in the same breath that we are told that we are limited and mutilated members of political society. A speech which we shall not easily forget was made, last year, by one of her Majesty’s Ministers, in which it was said that “concession had gone to the utmost limits to the Catholics in Ireland.” In mentioning this expression I am irresistibly led to refer to the answer which her Majesty gave to the address which was presented to her by the Dublin corporation on the subject of this grievance. Her Majesty said :—"It is at all times my anxious desire that any grievance of which my people justly complain should be speedily redressed ; and I confide in the wisdom of the Parliament of the United Kingdom for the adoption of such Legislative measures as may be necessary for that purpose" (Cheers.) I don't know who composed that answer ; but, if they are her Majesty's sentiments, which I believe they are, they are in direct contrast with any body of men who will say that "concession has gone to the furthestmost limits in Ireland." Yes, we know whom we ought to be grateful to—grateful to those who fought our battles when emancipation was unattainable. (Immense cheering.) We are grateful to those who were gratified with that victory, and who have carried out in practice the theories they ever professed, and have ever been endeavouring to establish. (Cheers.) We are also grateful to the Irish people for their conduct during that great struggle—(Cheers)—but before all, and above all, we are grateful to O'Connell. (An indescribable burst of enthusiasm from the whole assembly. The cheering, waving of hats and handkerchiefs, and clapping of hands, continued for several minutes ; the entire company, ladies and all, standing up. It was one of the most extraordinary manifestations of feeling ever witnessed at a public meeting in London.) Gentlemen, I will take the liberty of reading to you a passage that I find in the last number of the Dublin Review. The reviewer is answering a work which calls Mr. O'Connell "a gross, clumsy, open, impudent deceiver" (Hisses and groans.) Just listen to this answer :—"Forty years has this 'gross, clumsy, open, impudent deceiver,' been living among them, mingling in their festivities, presiding at their assemblies, kneeling at their altars ; instructing, advising, guiding, impelling, restraining ; standing upon an eminence with the searching gaze of a mighty empire fixed for ever upon him ; every word and every gesture, every action and every omission recorded and canvassed in the high courts of law, in the high court of Parliament, in the high court of public opinion, in the high court of the press—the most powerful press in the world ; by eloquent men, by learned men, by acute men ; by the lower orders of society, by the middle orders, by the upper orders ; by artisans, by merchants, by lawyers, by persons, by proud barons, by mighty kings ;—in all these, by all these, has this being, without a name, been accused and tried. For forty years has this trial been going on, and the first generation of accusers, and witnesses, and judges has passed away, and left room for another and another, and after all this the conviction is yet to come." His bitterest enemies have borne testimony in his favour, and they who would grind him as wheat, or burn him in a furnace, have admitted and maintained that he is a sincere man, an honest man, and all—all—proclaim that he is a great man. (Immense cheering.) They who know him best, whose interests are chiefly identified with his incorruptible virtue—one of the purest hierarchies in the world—one of the most laborious, virtuous, simple-minded priesthoods in the world, and seven millions of the Irish people, have placed in his hands, without a shadow of misgiving, their dearest earthly hopes, Nor have they done so precipitately, blindly. They have tried him long, they have trusted him long, and he has never once betrayed them ; and, therefore, they trust him again. He has the blessing of the Church, he has the prayers of the people, he has the confidence of both. Profane history has no example of this kind." (Immense cheering.) There is a passage, as true as it is just, and as eloquent as either. I know not who composed that passage, but he will forgive me for saying that I envy him the happiness of having composed it. (Cheers.) I am happy also in reading this passage to the meeting, as I hope the press will send it forth to every part of the country where the accusations it so triumphantly answers may have reached. (Cheers.) There is one other subject that I am tempted to mention. Upon the mere rumour that the State meant to propose an allowance to the Catholic priesthood, the Irish Catholic clergy met and passed a resolution in the most emphatic terms, resolving on no account to accept a State provision. I know not what your opinions are upon that subject ; but in the wisdom and propriety of that decision I must cordially concur. (Cheers.) And if ever the proposition should be made, no matter from what party, I shall feel it my duty to make as strenuous an opposition to it as I can ; and it will be materially assisting me if I shall be able to state upon that occasion, that at a large meeting of the Catholics of England and Scotland also, that the sentiments I now express were received with a general sanction and approbation. (Cheers.) In the beginning of my address I said it was a meeting of sympathy with the Irish Catholics. I am quite sure that on all occasions the English Catholics will not be found wanting, but will always readily come forward when the interests of the Irish Catholics are concerned. (Cheers.) As to myself, if my services in the position I occupy can be of any avail to them, I hereby tender them those services, happy if, by their exercise, I can be in the slightest degree of use to them. (Cheers.) The noble lord then announced that the first resolution would be moved by a nobleman who, he said had long been known to them as identified with the cause of his Catholic countrymen—he meant Lord Stourton. (Vehement cheering.)

HEREFORD.—THE CONTROVERSY.—We have three descriptions, from as many correspondents, of this very exciting contest. Our readers are aware that the discussion was to occupy four days. The Protestant challenger was the Rev. John Venn, "a minister," says one correspondent, "of the Establishment, distinguished by his activity and zeal, and the leader of a congregation still very numerous, notwithstanding the frequent desertions into the ranks of the Dissenters, which his pulpit labours seem to have the especial effect of encouraging." The champion of the Faith, once delivered to the saints, was the Rev. James Waterworth, of Newark, brother of the venerated priest, whose cure is the Catholic congregation of Ilfracford. The first question was, whether one or other of the respective Churches was not guilty of sanctioning falsehoods in principle and practice. This charge, which the Protestant divine had frequently brought against the Catholic Church, he now strove to establish. "On the first day," says a second correspondent, "Venn brought his charges of falsehood, deception, and perjury against Roman Catholics. The greatest diligence and research was brought to bear upon the subject, and all the learning of Oxford was brought into requisition. General councils were overhauled; creeds were dissected; theologians examined; and the testimony of historians, adverse to the Catholic Church, in England, France, and Germany, collected. 'Deception of miracles'—nay, the ordinary doctrines of the Catholic religion, were appealed to, to prove that our whole system is a tissue of falsehood and deception. The Protestants were evidently confident that they would overwhelm any adversary under this weight of accumulated evidence—absolutely crush him beneath the load of facts, and pound him by force of arguments. It was Mr. Waterworth's task next day to refute these charges and repel the attack. "Admirable was the ease with which the Catholic champion turned aside the sharpest weapons of his enemy, or hurled them back on his assailant with redoubled force. Never were a man and his cause made such an example of as Mr. Venn and the Church of England! and from Protestant testimony alone! He fastened upon the 'Articles,' and upon the 'Homilies,' undeniable and historical falsehood, sworn to by nearly every member of their Church. The Prayer Book, the Ordination Service, the Absolution, Fasting, Penances, all which a Protestant clergyman swears to (and most laymen), were in turn passed in revision. Never, perhaps, was there a more damning case made out against this most inconsistent of all contradictory systems." This subject, the question of falsehood and deception, was the choice of Mr. Venn. Mr. Waterworth's subject was the rule of faith in the respective Churches. On the third day, the Protestant rule, defined as 'The written Word of God preached or read,' was expounded by Mr. Venn, and on the fourth day, the Catholic rule, defined as 'The teaching of an infallible Church,' was defended by Mr. Waterworth. The question is, not has the Church failed? but can she fail? Christ says, His Church—shall—not—fail. Mr. Venn says, it has failed! In that way he approached the subject, and the clear, lucid, and triumphant manner in which he established this truth, as he truly said, 'by demonstration strong as holy writ,' thrilled through and absolutely awed his audience. In vain did his adversary assail his position; every attack but proved how unequal was the combat, and how hopeless these assaults. The discussion is already beginning to have its legitimate fruit: conviction in some, conversion in others, astonishment and admiration in all. Mr. Waterworth contrived, in the short time allowed him, to crowd together without confusion, a host of authorities, references, and quotations, which in the report of this controversy a most handy-book for future controvertists—a armoury for weapons, whether of attack or defence.—Tablet, Feb.

WEXFORD.—On Wednesday, the feast of St Romuald was celebrated in the little chapel of the Wexford Convent of Mercy, a ceremony that never fails in producing a deep impression on the mind of the beholder—namely, the solemn reception of a postulant into the bosom of a religious community. Miss Mary O'Flaherty, daughter to Bernard O'Flaherty, Esq., of Enniscorthy, was the amiable and virtuous young lady admitted on the above occasion as a member of the rapidly increasing and effective Sisterhood of Mercy. While yet an inmate of her father's house she continued to edify those who had the pleasure of her acquaintance, not only by the fervour of her devotions, but also by the calm, unaffected simplicity of her intercourse with the world. That world she has now quitted for ever, and has gone to serve the God who made her in the silence and solitude of a religious retreat. With hopes of every earthly comfort before her, loved by her immediate friends with a tenderness amounting to enthusiasm, Mary Josephine O'Flaherty, has the courage to dis sever the ties, of nature, and, nobly sacrificing all, to consecrate a heart to Jesus, which was too sublime in its aspirations to be trammelled by the engagements of the earth. Robed in white garments, whose colour aptly intimated the inward purity of her soul, while their richness bespoke the pomp she renounces, Josephine advances to the altar, and when asked by her right rev. superior, who presided on the occasion, if she had a firm intention of persevering in religion to the end of her life, and if she hoped for sufficient strength constantly to carry the yoke of Christ? In a voice distinctly audible, she replies in the affirmative, and answers his lordship by expressing a hope in the mercy of God for grace and strength to persevere. She then retires to an adjoining apartment, the dress of the world is laid aside, and, after a short delay, Mary Josephine returns, clothed in the humble habit of religion. The cincture, veil, and cloak are put on in succession, and after having received his lordship's benediction, sister Mary Josephine O'Flaherty gives the community her kiss of charity and peace. Such is the solemn step which heroic virtue has taken—such, a ceremony calculated to urge the mind, by a hidden impulse, to a just estimation of things perishable. It is in witnessing such, as in a school of doctrine, we learn a contempt for the world, and acknowledge the loveliness of God's tabernacles. Things that pass with time may engage, but never should enslave an immortal spirit—the hopes of man are sublime, because heavenly—his property, a reality, being indestructible—his destiny, above the range of earth, grand in its contemplation, and deserving of a struggle for its attainment.—Correspondent Ibid.

[VOL. VI.]

THE CHARACTER OF THE REFORMERS.

In a former number we gave a general outline of the characters of the most celebrated reformers, and the influence which their example had on the morals of the people. In doing so, it cannot for a moment be imagined that our pen was guided by a spirit of prejudice arising from a difference of religious principles, or that we were influenced in any way by party feeling. It was the result of mature deliberation, after having coolly and calmly studied the different characters in which they appeared, whilst they were digesting the new doctrinal system, and which they laid aside and assumed when they found it convenient for their own interest to do so. It should be the principal object of every writer to divest himself of every thing from which it would appear, that he was a man of party feeling.

When a writer means to condemn severely, he should judge fairly; to show, then, that we reduce to practice ourselves, what we so strongly inculcate to others, (viz. to lay aside prejudice and party feeling,) we direct the attention of our readers to an extract from a number of the "Edinburgh Review" published in 1829. In the extract to which we allude the character of Cranmer is fully developed, which want of space prevented us from inserting in a former number of our journal.

What a contrast between the Reformers and the holy Apostles whom Christ commissioned to establish his Church, or the sainted Augustine, by whom the Saxons were converted to Christianity. The following is the extract:

"They were—a king, whose character may be best described, by saying, that he was despotism itself personified; unprincipled ministers; a rapacious aristocracy; a servile parliament. Such were the instruments by which England was delivered from the yoke of Rome. The work, which had been begun by Henry, the murderer of his wives, was continued by Somerset, the murderer of his brother; and completed by Elizabeth, the murderer of her guest.

"If we consider Cranmer merely as a statesman, he will not appear a much worse man than Wolsey, Gardiner, Cromwell, or Somerset; but when an attempt is made to set him up as a saint, it is scarcely possible for any man of sense, who knows the history of the times well, to preserve his gravity. The shameful origin of his history, common enough in the scandalous chronicles of courts, seems strangely out of place in a hagiology. Cranmer rose into favor by serving Henry in the disgraceful affair of his first divorce. He promoted the marriage of Anne Boleyn with the king. On a frivolous pretence, he pronounced it null and void. On a pretence, if possible still more frivolous, he dissolved the ties which bound the shameless tyrant to Anne of Cleves. He attached himself to Cromwell, while the fortunes of Cromwell flourished; he voted for cutting off his head without a trial, when the tide of royal favor turned. He conformed backwards and forwards, as the king changed his mind. While Henry lived, he assisted in condemning to the flames those who denied the doctrine of transubstantiation; when Henry died, he found out that the doctrine was false. He was, however, not at a loss for people to burn. The authority of his station, and of his grey hairs, was employed to overcome the disgust, with which an intelligent and virtuous child regarded persecution.

"Intolerance is always bad; but the sanguinary intolerance of a man who thus wavered in his creed excites a loathing to which it is difficult to give vent, without calling foul names. Equally false to political and to religious obligations, he was first the tool of Somerset, and then the tool of Northumberland, when the former wished to put his own brother to death, without even the form of a trial, he found a ready instrument in Cranmer. In spite of the canon law, which forbade a churchman to take any part in matters of blood, the archbishop signed the warrant for the atrocious sentence. When Somerset had been, in his turn, destroyed, his destroyer received the support of Cranmer in his attempt to change the course of the succession.

"The apology made for him by his admirers, only renders his conduct more contemptible. He complied, it is said, against his better judgment, because he could not withstand the entreaties of Edward! A holy prelate of sixty, one would think, might be better employed by the bedside of a dying child, than in committing crimes at the request of his disciple. If he had shown half as much firmness when Edward requested him not to commit murder, he might have saved the country from one of the greatest misfortunes that it ever underwent. He became, from whatever motive, the accomplice of the worthless Dudley. The virtuous scruples of another young and amiable mind were to be overcome. As Edward had been forced into persecution, Jane was to be seduced into usurpation. No transaction in our annals is more unjustifiable than this. To the part which Cranmer, and unfortunately some better men than Cranmer, took in this most reprehensible scheme, much of the severity with which Protestants were afterwards treated, must, in fairness, be ascribed.

"The plot failed, Popery triumphed, and Cranmer recanted. Most people look upon his recantation as a single blemish on an honourable life,—the frailty of an unguarded moment. But, in fact, it was in strict accordance with the system on which he had constantly acted. It was a part of a regular habit. It was not the first recantation that he had made; and in all probability, if it had answered his purpose, it would not have been the last. We do not blame him for not choosing to be burnt alive. It is no very severe reproach to any person, that he does not possess heroic fortitude. But, surely, a man who liked the fire so little, should have had some sympathy for others. A persecutor who inflicts nothing which he is not ready to endure, deserves some respect; but, when a man who loves his doctrine more than the lives of his neighbours, loves his own little finger better than his doctrines, a very simple argument a fortiori, will enable us to estimate the amount of his benevolence.

"But this martyrdom, it is said, redeemed everything. It is extraordinary, that so much ignorance should exist on this subject. The fact is, if a martyr be a man who chooses to die rather than renounce his opinions, Cranmer was no more a martyr than Dr. Dodd. He died solely because he could not help it. He never retracted his recantation, till he found he had made it in vain. If Mary had suffered him to live, we suspect that he would have heard mass, and received absolution like a good Catholic, at the accession of Elizabeth; and that he would then have purchased, by another apostasy, the power of burning men better and braver than himself."

THE PRESENT ASPECT OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The self-evidence of the axiom Veritas visum et mora, falsa festinatione et incertis valet, cannot be better exemplified and brought to bear on a reflective mind, than by the consideration of the present state of the Catholic Church. For more than three centuries has this Church been oppressed, persecuted and cried down. To be her child was to be a child of sorrow, a subject of abuse and ignominy. And yet, with all these oppressions and persecutions,—with all the trials that a powerful nation could expose her to, to effect her downfall and annihilation,—has she been subdued? Look to England, the cradle and hotbed of Protestantism, look to her now, and ask the noblest and best of her sons what their opinion at the present moment is, of that religion which their ancestors before the sixteenth century believed in, and which their forefathers in after periods abused? Yes, ask them, and they will give you a far different account to what the founders of Protestantism and the vilifiers of the Catholics gave of the spiritual and moral tendency of that religion. Is it not wonderful that with all the exterminating power and determination with which England† sought to crush the Catholic Religion, that Religion still survives, and survives too with an hourly increase of influence and strength within those very bounds where she suffered most,—where, to confess oneself a Catholic, was to record his own condemnation to banishment or to death? Is it not wonderful that, with all the passionate ardour of hatred, malice and uncharitableness with which she has been assailed, she should yet remain the same,—unchanged and untarnished,—and should be now seen to rear her head with all her pristine beauty to the wonderment and admiration of that very nation that sought to blacken and deface her? How is it, if all the charges brought by her enemies against her be true, that she should have outlived the determination to exterminate her from the face of the earth, and to have at this very period the influence she daily exercises successfully to induce those to return to her fold, who have been led astray from her by misrepresentation and calumny? Let us look to England's House of Parliament, as constituted at the present day,—let us hear the greatest of her statesmen and lawgivers, the majority of the Protestant members thereof, declare to what degree their opinion of the Catholic Religion differs from that of their predecessors of the last four centuries. Let us see how far they have publicly contributed to belie the statements of those who deprived the Catholic of his Churches, his Charities and his Institutions, to feed and pamper the offspring of Innovation. They refer us to the Press, that noble and effectual assertor of right against wrong; the friend of the calumniated and the enemy of the calumniator, the prop and support of the oppressed and the scourge of the oppressor;—let us look to this great dispenser of knowledge and of truth, and see it bring prominently forward, to the view of all, the virtues and noble tendencies of our persecuted religion;—hear it call for, and demand, justice to the Catholics, justice so long delayed and even now doled out with a sparing hand.

And how are we to account for these changes;—to what power and influence are we to attribute them? Can we not discern something of the divine hand working in justice and in mercy,—to the confusion of the proud and stiff-necked, and to the comfort and solace of the true members of the holy faith? And is there nothing in these to confirm and support the declaration of the Almighty, that he shall be with his Church until the consummation of the world, and that the powers of hell shall not prevail against her?

We have been led to these reflections by the perusal of an article in the Westminster Review for March last. The reviewer, in commenting on the misgovernment of Ireland, gives the primary cause of it in the following words:

The oppressions heaped on the Irish for centuries, and the persecutions which the Catholic religion has sustained in Ireland, have deprived the Irish Catholic Clergy of one of the most respectable aspects and attributes of the clerical character. Insult and oppression have prevented them from being or deeming it right to be the friends of the institutions of their country. The most valuable influence exercised by the established clergymen in aristocratic eyes, is the influence which they exercise in favour of order and authority, when they tell the people not merely to "Fear God, and honour the King," but to "meddle not with those who are given to change." A most valuable influence this, and one essential to all good government, which consists in ruling the people by institutions which they love. The misgovernment of Ireland never was more strikingly expressed than by the spectacle of nearly all the Catholic Bishops of Ireland coming forward to give the sanction of religion to the Repeal movement.

We beg to draw the particular attention of our readers to the following paragraph, which is in continuation of the above. It speaks of the Irish Clergy, a subject that were best left to the unbiased judgment of the Protestants themselves. The Reviewer, who is a professed Protestant, bears testimony to the virtues of these calumniated men in language worthy of a noble rival.

Great is the love and reverence which the people of Ireland entertain for their clergy—and with a good cause. No priesthood in Europe, Catholic or Protestant, has exercised a nobler function than that of the Catholic Clergy of Ireland. There has been the sweetening and purifying influence which has chiefly relieved the distresses of the most miserable people in Europe. In the days and nights of his bitterest distress, the Irish peasant had brought to his icy hut and hungered hearth, by a laborious and brotherlike priest, the celestial consolations of religion. His landlord might be his oppressor, but the man of God has been his friend always. His family might be turned out of the hut which was all that remained to him of lands that a few generations ago had been in the possession of his forefathers; his hovel might be unroofed, that his bed-ridden parent might not remain in it unexposed to the blasts of winter; the last bit of furniture that remained to him, that most endeared by affectionate associations, might be wanted before his eyes, but still his pastor held up the crucifix to him in his sorrow, and ever in the darkest hour of his distress, lit up the vision of a heavenly home. Reverence, affection, obedience—these are not spontaneous feelings towards any class of men in human breasts. Ignorance and superstition excite them not. If you own that the Irish love and obey their priests you prove these priests to be loveable and venerable. Whatever virtues the Irish character exhibits, it owes chiefly to the friendly relations between the priesthood and the peasantry. Taught by a priesthood whose ideal of conduct aims at a purity inconsistent, perhaps, with human nature, the Irish homes are not surpassed in Europe for chastity and affection. To a devoted priesthood the miserable peasantry of Ireland owe the sweet and holy joys which descend on virtuous hearths, however lowly.

The penultimate sentence of the above paragraph is quite characteristic of a Protestant writer. The ideal of conduct aiming at a purity, the consistency of which with human nature is questioned, is yet allowed to make Irish homes unsurpassed in Europe for chastity and affection! We are at a loss to know what purity that can be, which is liable to be considered as inconsistent with our nature; at least any portion of that purity which the Almighty orders us to attain, and which only our Church inculcates?

VICARIATE APOSTOLIC OF CEYLON.

We are happy to understand from a letter just received by the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, from the Right Reverend the Bishop of Usula, Vicar Apostolic of Ceylon, that the number of nominal Catholics who have schismatically joined themselves with the schismatical priest lately sent from Gailon into the island to disturb the peace of religion, does not exceed fifteen or twenty.

We think it speaks well for the state of the Church in Ceylon, that not more than 20 her children, under existing circumstances, have declared themselves rebels to legitimate authority, and we congratulate the Right Reverend Caetano Antonio on this consoling evidence of the fidelity of his Lordship's very numerous flock.

In the mean time, his Lordship laments in part of the true shepherd (and what Ca-will not lament it?) that there should even one so unfortunate as to separate himself from the communion of the faithful, and labour with a zeal worthy of his high dignity, to withdraw his erring children from the dangers to which they have exposed themselves by their disobedience. His Lordship has caused the voice of the Supreme Pastor to be heard amongst them, removing all ambiguity as to the authority which they are bound before God to obey, and we hope and pray that this step will have the desired effect. A printed copy of the following Extract of a letter from the Cardinal Prefect De Propaganda Fide, and its translation into English, Cingalese and Tamil, has been received from Ceylon, and is in circulation throughout that Island.

ILLUSTRIOUS AND MOST REV. LORD, for the designation of the new Archbishop of Goa, whom perhaps your Lordship has heard, is legitimately appointed and we, to remove all ambiguity

we do acquaint your Lordship, that no authority has been allowed to him by the Most Holy Father over the regions that have been confided, and are subjected to the Vicar Apostolic, inasmuch that the Vicars Apostolic themselves are, as before, dependant immediately on the same Holy See, through this Sacred Congregation.

gregation of the Propaganda Fide, dated 22
January, 1844.

Very Affectionate Brother,
J. PH. CARD. FRANSONIUS, Praefect.

THE RIGHT REV. DR. CAJETANO ANTONIO,
Bishop of Unula and Vicar Apostolic Ceylon, Colombo.
(True Copy) J. BRUNELLI, Secretary.
CAETANO DO ROSARIO, Secretary.

We have been permitted to insert the following letter:—

MY DEAR LORD ARCHBISHOP,—Such a length of time has elapsed since I had the honor of last writing to your Grace that I am at a loss where to commence my letter.
I have many apologies to offer for not having before acknowledged your Grace's letter, written in January last, and Mrs ——— also feels that she has been negligent in not having written to express her acknowledgements to your Grace for having given her an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the amiable and pious Mrs. ———.
I must throw myself on your indulgence, and endeavour now to notice the few topics in our dull part of the world which can interest your Grace; before doing so, however, I must with Mrs. ——— express our deep sympathy with the Catholics of Calcutta for the loss of the devout and beloved Rev. Mr. Weld. When, some time ago, we heard of the Rev. Mr. Irvine's death, whose virtues we had some little opportunity of admiring, we were distressed to think of the loss he would be to the Calcutta Mission, but when to that is to be added the name of one so young, and so devoted to the cause which now-a-days but few are ready like him to relinquish the pleasures of the world to follow, I cannot but sincerely regret his loss to religion and the Noble Society of which he was such an ornament. I will say no more on the subject, conscious that no words can express the feeling of grief which all must feel who had the happiness of knowing him.

Mrs. ——— has been delighted to hear from Mrs. ——— of the numerous benefits religion is deriving every day from the Establishments which have so plentifully and quickly sprung up in and about Calcutta.

Unfortunately, Mrs. ———'s residence here is so far from ours that we have not had the pleasure of enjoying as much of her society as Mrs. ——— could wish. Our houses are at the opposite extremes of the Cantonment, nearly four miles apart, and Mrs. ——— has the disadvantage of being that distance from the Chapel; her visits to it must therefore be attended with much fatigue, particularly as her health is so delicate, yet she is very exemplary in her constant attendance at Mass. On Easter Sunday, we had a very large assemblage at our little Chapel, our excellent and pious old Clergyman, after a week of constant labour, preparing many penitents for this holy season, officiated with as much pomp and solemnity as the means he had of doing so permitted. The greatest number I have yet seen in ———, went to communion, amongst them I was glad to see nearly every Catholic lady and officer here.

Of all our proceedings in Gwalior I presume your Grace is already acquainted; the charity of the Rev. Father Francis, from Agra, brought him unassisted and unrewarded to offer his religious advice and administer the sacrament to those who might require it. Many enjoyed the blessing of dying in peace with God from his pious charity in coming amongst them. I regret to think that if we should go to the Punjab next season it can hardly be expected that any Clergyman will follow us, they are unpaid for it by the Government, and the soldiers have too many expenses on a march to be able to afford anything; at least in this case they did not, and none of the Missionaries of upper India are sufficiently independent to be able to afford to do so without assistance. We are beginning to feel the hot season again, but thank God the station is very healthy. I have spun this letter out to too great a length, I shall therefore now conclude, by begging your Grace's blessing, and that you will do Mrs. ——— and myself the favor to present our respectful compliments to Mrs. ———, and the other ladies of Loretto Convent, as well as our Rev. friends.

Allow me to be,

My dear Lord Archbishop,
Your faithful servant,

April 7, 1844.

Original Poetry.

"THE MONTH OF MARY."

Welcome, month of Mary,
The smiling month of May—
Now the heart is airy,
Every scene is gay.

2.

Soft the Zephyrs whisper,
The groves with music ring,
While the feathered dispart
Welcomes back the spring.

3.

The lark's gay measure soars
To hail the rising day,
And Nature's choicest stores
Bedeck the path of May.

4.

The modest, blushing rose,
And all its flow'ry train
Their virgin-tints disclose,
And spangle all the plain.

5.

Such joy unto the heart
The prayers of Mary bring;
The warblers act our part,
As on the spray they sing.

6.

Her sweet name in their breath,
The Zephyrs waft along,
Infusing life for death,
For sighs, the merry song.

7.

'Tis wrought in gilded plumage,
'Tis painted in the rose,
And ev'ry flow'r that blooms
Proclaims it as it grows.

8.

Watchword in our faith—
'Tis sung in ev'ry lay,
It shines in Nature's smiles,
And rises with the day.

9.

Hail, Mary, thou art ours,
As both the earth and sky
And while the sun is seen
Thy name is sung on high.

Selections.

THE OBSERVANCE OF SUNDAY.

Upon the principle and duty of keeping holy the Sabbath Day, reflecting members of every Christian denomination are alike agreed; but with diversity of practice and opinion exists as to the best manner of doing so. Between the extremes of a Sir Andrew Agnew's wild would-be legislation on such a subject, and the deplorable laxity which in France, for instance, too generally is in its regard, there is undoubtedly a medium, stood, on the one hand, from puritanism, and on the other, from systematic constitutions and includes that degree of earnestness of thought and action, by which the Sabbath should be distinguished from every other day in the week. Considered in many, perhaps most respects, the external decorum by which Sunday is hallowed in England is deserving of imitation and admiration of all Europe. It is, in the most striking and advantageous contrast with the wicked laxity of France on that point, and conveys to the mind of a casual impressionist, not the less vivid, because a little superficial—of grave religious being a leading characteristic in the national character. To the system of entirely closing all shops of keeping the streets clear of the bad circumstance of trade that fill them on other days, to the continued peals of church and of theatres and places of essential entertainment, and to the universal appearance of greater ordinary decency, we lend the warmest approval as to so many justly due and well paid tokens of respect to a day which the Lord has commanded man to keep holy. But while commending such appropriate observances as we have we desire to record our utter dissent from the sour and Cromwellian spirit which would over a day of prayer, and praise, and rejoicing, a weekly anti-grocery of gloomy self-abstraction and denial, and would curtail the great mass of labouring population of lawful amusement on their only holiday.

In the ideas that extensively prevail among the Protestants of England on the subject of Sabbath observance, there is a heaven of commonwealth Protestantism, to which not even the feeling of any other Protestant state assimilates itself. The prejudice, for instance, against card-playing on Sunday is probably stronger in this country than in any other part of the world,—diffused too, as it is, among those whose general course of life is anything but a religious one. We have in our several instances of persons who, while on one hand ready enough to rush into the in-jury of notorious vice on a Sunday, would shrink from the touch of a pack of cards on any other day, as from a perfectly diabolical contamination. Now we are no advocates for playing at cards on Sunday, and for gambling on that or any other day, entertain the greatest abhorrence; it does seem to us, that to discover pleasures derivable from Sunday pastime, is a gross infraction, is equivalent to a sin. A safe and an honest day of conduct may be laid acent in themselves, become blameable, if their indulgence gives occasion of offence and scandal to others. Thus while believing that Catholics may, with utter freedom from delinquency, after a due discharge of Sunday duties, recreate the evening with a game at cards, we should deem that amusement at once unlawful, if even a Protestant servant in attendance took conscientious umbrage at its having taken place.

Under correction, of course, from superior authority, should we hazard any statement which that would disallow, we will presume to offer our impressions of that which constitutes the proper observance, and that which does not amount to the violation of a Catholic's Sabbath. With regard to sanctifying the day, let us be at once understood to admit, that too much of public prayer and private devotion cannot be indulged in, so long as individual edification find its account therein. We mean, that if from sunrise till sunset the Christian could unceasingly, and with profit, devote his mind to the services of the Church, and to exercises of piety at home, it should be at once his glory and his duty to do so. But so infirmly constituted is the mind of man, as to be incapable of such continuous application to solemn and sublime subjects. All, then, that we next contend for is, that when not engaged in the positive duty of sanctifying the Sunday, by attendance at church and private exercises of devotion, we commit no infraction of the Sabbath by a recourse to harmless and accustomed recreations.

We have had more than one occasion to observe the sleepy listlessness and ennui which, in the bosom of Protestant families of what are called serious habits, prevail under the guise of Sabbath observance: we have marked the nodding head over the open prayer-book, and the restless impatience with which the bed-time hour has been looked for and anticipated, as the welcome moment of emancipation from the forced gravity and constraints of the day. In good earnest, were it not a better sanctification of the Sunday evening, to indulge in some lively relaxation, than to attempt unsuccessful and drowsy ruminations over books and topics of religious import? Upon Catholics, the obligation of hearing mass on the Sunday is paramount; in which respect their sense of Sunday observance is nicer than that of Protestants, by whom the state of the weather, the non-arrival of a new dress, slight indisposition, or any such trivial cause, are commonly regarded in the light of ample matter of excuse for non-attendance at church.

We are further enjoined to abstain, on Sunday, from all "servile work" by which is meant, any employment or pursuit followed up for the avowed purpose of gain. To frequent other services of the Church, and devote such a portion of the day as our faculties of self-concentration will allow to meditation and holy reading, are alike matters of Catholic precept and example; but after the accomplishment of such public and private duties, or during the intervals of their performance, we deliberately believe that all ordinarily lawful recreations, whether of science, of literature, or conversation, music and other arts, and athletic or sedentary games and pastimes, are as much the subjects of legitimate pursuit on a Sunday as on any other day of the

Lord STOURTON then came forward and was greeted with renewed applause. He said—Ladies and gentlemen, I may fairly say that I am almost a jubilarian—(a laugh)—and worn out in the service, as my noble friend has observed, of my Catholic Countrymen. When I cast my eyes around I find few indeed of those whom I saw in my earlier days. They are gone, and I trust they have received their reward of the services which they rendered to the same cause. (Hear, hear.) I feel myself that I enjoy an advantage in having lived to this period, because I am, in my own person, a living refutation of the charge that a Roman Catholic is not to be bound by his oath. (Cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, year after year I afforded that refutation, in the presence of the first Peer of the land, my lamented friend the late Duke of Norfolk, who threw his marshal's staff to the ground and cast his privilege to the winds—who unseated himself—for his seat was never taken from him—because he would not pass that fragile bar which separated him from the House of Lords, and where he presented himself as a petitioner, instead of a member—(cheers)—although he should have taken his seat next in rank to the Primate of all England, and by the side of the princes of the blood royal, as the Premier Peer of England. (Cheers.) That fragile rail was to me, as it was to him, a barrier of adamant, because there was placed upon it an oath—(cheers)—and whilst I raised my eyes to heaven I could not take that oath. (Renewed cheers.) Am I then to be told that, as a Catholic, I am not to be bound by an oath? Above all, am I to be told so by the Minister of the Crown, who says that he has taken away the barrier, and that he has substituted an oath to which no Roman Catholic can have any valid or conscientious objection? (Cheers.) It is an oath which was not made for me alone. It must be taken by every man who wishes to be admitted to the privileges of the constitution, whether he be priest or layman. Am I to be told, because that oath says that I am not to weaken the Protestant religion, or to interfere with the Church as by law established, that this is to limit me in my functions, and to prevent me from doing my duty as a peer? (Hear.) If that is to be the case, the oath degrades, disgraces, and annihilates the House of Peers. (Cheers.) Yes, I say, annihilates the House of Peers. For, if there be one member in that house who can say to another, "You are not my equal here," that equality, which is the greatest pride and most valuable privilege of the peerage, would be destroyed. We would no longer be a House of "Peers." I dare them to touch a hair of my head; a kind of pluie platonique pervades the whole body in its purity, or in its corruption; taint my ermine robes and the same pestilential breath will tarnish their own; degrade my honours, abridge my rights, and the same moment they lower and degrade themselves. They would degrade their own blood in my person, the humblest baron in the House, who sits there as the peer of the highest duke and of the prince of the royal blood. Why are we peers? If I am to be told that I cannot vote as well as any other peer upon every measure that comes before us, because I have taken an oath not to weaken the Established Church? Why, ladies and gentlemen, I may venture to say, that there has not been a single measure passed, since I have had the honour of a seat in the House, but has, in some degree or other, affected the Established Church. I call it an honour to have a seat there. But I should call it a dishonour if any obstruction is to be put upon my vote. (Cheers.) That is not my language alone. It was the language of the Duke of Norfolk. I have heard him say over and over again that he had a right to vote on any subject—even on the discipline of their own Church; and that if he would not do so, it was because he abstained through delicacy, but with no surrender of his rights as a peer of Parliament. How dare the very gentleman that asked me for my proxy, say that I could not vote upon questions affecting the Established Church? I should say to him, How can I give you my proxy, when it may be used upon some question of that nature? ("Hear," and a laugh.) It is an oath of obligation, and I will keep it. I will not act as a conspirator against the Established Church, but I will stand by my order, as Earl Grey said. Our ancestors, in one of their most important acts, struck from the statute book constructive treason, which, I trust, I shall never live to see revived in this country; but, Gentlemen, there is a new constructive treason which some persons would introduce into that House where I sit as a member of the peerage. Treason against the very principle of the peerage itself, treason against its rights, treason against its honours and its blood. Once admit the principle of inequality, once admit on the benches of the House one impar inter pares, and the peerage is gone. Yes, in its own precedent, gone for ever; not by a long Parliament, but by its own suicidal act. A new constructive treason is, by this doctrine of the Catholic oath brought into the House. But, shall I be a party to introduce this treason? Shall I be the first to introduce a kind of Polish veto into the House? If I am to vote only by the construction they want to put upon the oath, I could scarcely vote upon any subject, but some peer might get up and say that it was dangerous to the Protestant religion; and shall I be the first to give any one the privilege of ordering "strangers to withdraw." (Cheers and laughter.) The noble lord in the chair, in his lucid and splendid speech has anticipated my sentiments; but there is one topic on which I wish to say a few words—the disappearance of the thirty-five Catholic jurors. I once heard that Ireland was the land of fairies, and that some of them were mischievous and malicious; and that they gave their favourites charmed rings and other means of making themselves invisible, and slipping away whenever they wished. Perhaps it was some one or other of those who said that the thirty-five jurors were for certain invisible, as they had been seen on them, and they were never seen again. (Laughter.) But have to come back to the subject—have to come back to the subject—the doctrine that a Catholic cannot be trusted with the exercise of the constitutional functions as a peer of the House, because he is not bound by his oath. That is a doctrine fraught with the most destructive, the most devastating consequences. It involves consequences of far mightier importance than the construction of the oath of a peer—or of a member of the House of Commons—or even of the Coronation Oath. (Cheers.) All these sink into insignificance, for you destroy the constitution of the country, and the foundations of religion, when you take away the integrity of the Catholic's oath. (Hear, hear.) In doing so, you take away the authority of the Sacred Volume itself, and destroy the very basis of Christianity itself? (Hear.) Was this a doctrine that should have proceeded from the functionaries of the Government? from the temples of justice? or from any of the institutions of the country, great or small? No, because we are told that these are all based upon Christianity, and that Christianity is part and parcel of the law of the land. There was once a temple that disgraced other generations—a temple that existed when I was young—a temple from which sprung the tenets not of the immortality, but of the mortality of the soul—where it was taught that death was but an eternal sleep—the temple of the Goddess of Reason—of perverted reason. From that temple I can conceive might have proceeded the pernicious and destructive principle, that the Roman Catholic was not to be considered bound by his oath. There, indeed, it would have been in keeping because it agreed with their object which was crying down Christianity; and it would have suited them well to have told the Catholics that they were as great atheists as themselves. (Cheers.) Mr. Frederick Shaw, the Recorder of Dublin, in addressing a Protestant meeting some years ago, said "Let them (the Parliament) but touch the Sacred Volume, and then 'to your tents, O Israel!'" But they have touched the Sacred Volume when they touched my oath, and I say, also, "to your tents, O Israel!" I do not wish to say anything that should be painful, but the Attorney-General for Ireland had reflected upon the oath of Catholics; and if the Attorney-General did think that they were not bound by their oath, he did well to challenge every Catholic on the list. The Attorney-General would, perhaps, tell me that he objected not to Catholics, but to Roman Catholics. Let the Attorney-General enter that temple to which I have before adverted, and say to the priest of that temple, "These men are not Catholics, but we are Catholics;" and the priest would laugh him to scorn, and say to him, "It may be very well for you in your little Island, to circulate your light gold or your heavy gold, your appreciated paper which you call pound sterling, but the language of Christendom is otherwise. We know no such distinctions." Pass over the world, not only in Christendom but in Africa or Asia, and if it were asked, "What was the Catholic Church?" the people would show you the place of worship under one and the same synonymous appellation of Catholic and Roman Catholic. (Hear.) What I would say is this, and I say it with kindness, I hope in fair and solemnity in all solemnity to my Protestants and Catholics, the whole body of the Christians should divide as we like, let us say as we please, but let us not up the very stones of our common churches in order to pelt each other with the fragments. (Cheers.) In the language of Saul, let us not lay sacrilegious hands upon the Sacred Volume, and invalidate the testimony of those writings, which have been in the hands of the men whom we now say are not to be believed upon their oath. (Hear, hear.) The Catholics have a duty to perform—to go to their Majesty—to their religious Sovereign, and ask her, by the common reverence she has entertained for the Sacred Volume, and for the character of Christendom, not merely to protect them and their interests, but to protect that which is a nobler and more exalted interest—that which they mutually believed to be the revelation of Christianity. The noble lord then concluded, amidst loud cheers, by proposing the following resolution:—"That the abolition of civil distinctions on account of religion, was the avowed object of those who introduced it, and the understood principles of the Act for the Emancipation of Roman Catholics."
